Higgons, J. A., for six years pastor of Central, Chelsea, Mass., supplied the pulpit of North Andover the last Sunday of July. On Aug. 8 he preached in Plymouth, Worcester, at union services of Plymouth and Union Churches.

Lane, C. S., of the Hartford School of Religious Pedagogy, is spending his vacation on the Maine coast at Mere Point. He preached recently for his son, George Homer Lane, who is spending his vacation in charge of the church at Abington, Ct. The latter will return to complete his studies when the Hartford Seminary opens in September.

Lathrop, T. B., Branford, Ct., at the June meeting of the New Haven, Ct., Congregational Club, was elected president of the club for 1920–1921. Dr. J. M. Williamson of New Haven was chosen one of the vice-presidents, and Dr. O. E. Maurer of Center, New Haven, was elected to serve on the executive committee.

Parker, Mrs. Richard, for 40 consecutive years has been the devoted teacher of the Beginners' Class in the Sunday School of First, Ticonderoga, N. Y. To the members of this class, arriving at the age of seven, Mrs. Joseph Cook annually presents Bibles. The unusual record of 40 years' faithful teaching of an annually changing class was fittingly marked, on July 19, by a gathering of Mrs. Parker's church and Sunday School friends. Representing her many classes, one of her present pupils and one of her earliest pupils presented a sheaf of more than 100 congratulatory letters from former pupils now living in various parts of this country and Canada; from all of whom a beautiful brooch was presented, expressing their appreciation of her 40 years of faithful and devoted service.

Robinson, O. L., has finished a term of service under the Interchurch World Movement in the survey of the northern sections of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan. He investigated the conditions and needs of the lumber men of that Lake Superior region in and outside of lumber camps. He has now entered upon service in the interests of Endeavor Academy, with headquarters at Endeavor.

Sawyer, H. L. pastor of Mukwonago, Wis., with his family, plans to spend the summer on the old home farm in New Hampshire.

Schwimley, W. A., has just resigned the pastorate of Lodi, Cal., to accept a unanimous call to Calvary, Oakland. During his six years of ministry at First, Mr. Schwimley has been instrumental in securing a new manse, a balopticon and new hymnals. The old manse has been remodeled for a parish house and is well equipped. Three hundred new members have been received into the church.

Sharpe, Harry A. and Mrs. Sharpe, Fifth Ave. Church, Minneapolis, Minn., mourn the death of their only daughter, Wardeen Hannah, who died June 30, 1920, after an illness of more than six months. She was just nineteen years of age and was a sophomore at Carleton College. Many kindnesses were shown to Miss Sharpe and her parents by the members of the congregation during her long illness. After the return from the sad journey to Indiana, where she was buried, the church presented Mr. and Mrs. Sharpe with a purse containing some $400.

MRS. BETSY COLTON SPRING

The death on Saturday, July 30, of Mrs. Betsy Colton Spring at the old Colton home on Kings Highway, West Springfield, removed one of the best known and most active women in Massachusetts. She had been feeble for the last five months but only recently became confined to her bed.

She was born in East Windsor, Ct., March 30, 1834, and was married by the Rev. J. H. Walker of Holyoke, Mass., to a noted physician, the late Dr. Charles H. Spring of Boston. The couple lived a while in Holyoke, in 1861, removing to Boston, where Mrs. Spring immediately became extremely active in missionary, temperance and various other forms of benevolent work. She was an ideal neighbor, a loyal friend and justly proud of a distinguished New England ancestry and up to the very last showing the keenest interest in all the world changes.

She was for many years an active member of the parish of the Park Street Congregational Church in Boston, with which church she has always been identified, never having taken her letter. She was President, for many years, of the Maternity Association and was one of the first Vice-Presidents of the Boston Women's Christian Temperance Union.

Last March, on the occasion of her 86th birthday, she received letters and messages of good wishes from all over the United States.

Her eldest son, Charles F. Spring, died about 20 years ago.

She was one of the highest types of Christian women.

Besides her son, Edward C. Spring, who is General Superintendent of the Lehigh Valley Transit Co., of Allentown, Pa., the only near relatives are her brother, Benjamin Watson Colton, and her nephew, Henry Day Colton of Kings Highway, with whom she made her home for the last several years, in the old home built about 1780.

Her funeral took place at the old home on Tuesday afternoon, Aug. 3, at 2.30, Rev. D. D. Gorton of the First Congregational Church of West Springfield officiating. Interment was made in the family plot in the Hill Cemetery where her late husband, Dr. Charles H. Spring, is buried.

FRANCES ELLEN LORD

Miss Frances Ellen Lord entered into the eternal life, Aug. 1, 1920. She was born in New York City, Nov. 11, 1835, the daughter of Charles Austin and Ernestine Libby Lord. Much of her early life was spent in Portland, Me. She was a teacher of Latin in Vassar College from 1868 to 1877, and became head of the Latin department of Wellesley College from 1877 to 1897. For the next eleven years she was Professor of Latin in Rollins College, Winter Park, Fla.

She was the author of three books: "The Metres of Horace," "Latin Pronunciation" and "Jesus Said," a devotional book which has been translated into Turkish and Chinese.

Miss Lord was a member of the Congregational Church, Wakefield, Mass. Her Christian faith was pure and steadfast, and her interest in Christian education and missions was keen.

She is survived by two sisters, Miss Nathalie Lord and Miss Agnes M. Lord of Wakefield.

REV. JOHN R. RICHARDS

Rev. John R. Richards, pastor of West Parish Congregational Church, Haverhill, Mass., for the past seven years, died July 21. He was born in Wales in 1857, the son of James and Mary Richards, and received his education for the ministry at Crec Brecon Memorial College, South Wales. Mr. Richards was ordained to the ministry in Cromport, Wales, and preached in the Cambridge Heath Congregational Church, London, for nine years, afterwards coming to this country.

He is survived by a widow, Mrs. Martha E Richards, five sons and three daughters.

REV. FRANK P. WATERS

Rev. Frank Palmer Waters, formerly pastor of the Third Church in Waterbury, Ct., died of heart failure July 25, near his home in Rocky Hill.

He was born in Whitewater, Wis., Oct. 10, 1856. When a child, his parents moved to Norwich, N. Y. He attended Norwich Academy and was graduated from Colgate University. Mr. Waters studied law but never practiced. He was graduated from Yale Theological School, after which he was stated supply at Hadlyme and at Riverton.

On Nov. 1, 1892, he took charge of the mission, which afterwards became the Third Congregational Church, he being its first pastor. He afterwards went to Wolcott, where he was pastor for nearly eight years. In 1905 he accepted the pastorate of the church in Rocky Hill and was influential in building its new parsonage. For the past few years he was engaged in farming. He leaves a wife who, before marriage, was Miss Mary Starr, of Hamilton, N. Y., four children, Mrs. Ralph J. Averill, of Washington, Ct., Theodore C. and Frances Waters, of Rocky Hill, and Harvey S. Waters, of New York.

REV. HORACE DUTTON

Rev. Horace Dutton, of Auburndale, who died Aug. 4, in Boston, was born in Boston in 1841, and was a graduate of Yale, in the class of 1862, and of the Andover Theological Seminary. His last pastorate was in the Congregational Church at Northboro, Mass.

After he retired from the ministry in 1879 he devoted most of his time to philanthropic work, and spent a number of years in Europe.

Mr. Dutton is survived by a brother, E. P. Dutton, of New York, the well-known publisher; a sister, Dr. Julia M. Dutton, of West Newton; and by three children.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

When mother and her brood started for town the weather was threatening, so she did not go unprepared. In due time they stepped off the crowded train at the station. "Have you got all the umbrellas, Johnny?" was her first question. "I should say I had," said the boy. "I had three when I started and now I've got five."—Boston Transcript.

"Any good fishing around here?" asked the visitor of the little village lad. "Yes, sir," answered the boy. "You goes down that private road until you comes to a sign in a field wot says, 'Trespassers will be prosecuted.' Well, you goes across the middle of that field, and then you comes to a pond, with a noticeboard wot says, 'No fishing Allowed.'" "Yes?" "Well—that's it."—Farm and Home.

Dr. Kelman in his admirable lectures on "The War and Preaching," says: "I have often turned to the saying of a very charming little friend of mine, and found in it much wisdom. She was little more than a baby, but her favorite game was that of conducting religious services. Once, after a sermon of longer duration that usual, she suddenly ended with this closing prayer, 'O Lord, I've been long enough a minister; please make me just a nice, nice gentleman.'"—Christian Register.

The Weymouth New Testament in Modern Speech

Not a crude translation in colloquial English but an exact translation in finished English.

A few years since we took the American agency for this remarkable book. Thousands have been sold and the demand has grown faster than the possibility of supply. Now, however, conditions are somewhat better in England and we hope to have adequate supply.

"We have had many translations, but this is by far the best. Students of the New Testament will find it suggestive by way of interpretation, and literary excellence."—The Methodist.

"Here is a translation of the New Testament in modern language that we can recommend most heartily because it actually conveys the writer's meaning in dignified and illuminating speech without making the book too common. We hope that every minister who can will buy it."—The Expositor.

"Most careful, scholarly, and sagacious. It can always be relied on for accuracy and penetration. The book is by far the best of its kind."—Principal S. D. F. Salmond.

"People will read their New Testament as given in these pages with the zest of a new book."—Christian World.

"Rendered into English with scholarly accuracy. It shall always be ready to hand among my nearest books for reference."—Principal W. F. Adeney.

"I always use it in public worship. It creates a quickened interest and sustains and rewards attention."—Rev. John Clifford, D. D.

"We read and forget, in the interest of the meaning, that it is a new translation."—Expository "Times."

"It is a work admirably done and is a great aid in getting at the real meaning of the New Testament of our Lord. This is a book every minister would do well to have on his study table."—The "Lutheran World."

"A most convenient hand-book for those who wish to turn Bible study from a matter of relative indifference to a real joy and pleasure."—The Christian Evangelist.

The Congregational Program of Parish Evangelism

September—December

The first Period of the "All-the-year-around program of parish evangelism" for every Congregational church

A Meeting of the EVANGELISTIC or MEMBERSHIP Committee to face the year's work of the church, to study the needs of the community, and to adopt a program to meet those needs.

A Thoroughgoing parish survey and visitation to strengthen the interest of the members and to locate newcomers in the parish.

A Church Rally, to acquaint the community with the church, its program, its method, its personnel, its ideals and its outlook.

A Program of preaching and personal work to secure the decision of men and women for Christ and their enlistment in the fellowship of worship and service of the church.

A Reception of new members at the Fall Communion.

A booklet, "A Program of Parish Evangelism," has been mailed to all pastors. Free copies may be had on request.

WOMEN'S INTERESTS

Two Visits and Two Ways

By J. L. Glover

"Aunt Madge is coming! How lovely!" said Flossy.

"Aunt Sarah is coming! How awful!" said Louise at the same instant.

"Why such varied comments?" I mildly inquired, being a visitor in the Lyndon family myself, and unacquainted with their relations.

"Wait, and you will see," said Katie, the children's mother, who was my school friend, with an expressive little grimace.

No more was said on the subject. On the same day, Aunt Madge and Aunt Sarah arrived—Aunt Sarah first.

"Dear me, what weather! I had a dreadful trip. The conductor was so rude and disagreeable," she complained, before she was out of the automobile that brought her from the station. "Come here, Louise, and take my bag, child. I am so stiff I can hardly move. Well, Kate, how are you, and all the children? Well? That is something to be thankful for, at least."

She was in the house at last, and out of her many wraps, talking all the time.

"How you have grown, child!" to Flossy, who had come to her sister's help with the heavy bag. "How old are you? Fourteen?"

Flossy was fifteen and liked the fact to be known. She frowned a little at the accusation of "youngness," but answered as politely as she could.

"What are you going to do with her, Kate?" Aunt Sarah continued. "She is getting too big for a little school like this."

As the Greenhill school had a high standard, and Flossy was doing remarkably well there, this was a fresh insult, but she still kept quiet, in obedience to a glance from her mother.

Aunt Sarah transferred her attentions to Louise. "You still wear your hair in pigtails, Louise? It takes a quantity of ribbons, and your father is poor—but the vanity of girls—I suppose you think it is becoming!"

Louise controlled her tongue with difficulty. I saw the appealing glance Katie gave her, and marveled to see how her girls obeyed her lightest wish. Fred came in next for criticism.

"Dear me! boys are certainly noisy! Surely you don't allow him to tear about like that, Kate?"

"He doesn't mean any harm, Aunt Sarah. He forgets sometimes. Floss, go and remind him, dear. Gently, now."

"I just wish she'd stay at home! There are no boys there," grumbled Fred, tip-toeing ostentatiously out of the house.

Flossy was cross, Fred indignant, Louise hurt and Katie worried and nervous, all within ten minutes of Aunt Sarah's arrival in the usually cheerful house. What would happen when Aunt Madge came, I wondered.

She arrived later on the same day, after a longer and more trying journey than Aunt Sarah's. I listened for more lamentations. But—

"How nice it is to get here! And how good to see all you dear people again! How you've grown, Lou! Flossy, you are a darling! That suitcase is too heavy for you. Let Fred take it, he is a man. Bless the boy, he's taller than I am, I do believe! Oh, it's nice to be here!" Everybody talked and laughed at once, and the children vied with each other for the honor of carrying in Aunt Madge's things.

The visit went on along the same parallel lines—Aunt Sarah finding faults and "disagreeables" everywhere, and Aunt Madge finding something to like and admire in every one.

"What is the difference?" said Katie to me one day. "Aunt Sarah loves us all, I know, just as well as Aunt Madge does. She is devoted to the children; yet she scarcely ever gives them a word of commendation. They dread her visits, and I am worn to a frazzle trying to keep the peace. Aunt Madge is a sunbeam. They are angels when she is here, and she never sees a fault. What makes the difference?"

"It is the point of view," I answered. "Aunt Sarah is looking out for defects, in hopes of correcting them. Of course, she finds them. And the children feel the mental attitude. It is just the difference between a rasping east wind and a day of balmy sunshine."

"Certainly, Aunt Madge's way is the pleasantest," said Katie, thoughtfully. "The children would like her to live with us—while poor Aunt Sarah, who really loves them, is—well, they are not enthusiastic when they hear she is coming, and their joy when she goes is so great that I can hardly restrain them from showing it too plainly."

"It only shows that we make our own welcome wherever we go," I said, making a mental note of Aunt Madge's methods.

The Talk of the Sanctum

In this Issue

Many of you have started right in with Women's Interests on the opposite page before you read this and liked that so well you are going to read everything in the paper. Good! After this Talk of the Sanctum the Editorial Message about Smiling may make you smile even if you are not a minister. Under that heading, What the Christian World Is Doing, we do not pretend to do more than give a few random glimpses but they are good ones, are they not? Close after our own Editorial pages we make a place for one of our excellent editorial writers who tell about the regions in which they live. This time it is a glimpse of "The City of the Open Shop." Note the dates in the Pilgrim Calendar. The poem that follows brings a happy suggestion of recent vacation days. Mr. Rankin reviews delightfully more of the Pilgrim story. Mrs. Mead gives us a forceful reminder of the perplexing immigration problem. Of course we welcome another of Mr. Parker's Knockabout Papers. Many active minds are represented in that League of Nations symposium, and as many more on other subjects in the book review pages. The Church school and prayer meeting departments remind us of renewed activities in our churches and some very practical suggestions come in the Congregational Circle news. The children will have a good time with Mr. Alden and the story by Miss Savage. We are glad to share Mrs. Firman's reminiscences of International Councils. Dr. Chrystie and Dr. Gardner bring us the spirit as well as the significant facts of the Chautauqua and Northfield conferences. Dr. Stephenson tells us Americans what he thinks of us. Do we approve? Finally, don't miss the Risibles that send you on your way smiling.

What Women Have Done

We would like to publish some short stories—true ones—with names and places—telling what has been accomplished by some of our most successful church women's societies, and explaining just how they did it—whatever it was. Answer this:

What was the best achievement by a church women's society that you know about, and how was it done?

These stories should not be over 500 words long and must reach us before Oct. 1. We offer first, second and third prizes of $5, $3 and $2 for the best ones.

In the Circulation Department—

We have endeavored to follow our readers to their vacation playgrounds, whenever they have requested us to do so, and we hope that the days of leisure and refreshment have opened opportunities for a more intimate acquaintance with us. How many loyal readers, we wonder, feel as this subscriber did who wrote:

When far away from the Whirling Hub,
  An exile on vacation, a list
Of hardships I'll endure—late grub,
Wet days, cold nights, salt baths (no tub);
  But send my Congregationalist!

That's true devotion.

The vacation period is now drawing to a close and we are all returning to our various duties in city and town, with new enthusiasm and hope for the winter's work, and the makers of your paper share in the enthusiasm and confidence that 1921 will be the Best Year yet for The Congregationalist.

How can you help to make it so? By inviting your friends to join the fine family of weekly readers. Why not send us today the name of some acquaintance whom you believe will be interested and we will gladly send him a sample copy?

In order to acquaint the public with the general telephone situation, and some of the reasons for delay in completing new installations—chief among which is the difficulty of getting the numerous kinds of necessary material—we have prepared a series of announcements, of which this is the fourth.

Over Forty-One Thousand Telephone Stations

Have Been Added to Our System Since January 1, 1920

Notwithstanding difficulty in providing equipment we have added to our system so far this year more telephones than there are in the combined cities of Lowell, Lawrence and Lynn.

Even in times when telephone equipment was plentiful and quickly obtainable, and the demands for our service were normal, we would have been proud of such an unusual development. Under present conditions it is by far the biggest job we have ever done. But yet applications are being received faster than we can provide for them; and today we have

Over Twenty-Four Thousand Orders Awaiting Completion

We believe that our first obligation is to protect the existing service. Before we provide for new business we must be sure to properly take care of existing business. To do otherwise would mean a deteriorated and unsatisfactory service for all.

Present indications are that it will be many months before we shall be able to provide for all the new telephone service that is desired. Meanwhile, we will continue to secure all the equipment possible and use the resourcefulness of our engineers to provide substitutes for that which is unobtainable.

We are counting upon the people of New England to recognize that under existing conditions we are doing our best to first protect their existing service and then to provide for additional service as promptly as possible.

The Witness of the Minister's Smile

SAID a young college student, who was thinking of his life work, "I'd never tackle a job, that I couldn't tackle smiling." If he had been able to inspect a composite picture of the ministers of this country, would he have tackled our job?

We take ourselves so very seriously! We are so continually busy with important things. Upon occasions we dress strangely and act more strangely still. We seem to feel that we carry the weight of the universe upon our shoulders and the strain of it appears in our faces. Young people look at us and think that we are mighty and peculiar men, much to be admired but never to be imitated.

We are just now facing a serious shortage of Christian workers. Five hundred pulpits in the Middle West are without pastors. Great new projects are before us calling for recruits for life service. Our various denominations are planning campaigns to enlist helpers and leaders. Teams of powerful speakers will be sent to our various colleges. Stirring appeals will challenge our young people.

Suppose, however, that in college or the home town a student who is considering the call knows a pastor who never smiles. Suppose that pastor is always too busy to romp with little children or attend the ball game on Saturday afternoon. Suppose that never in the history of his pastorate has he been known to whistle, or appear with his coat off in public. The young man will listen to the appeal with its portrayal of the joy of the ministry, its compensations in happy service, its friendly touch with all sorts of people, and turn away with a skeptical smile.

Joy is of the essence of youth. The young people of this country want to tackle jobs with a smile, and they want to feel that they can keep smiling all the way through. One reason that more young people are not in Christian service now is that they see in us that which holds them back. I like to think that when our Master made the first recruits for Christian service, he greeted them and won them with a smile. His was no preoccupied, burdened, hurried, perplexed and troubled countenance as he won men to be his followers and friends.

Said Dan Crawford upon one occasion, "The smile is the coat of arms of the soul." Some young people in the midst of this campaign for life service will be asking us the question that Crawford asked of a group of students several years ago, "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own smile?"

We respectfully submit as part of the campaign for life service, the present witness, not of a pastoral, but of a genuine human smile. L. W. F.

Another International in Boston

OCTOBER will bring to Boston another delegation of men and women from overseas who, like the delegates to the Congregational Council in July, are making the pilgrimage to America in order to signify their appreciation of the Pilgrims who crossed the ocean 300 years ago. This October meeting will be made up of religious liberals from a number of lands. The subjects to be discussed, however, will be of interest to members of all communions. They include such timely themes as these: "Free Churches and Religious Education, Social Betterment and the Task of a Prophetic Era." "The Pilgrim Character and Its Place in Modern Life" will be treated by Dr. F. G. Peabody, and "The Pilgrim Spirit and Its Inspiration for Today" is the theme of Rev. William L. Sullivan, D.D., of New York. There will be a special excursion to Plymouth and a communion service there. Naturally internationalism in its various phases will be at the front. This is to be expected, in view of the fact that among the delegates, besides Englishmen, are Principal H. C. Maitra of Calcutta, Prof. B. D. Jayatilaka of Ceylon, and Miss M. B. Westenholz of Copenhagen.

Church Gains and Losses

THE Home Missions Council has given out the following figures concerning the church membership of the United States. If authentic they are exceedingly suggestive: Thirty-one new denominations were born in ten years and seventeen died. Of all the people in the United States 41,926,854 are church members, an increase of 6,860,000 in ten years, or twenty per cent. There are 227,000 churches, an increase of 15,000. The value of church property is $1,676,000,000, an increase of $420,000,000 in ten years. There are 15,721,815 Roman Catholics. From this number should be deducted fifteen per cent. for infants and children, all of whom are included in the Roman Catholic statistics. Less than one-third of the church members in the United States are Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholic proportion in the total membership was forty and one-half per cent. in 1906, in 1919 it was thirty-seven and one-half per cent. In ten years the Roman Catholics gained ten and three-fifths per cent. while the Protestant churches gained twenty-three and two-fifths per cent. The Baptists gained twenty-six and one-fifth per cent.; the Disciples twenty-four and four-fifths per cent.; the Presbyterians twenty-three and one-fifth per cent.; the Methodists and Episcopalians twenty-three and one-fifth per cent.; the Congregationalists and Lutherans thirteen per cent. The Universalists are losing, having today only 59,000 members. The Unitarians have only 82,000. The percentage of men in nearly all Protestant churches is increasing. It is now forty-three and nine-tenths per cent. The average ministerial salary among the Northern Methodists is $1,223, among the Congregationalists $1,343, Northern Presbyterians $1,474, Episcopalians $1,632 and Unitarians $2,080.

Gasoline Sunday Services

MORE than half a hundred motorists turned out for "Gasoline Sunday Services" at Third Presbyterian Church, Chicago, Aug. 1. The meeting was conducted on Arcade Court, which was closed to traffic. William F. McDermott, business man, had charge of the program. He spoke on the theme, "Religion in Business." This type of service is growing in popularity.

Does Religion Get Its Share?

MUCH has been said by way of criticism of the churches for the great drives that have been on in the last year or two for funds. In contrast with the funds raised for religious purposes we need to be reminded of the spending in other directions. The statistics compiled by Miss Edith Strauss, head of the Women's Activities Division of the Department of Justice in the High Cost of Living Campaign, show the total average expenditure of the people of the United States annually for luxuries to be $8,710,000,000. Taking these as authentic the average family spends $7 a week or $348 a year for luxuries. There is included in the total amount $2,110,000,000 spent by the male population for tobacco. Of this sum $800,000,000 is spent for cigarettes and an equal amount for loose tobacco and snuff and $510,000,000 for cigars. Automobiles are put in this list as luxuries with an annual total expenditure of $2,000,000,000. The total amount spent for candy is $1,000,000,000; for chewing gum $50,000,000; for soft drinks $350,000,000; for perfumes and cosmetics $750,000,000; for furs $300,000,000; for violet soaps $400,000,000 and for pianos, organs and phonographs $250,000,000. It seems that not all of these articles could strictly be classed as luxuries but many of them are. Why not spend more of our money for real religion which is never a luxury but an absolute necessity?

Japanese Evangelism

AMONG the Japanese group of delegates to the International Council Rev. Mr. Kimura, the evangelist, went to Detroit where he conducted, under the management of Rev. Mr. Newell in the Randolph St. City Mission, a twenty-four days' English-speaking mission. He begins an evangelistic campaign in London in the first week of September. Rev. S. Abe of Seattle, also a delegate, stayed for a course of lectures in the Harvard Summer School of Theology. In the near future Messrs. Abe and Kimura, with others, plan a new method of evangelism in Japan, in which a group, consisting of preachers, Bible instructors, and lecturers upon social subjects, together with song leaders, will go from city to city, holding campaigns of two weeks or more. Such a development in evangelistic work will be followed with wide interest among the Congregational family.

To Seek Good Government for Armenia

THE Armenia America Society is gaining a place for itself as a working organization. It was started in July by a group of men in New York for the purpose of uniting in co-operation the many friends of Armenia in order to ascertain the needs of Armenia, to make those needs known in America and to secure the satisfaction of those needs through American assistance. At present the need of justice and freedom is the greatest, aside from the need of relief which is cared for by the Near East Relief; and America is still looked to to help bring righteous government to Armenia. The Organizing Committee is headed by Mr. Walter George Smith, a prominent lawyer of Philadelphia. Mr. Smith is a Roman Catholic and most thoroughly conversant with the problems of Armenia as he was a member of the first Commission sent out with Dr. Barton and others by the Near East Relief. The other members of the committee are Mr. Hamilton Holt, editor of The Independent; Mr. R. J. Caldwell, a noted cotton merchant and chairman of the Mid-European Association; Canon Robert Ellis Jones of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York; Hon. William N. Runyon, ex-Governor of New Jersey; Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, and Dr. Stanley White, of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church. Ernest W. Riggs is acting as secretary.

The society has opened an office at 289 Fourth Avenue, New York, and is enrolling members rapidly. Those wishing to link themselves up with this co-operative effort to secure justice for Armenia should send their applications to the secretary. No membership fee is required, but those contributing $5 or more will be recorded as voting members. The first meeting of the society is called for Oct. 6, in New York, when plans for the year's campaign will be adopted.

Hon. Aneurin Williams, M. P., chairman of the British Armenia Committee, an English organization with the same purpose, called at the office of the Armenia America Society recently and plans were made for the closest co-operation of the two bodies. An international conference of similar organizations was held in Geneva last month and a federation of Armenia Societies is projected, for, as Gladstone put it, "The cause of Armenia is the cause of the world."

Christian Endeavor Pointers

DURING the month of June important Christian Endeavor state conventions were held in Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Texas, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia and Wisconsin. In many of these states all previous records for attendance were broken. Over 1,400 paid registered delegates assembled at Muskogee for the Oklahoma meeting, over 2,000 attended the Ohio convention at Columbus, and more than 3,000 the Texas convention at Dallas. At these various conventions nearly 300 young people made definite decisions to enter the ministry, missionary work in the home or foreign field, or other forms of full-time religious service.

Immediately after the International Congregational Council, Dr. Clark started for a series of conventions held in Philadelphia, New Orleans, Kerrville in the mountains of Texas, and Lawrenceville, Ill. The Pennsylvania convention, which met in Grace Baptist Temple, Dr. Russell Conwell's great church in Philadelphia, filled the church with four thousand delegates, while the All-South Convention in New Orleans brought together in large numbers the Endeavorers of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee and Kentucky.

A most encouraging report has been received from the missionary superintendent of the Ohio Christian Endeavor Union, concerning a Missionary Leaflet Reading Contest which has just closed in that state. There were 1,452 readers of missionary literature, and as a result of the tremendous amount of missionary information which was thus disseminated, 596 young people enlisted in missionary prayer circle leagues, and 250 mission study classes were organized; $35,212.04 was raised for denominational home missions, and $24,353.67 for denominational foreign missions, making a total of $59,565.71 raised as a dierct result of this contest.

All eyes are turning to New York City, where from July 6–11, 1921, what promises to be the greatest Christian Endeavor gathering ever held, is scheduled. As Christian Endeavor will be forty years old on Feb. 2, 1921, the official celebration of this fortieth anniversary will be held in New York City, in addition to which, this gathering will be the twenty-eighth International Christian Endeavor Convention and the sixth World's Christian Endeavor Convention.

Rhondda Williams Coming to America

THE American latchstring still hangs out for English cousins, since those who have already visited our shores this year have not exhausted the welcome extended our kindred from overseas. Another to whom a cordial greeting will be extended soon is Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, pastor of the Union Congregational Church in Brighton, the fashionable seashore resort, who succeeded Rev. R. J. Campbell in that historic pulpit. He is to sail for America on the Mauretania, reaching Boston October 2. He will be available for supplies six Sundays, beginning October 3. He will speak at the Congress of Liberals in Boston, and expects to cover several of the Western states before his return. He is considered one of the ablest and most popular preachers in Great Britain.

The Forum at Winona and Chatauqua

FOR the first time in its history, that conservative religious assembly known as Winona in Indiana has opened its doors to the Forum idea. It rightly conceives that the principle and method may effectively supplement Bible teaching, evangelism, and other standard features of this popular gathering-place in the Middle West. Mr. George W. Coleman of Boston, founder of the Ford Hall movement and president of the Open Forum Association of America, started the ball rolling on the first Sunday in August, and it will continue to be in evidence during every Sunday evening in this month. Chautauqua, too, as last year, extended hospitality to the national gathering of Forum workers, who have consulted together during the last two weeks in August as to the propagation of the idea and the strengthening of the movement. Dr. Chrystie's report on page 293 tells the story briefly.

Continue Chandler School

THE friends of Chandler Normal School, Lexington, Ky., conducted by Principal and Mrs. Frederic F. Werking, and under the auspices of the American Missionary Association, both in the North and in the South, are rejoicing that its work will be continued. The weeks of uncertainty when it seemed that, because of the lack of funds, this would be impossible, have been a heartrending experience for students, parents and alumni as well as for the faculty. This school which has led the way in the training of the head, the hand and the heart of the colored people of the Blue Grass Region for the past fifty-five years is still most emphatically needed.

EDITORIAL

The Political Opportunity of Women

As we write the action of the Tennessee legislature in ratifying the suffrage amendment has already been certified to the Federal Government, and the proclamation that the amendment is in force will follow. The bitter opposition shown in the contest undoubtedly represents a conservatism, common to the Southern legislators, and probably reflects the feelings as well as fears of many people in that section. But we hope and believe that there will be no more legal obstacles which may aim to deprive some millions of American women of the chance to vote for President this year. We are glad to see this release of political energy and this acknowledgement of political rights and we congratulate those who have fought so long for the rights of women on their impending certainty of relief and victory.

Millions of American women under existing state laws will have that duty and privilege of helping to choose the national executive and legislature. And in due course ratifications which are not open to objection or even to cavil will be made. Men and women will stand together, henceforth, in the necessity of weighing not only the character and qualifications of candidates but the tendency and value of governmental policies. In these matters, of such vital significance for the future of our people, the men who already use the ballot are far too ignorant and thoughtless. We make our plea to the women, therefore, to learn and to think, to avoid blind prejudice and the slavish following of party cries or personal likings and to consider carefully, with a judicial mind and a sincere love of that country which is the home of us all, what our government should become. And if the women take their responsibility seriously, perhaps more of the men will learn from them to weigh reasons and choose policies in the true interest of us all.

An Appeal for Unity

We have referred from time to time to the sessions of the Sixth Lambeth Conference of bishops of all the communions affiliated with the Anglican Church, held this summer in London. No reports of the discussions are made and the conference has no legislative authority. In regard to the question which occupied much of its attention, the question of the reunion of the churches, it issued as the conference closed an Appeal to all Christian People which is certain to become a landmark of general discussion and, we hope, of progress in the direction of a better understanding and co-operation between the separated communions of the one church of Christ.

The appeal opens significantly: "We, Archbishops, Bishops Metropolitan and other Bishops of the Holy Catholic Church in full communion with the Church of England." That is beginning at the right point and laying the initial emphasis upon the central fact of a difficult and challenging situation. The Holy Universal Church is already one in its relation to Christ and through him in the relation of its members one to all and all to one. We were received into the Holy Universal Church by baptism and confession. Every other name of association and distinction is subordinate to this. The problem is not one of creation—as if we in this twentieth century of the Universal Church had set ourselves to initiate a new and inclusive Church which would provide for our own generation an entrance into the body of Christ. We believe, we have always believed, with all our hearts, in the Holy Universal Church.

This note once struck in this appeal of the bishops assembled in free conference runs through the whole of it as recognition and as motive. It says: "We believe that God wills fellowship. By God's own act this fellowship was made in and through Jesus Christ, and its life is in his Spirit. We believe that it is God's purpose to manifest this fellowship, so far as this world is concerned, in an outward, visible and united society, holding one faith, having its own recognized officers, using God-given means of grace, and inspiring all its members to the world-wide service of the Kingdom of God. This is what we mean by the Catholic Church."

But "this united fellowship is not visible in the world today." There are great separated communions, episcopal and non-episcopal. Of the latter the appeal says that they stand for, "rich elements of truth, liberty and life, which might otherwise have been obscured or neglected. With these we are closely linked by many affinities—racial, historical and spiritual. We cherish the hope that all these communions, and our own, may be led by the Spirit into the unity of the faith and of knowledge of the Son of God." But the appeal frankly recognizes the historical and actual separation and isolation.

This, it must be remembered, is an appeal and not a definite suggestion of negotiation or legislation. It is founded upon a vision of what the united and universal church might accomplish in times which "call us to a new outlook and new measures. The vision which rises before us is that of a Church genuinely Catholic, loyal to all Truth, and gathering into its fellowship all 'who profess and call themselves Christians' within whose visible unity all the treasures of faith and order, bequeathed as a heritage by the past to the present, shall be possessed in common, and made serviceable to the whole body of Christ. Within this unity Christian communions now separated from one another would retain much that has long been distinctive in their methods of worship and service. It is through a rich diversity of life and devotion that the unity of the whole fellowship will be fulfilled." To make progress toward the goal of such a vision means "an adventure of good will and still more of faith, for nothing less is required than a new discovery of the creative resources of God."

After a carefully worded and from the point of view of their own responsibilities generous defense of the episcopal order as a symbol and means of unity, the appeal goes on to assert that the "available approach to union is by way of mutual deference to one another's conscience," involving an exchange of commissions for service, Episcopal ministers accepting authority to serve, for example, in the Russian or Scotch or American non-episcopal churches. And there is a tender of Episcopal ordination, the terms of union being agreed upon, in order that ministers non-episcopally ordained may obtain "a ministry throughout the whole fellowship." And the appeal adds: "In so acting no one of us could possibly be taken to repudiate his past ministry. God forbid that any man should repudiate a past experience rich in spiritual blessings for himself and others. Nor would any of us be dishonoring the Holy Spirit of God, whose call led us all to our several ministries, and whose power enabled us to perform them."

The spirit of this appeal must commend it to thoughtful and prayerful consideration among all Christian people. It is not, like the famous Lambeth Quadrilateral, a statement of conditions without which unity is impossible. In its breadth of vision it includes the ancient communions of the East as well as the separate communions and churches of Great Britain and America. It sets before us the vision of a universal Church which is the body of Christ, not now manifest, but to be manifested by an adventure with Christ himself and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in recognition and brotherhood. It may become a step toward that ultimate attainment of federated unity which is the dream and desire of all true followers of Christ. We must be careful, therefore, lest any contemptuous or narrow word should prove a hindance. We who have always believed in the Universal Church, in which each is united to Christ and through Christ each to all, must watch this new adventure in fellowship with sympathy and warm desire to aid.

Improving the Holy Land

A program for extensive improvements in Palestine has been announced by Sir Herbert Samuel, the British Commissioner under the mandate. Banks will be established to provide credit for agricultural improvements. Railroads will be changed to standard gauge and extended. Roads will be built or improved and a telegraph and telephone system provided, together with provision of electric power throughout the country. A harbor will be started at Haifa. Swamps will be drained and forests planted. Sacred buildings and sites will be carefully guarded, but the city extensions at Jerusalem and elsewhere will be made under government planning and supervision.

The greatest assets for the commercial future of the land are its stretches of lands suitable for farming and fruit growing and the River Jordan with its abrupt descent into the deepest valley on the surface of the earth. Palestine oranges have been called the best in the world, and a very wide range of temperate and sub-tropical plants can be grown wherever water is available. The problem of the utilization of the Jordan and its valley affords scope for original and promising measures of industrial power. We some time since called attention to the plan for a canal passing at sea level under Jerusalem, to fall into the deep valley of the Dead Sea, thus affording electric power. As the Mediterranean is very much less salt than the Dead Sea, the coming in of sea water would freshen the Dead Sea waters. The upper course of the Jordan would also be available for irrigation and for power. The chief difficulty on this side is that of financing these ambitious but perfectly practical and necessary measures of internal improvement.

The most important and difficult question which confronts the new government is that of immigration. If Palestine were to be overrun by a crowd of city Jews from Eastern Europe—men who have no private means and no experience of self-support except in petty city trades, there would be trouble not only in supporting them until they learned to make their own way, but also with the present inhabitants, who are Moslem or Christian by a great majority and bitterly opposed to such a Jewish irruption. The government announces that only a limited immigration, proportioned to the housing accommodations, will be permitted, and that in seeking lands for their settlement no injustice will be done to the present cultivators, graziers or owners. Under such a system the gradual bringing in of a Jewish population would be safe and the land would prosper by their coming. But such a plan, we fear, would be a serious disappointment to impatient idealists among the Zionist ranks who have neither considered the rights of the present owners of the soil nor the dangers of incompetent haste in change.

A Parable of a Long Walk

The daughter of the daughter of Keturah hath a little friend who cometh to see her, and playeth with her in the Yard, hard by the Window, where their voices may be heard inside the House. And mostly they play very Happily; but now and then for the sake of Variety they indulge in Argument and Comparison like grown Folk. And it was upon a day that they got thus into a Friendly Scrap, the first part of which I heard not. But the Argument had reached a stage where the daughter of the daughter of Keturah was advancing and backing the other little damsel off the Map, and the other little girl could only answer, I did not, or You can not, or It is not.

And the daughter of the daughter of Keturah said,

I can walk Fifty-nine miles.

And the other little girl said, You can not.

And the daughter of the daughter of Keturah said, I can take my Grandpa's hand and keep up with him, and he can walk Fifty-nine miles, and I can walk Fifty-nine miles with him if I hold his hand.

And the other little damsel said, You can not.

Then did the daughter of the daughter of Keturah tell unto the other little girl how great and good a Grandpa she had. And I am too modest a man to write down what she said; but if George Washington and Solomon and a few others were to live in one, peradventure he might be a Second-cousin or a Remote Acquaintance of a man such as the daughter of the daughter of Keturah described.

And the other little girl was speechless; for she could not say, Thy grandpa is not the only Pebble on the Beach; I also have a Grandpa whose hair is fully as Grey and whose Bald Spot is larger than thy Grandpa's; for the daughter of the daughter of Keturah had carried the matter beyond all comparison. And the other little girl could only change the subject, and say,

I can kick your whole house down and all your trees.

And the daughter of the daughter of Keturah, knowing that she had won out, said sweetly,

Go ahead.

Now there is no man who knoweth so well as I how far from right is the estimate of the little maiden concerning the goodness and the greatness of her Grandpa. Nevertheless it pleased me more than any man can understand who is not a Grandpa; for unto none others hath the Lord given wisdom to know of such matters. And the next time a man goeth by and bloweth a small whistle, she shall have a Red Balloon.

For apart from her beautiful delusion concerning the poor man concerning whom I pray my God that she may be never undeceived, the little maiden is not wholly wrong. For when she holdeth my hand she can do things which otherwise she could not do.

And I prayed unto my God a prayer, and I said,

O my God, Thou hast permitted us through the gift of little lives such as these to discern spiritual truths which thou hast hid from the wise and prudent and revealed unto babes, that so we might enter into the Kingdom of Heaven as little children. Grant unto me this, O my Father, that I shall hold so fast to Thine Hand that the journey that would otherwise be impossible shall be possible for me, and the task that would have been too great may be accomplished through thy strength. For I can do all things through Him that strengtheneth me; and if I hold Thy Hand I can run and not be weary, and walk and not faint.

In Brief

In our celebrations of the Pilgrims and their covenant we must not forget that they were anticipated in forms of self-government on this side of the Atlantic both by Virginia and by Bermuda, which has just been celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of the opening of its parliament.

A Swedish artist of world-wide fame, Anders Leonard Zorn, has just died. He was court painter and his portraits record the faces of many royal personages. To the world at large he was best known by strongly individual etchings, the most vital of which was his portrait of the famous French author, Renan.

Boston is always making history, but is not at all proud of its contribution to the education of the people in finance with Mr. Ponzi and the police as schoolmasters. It is hard to convince some people that two and two make four, and not five, and that he who pays them more than is right must be cheating somebody else.

It is a relief to know that the eighteen Americans who were besieged in Adana have been released by a victory of the French garrison of the town in a sortie against the besieging Turkish forces. The story of the missionaries and relief agents in these Cilician towns will be worth reading in the securer days for which we hope.

Even the Salvation Army in England has hitched its wagon on to the Pilgrim Memorial star. It is to lay the corner-stone, Sept. 6, a block of granite brought from Plymouth, Mass., for a hall which it is building on the Barbican in Plymouth, England, opposite the spot where the Pilgrims embarked three hundred years ago in the Mayflower.

We print elsewhere the Tercentenary Proclamation of the President, in which he suggests and requests celebration throughout the United States. For federal members of the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission he at the same time appointed former Governor Samuel McCall and Richard Hooker, of Massachusetts, and George Foster Peabody, of New York. Mr. Hooker and Governor McCall were both born in Georgia and Mr. Peabody in Pennsylvania. Mr. McCall is a Protestant Episcopalian and Mr. Hooker a Unitarian. He is the manager of the Springfield Republican.

The death of a baseball player, hit by a thrown ball, has been a sad incident of the week. The pitcher, it is generally agreed, was not to blame, it is one of the risks—the quite unusual risks of a game which has become a profession. But we see it is now proposed to equip players with steel helmets, as if they were going into battle. That makes the game seem too strenuous and tends to put it in the class with bear-baiting and bull fights. But the thousands who go to watch, and sometimes throw bottles at the umpire when they are not pleased with his decisions, would hardly consent to have it less like a battle we suppose.

The City of the Open Shop

Los Angeles, the City of the Angels, has economically this likeness to the Holy City, as described by St. John, the Revelator—three gates wide open on each of its four sides, both day and night. Picketing has been enjoined, boycotting fails, the sympathetic strike collapses, and Los Angeles remains as heretofore, the city of the "Open Shop," in distinction from San Francisco, the city of the "Closed Shop."

As westward the star of empire makes its way, so came the influenza epidemic in the autumn of 1918 from the East and a year later the strike fever traveling westward attacked the body politic. The "Pacific Fleet" had just arrived from the Atlantic Coast at San Pedro, the port of Los Angeles, with booming of cannon, blare of trumpets and waving of flags—augury of international peace, marking the doom of secret treaties and sudden blows in the dark! Then, having prepared in secret, at the "psychological moment," the motormen and conductors of the city street cars, yellow and red, struck synchronously early on Saturday morning to the confusion of the sailor men. And the battle between the corporations and the labor unions was on. The war, with its Shermanic definition, had shifted from Flanders and Picardy, from the high seas and the treacherous shoals, to the beautiful homeland.

The cars ran fairly well through the day, but stopped at the first appearance of the evening shadows, and while the sun was still setting in the golden west. The sailors stayed on ship or in port and sang, "I love you, California," and "Sweet Adeline," with whom, however, they were stopped from dancing seriatim or otherwise on the waxen streets. The brilliant illuminations persistently twinkled their "Welcome, Heroes," however, because the electricians had not gone into a sympathetic strike. All the automobiles, even of the Noachic period, jitneys, trucks, barges, and carryalls, were called into use, and everybody rode except the poor shop girls and the toilers and fellow laborers of the striking carmen, who could not afford an automobile. The corporations made money by crowding the cars inside, outside, and on top, and eliminating night service. The poorest and neediest suffered most inconvenience and special hardship befell the "laboring classes."

And, then, suddenly, a week after, the switchmen on the railroads, in spite of the agreement of the "Railroad Brotherhood" with the United States Government, struck in sympathy with their comrades of the Pacific Electric Railway. For a week, Los Angeles was isolated from the rest of the world by trains; passengers were marooned in desert and mountain, cattle starved in the cars, food and vegetables rotted by the train-load. At the end of the week's sympathetic strike, the railroad men returned to their places at the behest of their own Trades' Union officials, but irreparable damage had been done.

The Labor Unions have lost prestige in Southern California, and Los Angeles in particular has declared itself for the Open Shop. Just as the employer, individually and collectively, has sought by invention and otherwise to gain a monoply, so the Closed Shop seeks to become a monopoly, and thus attain a favored position for the employees.

The strife is now over other things than wages and hours. Measures are urged which would reduce the products of industry and impair the workman in his moral, mental and bodily fiber. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," is a timely injunction to all workmen.

Increased tendency appears to give publicity to the causes of the industrial strife. The fundamental principle of the Canadian method is publicity for the cause of the conflict, not arbitration. In arbitration, both parties raise their demands, and the decision satisfies neither party. Publicity brings public opinion to bear on the controversy. In the United States, heretofore, neither employer nor employee liked the Canadian law, because neither wishes to abandon the sudden blow in the dark. Publicity, however, is a good remedy for public and private wrongs.

Especially hopeful signs appear in the growing appeal of both parties in the industrial conflict to the Public, and in the introduction of the ethical element. Mazzini, the Italian reformer and patriot, declared: "Every social question is a moral question, and every moral question is a religious question." The doctrine of "economic determinism" has gone to the scrap heap with that of the "iron law of wages." The labor question is a social question, not a "bread and butter" nor a "stomach" problem. Indeed, the social question is a religious question and all religious men and influences should co-operate. The universal solvent for the social and economic problem is love and good will. "The completest spirituality is the completest sociality." The remedy for the present sad state of affairs must be a radical one. The only remedy after all for the inordinate lust of wealth, the transformation of men into mere "hands," the exploitation of the unskilled and ignorant by the selfish and designing, is first to seek the Kingdom of God and His Righteousness. The worship of God alone can overthrow the worship of gold. G. F. K.

Object for Intercession

For Those Who Suffer for the Sins of Others:

We thank thee, Lord, for all opportunities of sympathy and helpfulness, even though the cost to us is great. Teach us to remember Christ who suffered for our transgressions when the sins of others hurt and mar our lives. Give us a little of the patience thou hast shown toward us and all men. Teach us a larger sense of the life that reaches far beyond this life we know, that we may not be too impatient with our troubles and perplexities, or too intent upon a present satisfaction. And make us one in thought and expectation with our Lord who loved us and gave himself for us, that there may be a light on all our days.—R.

Our Own Opportunity of Brotherhood. There are those who do not want our help or company. We may well let them alone until they do. But if we keep company with Christ we shall find that he provides us opportunities of helping others. It is what he lives for, and it is our highest form of living if in this respect we desire and seek to be like him.

AN ORCHARD BY A MEADOW

By Emma P. Seabury

There's an orchard by a meadow, which is sweet, and passing fair,
And decks itself in beauty, when the spring is walking there,
Such a fluff of foamy blossoms, such plumes of pinky sprays,
Such a spring to soft green turfing in the lapses of the days,
Such a dream of life awakened, such a presaging fruit sense,
And the playhouse in the willow, just above the orchard fence,
And a kind of dewy fragrance thrills the subtle golden air,
And the blooming boughs are holy, for love is nesting there.

There's an orchard by a meadow, where the brook goes lilting by,
'Neath the great, round, splendid maples, perfect spheres up in the sky,
Where the grasses, lush and tender, with the impulse of the light
Seem to shoot up in the showers, grow by magic, in the night:
And the humming birds go droning, and the bees buzz ever near,
And the robins' "Cheer-up" message, falls like music on the ear:
Spring and Love have song and rapture, and the days are passing fair,
Oh, the orchard by the meadow, how I wish that I were there.

The World the Pilgrim Fathers Knew

IX. What the Pilgrims Learned about New England

By Isaac Ogden Rankin

One of the odd things about the historical background of the Pilgrims is that there was a New England—or New Albion—in America before the New England which they knew was named. That honor, subsequently long forgotten, belongs to California. Francis Drake visited it in 1577, more than ten years before Governor Bradford was born and when Elder Brewster was a lad somewhere about twelve years old at Scrooby. Drake had come through the Strait of Magellan. He had swept the ports of South and Central America clean of Spanish ships and treasure. Then he sailed north to get beyond the Spaniards' reach while he assorted his loot and put his ships in order for the voyage to the spice islands on the other side of the Pacific. He rested in some unidentified California harbor where the cliffs showed white and named the whole country New Albion.

All England rang with Drake's exploit of sailing round the world, an adventure which brought him knighthood from Queen Elizabeth, though she was stingy with such honors, and made him a leading captain in that amazing fight with the Invincible Armada just before the time of Bradford's birth. But California did not lie within the range of possible settlement for the Pilgrim Church. In the first place Drake and his company had heard nothing of California's gold, which, if known at that time, would have made it Spanish, and almost two centuries and three-quarters later did make it American. The man who told the story of Drake's voyage spoke of it merely as a good place to careen and clean ships and to take on water with friendly people on shore. And the way thither lay through the Spanish-controlled waters about South America. The Pilgrims wished a settlement, not fighting. A road that ran by Spanish forts and harbors was not for their choosing.

Virginia

Why not, then, go to Virginia?

For Virginia the answer was different, but just as conclusive. They might about as well take up lands in Ireland, which was just at that time under settlement, by the English in the South and the Scotch in Ulster. They might as well go back to Scrooby and London again.

In Bradford's report the argument against Virginia is given thus: "On ye other hand, for Virginia it was objected, that if they lived among ye English which wear ther planted, or so near them as to be under their government, they should be in as great danger to be troubled and persecuted for the cause of religion, as if they lived in England, and it might be worse. And if they lived too farr off, they should neither have succour nor defence from them."

The story of Virginia lies mainly outside the range of this relation. It antedated the Pilgrim settlement by thirteen years. It was from the beginning a purely commercial enterprise, rather badly managed and with a wide variety of character and social origins among the settlers, many of whom had an unusual talent for quarreling. They were fortunate in the climate and the fertility of the soil, and they developed leaders of mark. But they were unfortunate in the previous occupation of the land by strong tribes of Indians, who more than once threatened the infant colony with extinction. They were tided over at first by the stern rule and diplomatic skill of Captain John Smith. Commercially tobacco was their wealth and their salvation, but it brought in its train, as we have seen, the curse of African slavery. On the American side the Pilgrims owed to Virginia the exploring voyage and consequent map of the coast line made by Captain John Smith, which was in the hands of the skipper of the Mayflower and almost certainly also in the hands of Carver, Brewster, Bradford, Winslow, Fuller and the other Pilgrim leaders in their consultations in Leyden over a place of settlement.

In England the Virginia Company was at once their hope and their stumbling block. They had to deal with men who were thinking first, last and all the time between of profits. For them the American voyage was one vast lottery. The Pilgrims had to satisfy not only the King, who had driven them out of England, but also the Virginia company, who were thinking of tobacco and beaver skins and clapboards and sassafras. And they had to accept a hard-driven bargain because they themselves had little money and were bound first to safeguard the freedom of their church life.

New England Named

We owe the name of New England to Captain John Smith and his desire of interesting and flattering Prince Charles, through whom Smith won that title of Admirall of New England, which appears upon the portrait which accompanies his map. Giving names was left almost entirely to the Prince. Cape Cod is Cape James, Cape Ann is Cape Anna, in honor of the King and Queen, his father and his mother. Cape Cod Bay is Stuards Bay. The River Charles, which shows huge upon the map, as quite the greatest river of New England, is the River Charles. And beside it, about where Quincy stands, is Charlton. London was near Weymouth and Oxford, about where Marshfield is. These names were not chosen by Smith, but by Prince Charles himself, to whom the map was submitted before publication.

But Smith was not the first who had sailed along the New England coast, and not all the names on Smith's map have stuck. Among those that have remained, curiously enough, was the name of Plimouth, or New Plimouth, for the bay where the Pilgrims landed. For this name is older than the Mayflower, older even than Smith's voyage of exploration up the coast.

Verrazano and His Voyage

The first printed record we have of an exploration up the Atlantic coast of North America goes back of the Mayflower voyage almost a hundred years. It was made by Giovanni da Verrazano, an Italian navigator in the service of France. He carried a crew of fifty men, "having provisions sufficient for eight months." After about fifty days at sea (the Mayflower took ninety, you remember), in the middle of which, "we encountered as violent a hurricane as any ship ever weathered, from which we escaped unhurt by the divine assistance and goodness, to the praise of the glorious and fortunate name of our good ship . . . we reached a new country, which had never been seen by any one either in ancient or modern times." This landfall was somewhere in the neighborhood of Cape Fear, in what is now North Carolina.

Verrazano's arrival was in March. The question of whether the new land was inhabited was settled at once by the sight of great fires near the coast. Perhaps the Indians were burning the underbrush, a habit which helps to explain the common wonder of these early explorers, down to and including the Pilgrim exploring parties on Cape Cod, that the woods were so open and easily penetrated. From Cape Fear they turned south for a little, and then, finding no good harbor, turned north again and sailed as far as Nova Scotia. Verrazano kept well out from the shore and missed most of the bays, but he landed now and then to make acquaintance with the Indians.

SEEKING THE INDIES

Verrazano's expedition was intent, like all these early explorations, on a short cut to Cathay, and Verrazano was himself convinced, and also persuaded Hakluyt, the English clergyman who collected and printed the story of famous voyages, that North America was split in two about the region of Delaware Bay. Nobody, then, or even in the Pilgrim time, guessed how wide North America was or that from New England to Drake's New Albion was about as far as from Plymouth in England to Plymouth in New England. But the notion of the sea of Verrazano, splitting the North American continent and giving an easy sea-road to China and India was more or less in the minds of adventurers for half a century and led directly up to Hudson's exploration of the Hudson. Verrazano himself believed that he had come upon a part of the Eastern Asiatic shore or one of its outlying islands.

Here is his picture of the country at the South: "As the Orient stretches around this country, I think it cannot be devoid of the same medicinal and aromatic drugs, and various riches of gold and the like, as is denoted by the color of the ground." The yellow sands, you see, had all the glamour of gold to the awakened expectation, just as much later shiploads of worthless iron pyrites were brought home to England. "It abounds also in animals, as deer, stags, hares, and many other similar, and with a great variety of birds for every kind of pleasant and delightful sport. It is plentifully supplied with lakes and ponds of running water . . . the air is salubrious, pure and temperate, and free from the extremes of both heat and cold. There are no violent winds in these regions. . . ."

Verrazano's men made a beginning of that wicked kidnapping which played so large a part in the dislike of the American Indians for their European visitors. For most of the people they met were entirely friendly. The people of one village hid themselves in the woods, but they discovered an old woman and a girl, with a little boy, hiding in the long grass. They stole the boy "To carry with us to France, and would have taken the girl also, who was very beautiful and very tall, but it was impossible because of the loud shrieks she uttered as we attempted to lead her away; having to pass some woods, and being far from the ship, we determined to leave her and take the boy only." They wanted to exhibit them, just as one would take home monkeys from the Amazon or some curious shell which he had found upon the beach. There is an interesting reminder of this cruel practice in Shakespeare's Tempest, where Trinculo discovers Caliban: "A strange fish! Were I in England now, as once I was, . . . there would this monster make a man; any strange beast there makes a man. When they will not give a doit to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out ten to see a dead Indian." The Pilgrims owed to it the company and instruction in the ways of the New World of Squanto, who had been kidnapped by a Captain Hall, sold in Spain, somehow brought to England and returned to America in some vessel of the fishing fleets that every year made their headquarters at the Island of Monhegan long before the Pilgrim time.

THE NEW ENGLAND SHORE

Verrazano's kidnapping of the Indian boy was somewhere in Delaware or New Jersey. He tells of the barren stretches where, "In the whole country for the space of two hundred leagues, which we visited, we saw no stone of any sort." The Indians of this region made their boats of logs hollowed out by fire. It is at Plymouth, curiously enough, that in the tales of these old voyages we first hear of that characteristically American invention, the birch bark canoe. The visitors were struck by the care which the Indians took of the grape vines in the woods and found the grapes "very sweet and pleasant and not unlike our own." The Indians even cut away the undergrowth to give the grapes a better chance to ripen. Was it homesickness, or the touch of an innate love of beauty which made the Italian seaman add: "We found also wild roses, violets, lilies and many sorts of plants and fragrant flowers different from our own."

VERRAZANO IN NEW ENGLAND

Verrazano put in to New York Bay. He made friends with the Indians of Newport Harbor, but though these "Came every day to see our ship" they refused that privilege and risk to their wives, "Of whom they were very careful; for although they came on board themselves, and remained a long while, they made their wives stay in the boats, nor could we ever get them on board by any entreaties or any presents we could make them." Verrazano found Cape Cod rather bleak and savage, with "Thick woods of fir trees, cypresses and the like," and the people so rude and barbarous that he could not get into communication with them. He reached the conclusion that the inhabitants of Maine "have no religious belief whatever, but live in this respect entirely free."

I have given space to Verrazano because, though the truth of his story is doubted by some writers, it seems to me probably a true picture by an eye witness of conditions on the Atlantic coast of America nearly a hundred years before the Pilgrims sailed, and because his letter to King Francis, printed in Venice in 1556 and done into English by Hakluyt, appeared in his volume of "Divers Voyages," which was printed in 1582. It was certainly in the hands of the Pilgrim leaders, and its descriptions of the Carolinas may have helped to console them for their refusal of Raleigh's paradise in Guiana. It may help to explain also why they were so loath to plant their colony north of Cape Cod.

The tenth article in this series will be Dutch and French Adventures of which the Pilgrims Knew.

America's Immigration Problem

By Lucia Ames Mead

The Interracial Conference which met in New York on April 7 prefaced its meetings with the following published statements: "Due to the cessation of immigration during the war, the mills, mines and railroads are short 3,000,000. At least, 1,000,000 foreign-born workers now employed in them are preparing to return to Europe. With 110,000,000, America is producing only enough for 60,000,000, the chief cause being lack of unskilled labor. America must have a national immigration policy. Now we have nothing but laws relating to admission and restriction. Any national policy should involve the question of selection, distribution and assimilation."

The problem is acute. The most delicate feature of it all is the Oriental immigration. Need of labor in California has led to a demand from some of its citizens for the introduction of Chinese coolie contract-labor by the hundred thousand, which would produce a situation akin to that under Negro slave labor. The new California Oriental Exclusion Society purposes to refuse all equality of treatment to Orientals. Its program is 1. Cancellation of the Gentlemen's Agreement of 1907 by which Japan refused passports to practically all new emigrants of the laboring class. 2. Rigorous exclusion of Japanese immigrants. Confirmation and legalization of the policy that Asiatics shall be forever barred from American citizenship. 3. Amendment to the Constitution which would deprive of citizenship any child born here of Orientals.

The advocates of these drastic measures announce that "able writers will cover the subject in all the large magazines, moving pictures will be shown throughout the country; speakers and literature will present the problem before national conventions." The sentiment of California is divided, the more thoughtful repudiating these views. Senator Phelan, who is running for re-election, and an editor of a Sacramento paper, are the chief agitators. They claim that California is not able to cope with the enormous Japanese birthrate which far outnumbers the whites. They do not disparage Japanese ability and they give due credit for Japanese industry, cleanliness, soberness and law-abiding qualities. But they say, "the combination of all these qualities makes an economic machine against which it is hopeless for the white race to cope!" The feeble white man on his own ground, with a state population of 3,200,000 is aghast before the marvelous powers of the 73,000 Japanese within the state, 25,000 of whom are children!

The principles involved far outweigh local interests in importance and have much to do with the true development of democracy and the maintenance of peaceful and co-operative relations with Asia. The tribal Indians of Oklahoma seem more remote ethnologically and traditionally than are Japanese fruit growers who own automobiles and annually pay $16,000,000 in rentals to California landlords. Yet these Indians intermarry with whites, send their children to the white man's college and suffer no social disabilities. Logic is not always employed in these fine distinctions.

Recognizing that the influx of more than can be assimilated of any one race would be deplorable and that local prejudices must be considered, another organization, the National Committee for Constructive Immigration Legislation, with headquarters at 105 East 22d St., New York City, is seeking a solution that shall deal with the whole problem in broad and permanent fashion. It maintains that Oriental Immigration must be settled essentially on the same basis as other immigration, unless deep resentment and international complications are to ensue. We hope to enter a League of Nations even yet. Such a program as that offered by the National Committee for Constructive Immigration Legislation would materially aid us in being a welcome and useful member of a League which includes China and Japan.

The program is concrete and comprehensive and briefly stated as follows:

1. Justice and good will must be considered as well as economic and political considerations.
2. Restriction should be limited to our powers of assimilation.
3. Further immigration should be proportioned to the already Americanized citizens of foreign origin.
4. American standards of living to be protected.
5. No more immigrants to be admitted than we can steadily employ.
6. There must be provision for the care, education and distribution of aliens and for their transformation into American citizens.
7. There must be much higher standards for naturalization.
8. Regardless of race, all to become qualified for citizenship under careful regulations as to numbers and qualifications.

No definite percentage is now proposed, but not over 3 to 10 per cent. would be the permissible annual immigration for any given nation, based on the number of American-born children before 1920, plus the number of naturalized citizens of that particular nation. The prime consideration is our power to incorporate the new element. A competent Immigration Board (See Bill H. R. 14,196) is proposed to deal with the ever-changing problems of immigration with power to adjust regulations according to economic, industrial and human needs. This Board would be permitted to set different percentage rates for different peoples and to vary these from time to time according to demands for labor. Such a Board should be as divorced from partisanship as if it were a fire protection system. It would consider the needs and conditions of all concerned and not leave to accident and guess-work the delicate readjustments of forlorn strangers to new environments, which readjustments so often end in needless tragedy.

Such a Board would help stabilize business by guiding labor where it is most needed and not congesting still further localities nearest the port of debarkation. It would raise the standard of naturalization so as to require, not only reading English, but some knowledge of American history and governmental processes. It would prevent large influx of people of whose type there are too few already Americanized and who could not help in the task of assimilating the newcomers. Foreigners naturally verge toward those of their own race and tongue. The more of these who are already Americanized, the more will be those who can safely be entrusted to their guidance.

At present, Africans can secure citizenship here and many Europeans who are non-Caucasians, as well as Turks and Persians. The newly proposed legislation would prevent putting the ablest nation in Asia in a class by itself as if it were considered inferior to all others. Such legislation as is proposed would probably restore the features of that treaty with China which was set aside by the decision of the Supreme Court because later legislation went contrary to its provision that "Chinese in the United States shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nations." Dr. Dernburg has justified the breaking of the Belgian treaty of neutrality by Germany as being on a par with our breaking our treaty with China, and he cited this decision. The proposed Board would consist ex-officio of the Secretaries of State, Labor, Commerce, Agriculture and Interior and a sixth appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

This plan is objected to by some as excluding many who for their own sake most need this land of refuge. The wretched victims of war and famine from Southwest Europe and Asia Minor would be largely excluded as they have fewer of their race here to help assimilate them than have the citizens from Western Europe. The problem is most difficult and any solution may be a choice of evils. But that a permanent Board should be appointed and the whole problem considered in many new aspects is deemed imperative. If the Board should grant to each people the maximum rate of 10 per cent. of the American-born children plus the naturalized American citizens of that people in 1921, the permissible immigration from Northwest Europe would be 1,800,000 and from South, Central and East Europe about 500,000.

A Knockabout Paper—No. 5

By George Lawrence Parker

I had a hard time that night "knockabouting." For I had to go from a town in the extreme end of Maryland to one in the other extreme of West Virginia. And all of the U. S. A. Railroad men said, "Sir, you cannot do it."

But I did it. For blessed be the name of Henry Ford, whose car and a driver took me forty miles over unspeakable roads until at the eerie hour of two in the morning I caught the train that got me to my audience for the next evening.

As I rode those forty memorable miles, in rain and storm, the spires of country churches loomed in the darkness over sleeping folk and villages. And I said to myself as I Paul Revered onward, "How can the people ever get to church with the roads like miles and miles of LePage's glue? The parson can get there, and old Miss Neverabsent, two doors away, can get there. But what about the laymen, farmers, boys and girls a few miles back in the country. Roads should surely be built for them to come to church as well as the parson and dear Miss Neverabsent."

Lord Leverhulme has recently said that he would rather be a builder of roads than rule an empire. America is a land of many small towns and villages. We have not all yet moved into New York and Boston and the suburbs. Unless these small towns and villages have good roads they can't be good people. Mark it well! Unless they can have roads for sociable and democratic life they can't have good democracy! Mark that well too! Good musicians can't come through LePage's glue to cheer their souls, so the cheap and poor musicians often come. Good actors can't come to lift up their eyes to life's mirrored realities, so the degrading movie comes. We are almost deliberately trying to improve our national morals while keeping from the people the one thing that would make fellowship and real democracy possible. Most of these farmers and stalwart folk have cars, Fords, Cadillacs or Whatnots. But they are useless, much of the year, without good roads. Good lectures, music, church, social improvement, are simply and literally stuck in the mud. We cannot build citizens nor Christians—they are the same, really—if we deliberately choose to build large navies and armies while we use mud for our chief character material. The church ought to lead in the good roads movement.

And in a deeper sense the church is a roadmaker. I reminded myself of it that night in the wind and rain as never before, thanks to Henry Ford and his bumps. She must point the way through the untraveled wilderness of social inequality. Some one of her men must blaze the trail between capital and labor. The swamp of human suffering must be bridged over or a road made through it even if we can't abolish it. And through the great forests of human thought, frightening yet magnificent, the church must send the torch of the light of Christ. All other lights have failed, and the old roads are all overgrown and worn out.

It is not the creeds of the church that will remake these roads. It is her Master Workman and his followers in personality and power. Not her theologies but her human hands. Not her Doctors of Divinity but her Saints in Homespun who lift the hammers, who count up the ledgers, who stand behind the counters and the cradles of the race. These are His Roadmakers.

Let the Pilgrims of today make roads like those of 1620. Let us prepare a highway for our God by making good roads for his people. And until we do that in all sincerity let us not say that the church is ready for an epitaph. Let us rather now say that she is to receive her new baptismal sign, a Road with an Eternal Home and Hearthfire for weary pilgrims when they come home.

But this is not a sermon. I remind myself that here endeth "Knockabout, the Fifth."

The League of Nations Issue

Opinions from Our Readers

From scores of letters that have come to us during the last few weeks regarding the action taken by the American delegates of the International Congregational Council in July in behalf of the League of Nations, and our own editorial position on the League, we have taken the following. We regret that the limitations of space prevent more extended quotations.—Editorial Note.

In company with a good many other thoughtful persons, I have always believed that it was a great mistake to attempt to combine the Treaty of Peace with the League of Nations Covenant. I hold to the opinion that the Treaty of Peace should have been concluded before the other matter was taken up, and that it should have been such a Treaty as the representatives of the United States could sign at once. Then a world of trouble would have been saved. I know that a great many church people, and Congregationalists, share this view.

Minnie M. S. Breckinridge.
(Mrs. H. W.)
Providence, R. I.

I do not approve of the action of the Council because the matter was not before the Council and it should have attended to its own business. I do not approve of these unanimous votes which religious bodies are continually taking on matters which do not come before them for decision.

R. R. Kendall.
Dover, Mass.

I heartily approve of your position in favor of the League of Nations. It certainly is the Supreme Issue, as you call it, and I am going to do all I can to get our country into it.

A. W. Wilcox.
Lawrence, Kan.

I dissent from the action of the International Council assembled at Boston a few weeks ago, and would advocate a new League of Nations, or a World's International Court, one born in the atmosphere of sincere Christian prayer, and composed of men who are more desirous of being guided by the spirit of Jehovah than by selfish motives, men who like our Pilgrim fathers, who, as Dr. Hills has said, came to the historic shores of New England to seek God and his ways rather than to seek gold and personal profit.

W. E. Griffith.
Minneapolis, Minn.

I want to thank you for the editorial, Aug. 5, The Supreme Issue. I do not know the writer, but it is so strong, so sane, so reasonable, so full of faith and so free from any word or suggestion of partisan contention, that it carries the kind of conviction that one feels when reading the Bible. It seems to me that it carries such an appreciation of the situation as Jesus felt when he beheld Jerusalem and wept over it. America must not fail the world at this time.

Amos Judson Bailey.
Seattle, Wash.

To illustrate what I consider the right way to go about such things, only a few weeks ago it fell to me as chairman of the committee at our local association to write the resolutions, which I did so as to win the hearty approval of Covenant advocates on the committee, and the Association voted to publish the resolutions, as follows:

> We have looked forward more and more in the closing of the war to the prospect of a league to prevent future wars, and we desire that a League of Nations shall be established without the relinquishment of our essential rights and guarantees, on firm foundations of justice, and maintained for the peace and welfare of the world.

Each word here challenges criticism from all angles.

B. Alfred Dumm.
Derry Village, N. H.

I was glad indeed to see Mr. Dumm's letter. The words "ill-considered and irresponsible" were especially happy. They certainly express exactly the action taken by most religious bodies around here. Perhaps I shouldn't say most—but at least I know that it was true in some instances.

Ella B. Smith.
Auburndale, Mass.

The serious peril to the nations, including our own, because of the failure of America to enter into the League, and the fearful responsibility of those who have occasioned this condition, has become too plain to be reasonably denied.

A. T. Clarke.
West Palm Beach, Fla.

Permit me to congratulate you upon the entire fairness and thoroughly good spirit of the editorial, "The Supreme Issue," in The Congregationalist of Aug. 5. And then let me thank you warmly, heartily and continually for the position you take: it is both a moral and religious question and the good Samaritan did not err in ministering to the wounded traveler even if he did soil his own clothes with blood stains.

George H. Johnson.
Cleveland, O.

I heartily support the resolution in regard to the League of Nations adopted by the American delegates to the recent International Congregational Council. Your editorial on The Supreme Issue expresses my mind.

J. Newton Brown.
Demorest, Ga.

To me, it is an astonishing thing that any minister of the Gospel should object to the action taken by the International Council in endeavoring to get a definite statement from the presidential candidates, on a question of such tremendous importance as the League of Nations. Surely the people ought to know what their President will stand for if elected. This will be the only really great question before the voter in November.

W. A. Hutchinson.
Lake Linden, Mich.

I am a Republican, but stand with you on the League of Nations.

James P. Smead.
Madison, O.

"The Supreme Issue" in my last Congregationalist so exactly expresses my feeling on the subject that I had hardly read a dozen lines before I determined to thank you very heartily. I wish everybody felt that way and would do something about it. To think of our country missing the opportunity of ages is very trying.

Mary P. Merrill.

A large proportion of its (The Congregationalist's) supporters see only danger in the so-called League of Nations and regard it as a League of War. As a matter of fact some of the most important matters that should have come before such a League were disposed of in advance by secret treaty by nations which are now most strongly urging America to join the League. What assurance have we that such treaties would not be entered into by those nations after the League is formed, as they did when the Hague Court was relied on for the preservation of peace?

Newton I. Jones.
Worthington, Mass.

If as a life-long Republican I cannot be enthusiastic over my party's 1920 platform, nor as yet its candidate for the presidency, as a Congregationalist by heredity and conviction I can be proud that the overwhelming sentiment of this great body of Christians is where it was two years ago in respect to America's privilege and duty in world affairs.

Edward F. Waite.
District Court,
Minneapolis, Minn.

The time has come when the religious people of the nation must assert themselves and insist that our government shall not consider only America and the protection of property; but—at the risk of being crucified if necessary—consider what is best for the world as a whole and the human beings who inhabit it. Furthermore, history teaches us that only by helping to save others can we in the end save ourselves. The selfish policy is not even the safest, but rather the most dangerous.

Roger W. Babson.
Wellesley Hills, Mass.

I wish to express my most earnest approval of your attitude on the League of Nations. It is the most important subject before the American people and indeed the whole world at the present time.

Alexander E. Cutler.
McGregor, Io.

Stand by your guns on the League of Nations. We are in the midst of a pitiable welter of trimming and short-sightedness, but the moral idealism of America will yet revive.

Marshall Dawson.
Storrs, Ct.

I am glad that you are keeping up the fight with reference to the League of Nations. There is, no doubt, a good deal of indifference, but I believe the position that you are taking is the right one and thoroughly justified.

Henry C. King.
Oberlin, O.

I heartily indorse your whole attitude on the League of Nations. You have in my judgment assumed the attitude that is consonant with the teachings of Jesus. In discussing the question one is biased by party prejudices.

Lloyd Morris.
Coe College,
Cedar Rapids, Io.

My conviction is deep and strong that we must have the League of Nations, and that the United States must be in it for the safety of the world and for our own safety.

Warren L. Noyes.
Nashua, N. H.

My objection is that it (the League) changes our form of government. It changes it by taking away from the President the right to be the commander-in-chief of our army and navy. It changes it by taking from Congress the exclusive right to declare war and then to say when our citizens shall be obliged to go abroad and fight. In place of this the nations shall create a general staff to direct military operations.

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

The Glory of Solomon's Reign

International Sunday School Lesson for Sept. 12. 1 Kings 10:1-13; 23-25.

This is a narrative concerning lavish Oriental splendor. Our section of it is the most commendable, for it is concerned with Solomon's wisdom rather than his immense wealth. Sheba is generally located somewhere in Arabia. The report of Solomon's wisdom and royal magnificence had extended thus far. Note that it was "the fame of Solomon concerning the name of Jehovah." That is, the royal reputation was not connected merely with vast material wealth. It was coupled also with the name of his God. Popular report connected his success and power with the Divinity whose blessing was supposed to guarantee these gifts.

The picture of the visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon is full of Oriental life and color. She came in from Arabia with camels loaded with gifts. Jewels and gold and rare and costly fabrics made up the burden of the caravan. But she brought something more than presents. She had thought up all the hard questions that her alert mind could devise and she was prepared to test Solomon's wisdom to the limit. There seems to have been no doubt at the end of the conference. The King answered all her questions. Then apparently they talked about the profoundest questions that could engage two persons occupying such positions of responsibility and alert as to the deepest meaning of life. It must have been an interesting interview.

Solomon evidently showed the Queen the entire content of his royal and religious life. His palace, his official staff, his court, his worship, all were fully displayed. There never had been anything seen in Arabia like this. The reports were only 50 per cent of the whole truth.

The impression upon the Queen was overwhelming; but the point at which her discriminating judgment was most accurate was when she estimated the religious meaning of it all. "Jehovah loved Israel forever, therefore made he thee king, to do justice and righteousness."

God's love for a nation is the foundation and assurance of its peace and prosperity. Solomon was not king simply by accident of birth or by cleverness in gaining a royal position. He was king because it was God's will; he reigned "by the grace of God." Let us get the full meaning of this judgment as it applies to modern political situations. Even where the ruler is chosen by popular election may we not also believe that God's will is being done in the decision of the people?

And the function of a king is to deal justly and to bring righteousness to bear upon popular interests. The final test of Solomon's true kingly character was not the magnificence of his court but the justice and righteousness of his regal decisions.

Lesson Points

1. That is a rare reputation that is only 50 per cent. true to fact.
2. Courts and chariots may make kings but they cannot make a king's heart pure.
3. Under stress men are always glad to exchange money for sound wisdom.
4. An evil home corrupts a church or a state.
5. Permanent human welfare is grounded on character, not on the possession of apes, ivory and peacocks.

Another respect in which the splendor of Solomon appears was seen in the way in which sandalwood and gold were used for the furniture and the decorations of the temple and palace. These were brought by the ships of King Hiram from Ophir, which was also probably in Arabia.

Still another item in the count shows men from all parts of the world coming to Solomon to obtain his God-given judgment on important questions. For this they paid a yearly rate, so that the royal revenues were immensely increased by this means.

There is another side of the picture which is not included in the lesson text but which is so important that it should be included. Solomon made silver to be as common and cheap as stone in Jerusalem; but he lost the purity and simplicity of his religious life under the influences that his great wealth brought about him, so that finally all his wisdom and riches and power failed to hold the favor of God. It is another case of a man whose soul is not great enough to endure prosperity. Study 11:9-13.

This study closes our work on the Early Leaders and Kings of Israel. On the whole it has been a noble record of personal heroism and character. It has given us the definition of important principles that are valid in our modern world where personal leadership is of the utmost importance to the welfare of our people. What are some of these conclusions from the quarter's study?

The Minute Man in Religious Education

By applying a modern business principle and the minute-man idea, Winfield L. Nourse, director of publicity for the Brookline (Mass.) Community School for Religious Education, has devised a unique advertising plan which is bound to arouse community interest and will undoubtedly prove a big factor in successfully launching the training school project.

Mr. Nourse reached the following conclusions: "I have something to sell—a good, marketable article. Its selling power depends largely upon the method of presenting it to the people; of showing them what it is and why they should purchase it. It pays to advertise; therefore, I must advertise the community training school by written and spoken word and must procure competent agents who have confidence in its merits, to present its qualities clearly and concisely." In this brief, analytical soliloquy will be found the basis of the interesting publicity campaign planned.

The written word department of the campaign will function first and consists of an appeal by letter to every person interested in Protestant Sunday school work in Brookline. These workers have been reached by requesting the ministers and school officers to send to the publicity director the names of all workers and other interested persons in their church organizations. The mailing list now numbers 500 and is increasing daily.

Every person whose name is on the mailing list receives a communication from the director of publicity, in which is outlined the aim of the training school and appeals for co-operation in disseminating information throughout the community. A second letter will be issued in September, giving detailed information regarding the school, the courses to be pursued and a complete program of the lesson evening routine. Regular notices will appear in the daily, weekly and religious press and in paid advertisements. Ministers of the co-operating churches have been requested to insert suitable notices of the opening of the school in their church calendars and bulletins.

Under the heading, "Spoken Word," is an equally interesting department and it is here the law of sale is introduced. The publicity director has prepared four talks or lectures which will be delivered in Brookline Sunday schools on four successive Sundays preceding the opening of the community school. The subjects in their order are:

First Sunday—"Why is the Brookline Community Training School Necessary?"

Second Sunday—"What is the Brookline Community Training School?"

Third Sunday—"How is the Brookline Community Training School to be Conducted?"

Fourth Sunday—"Who Should be Interested in the Brookline Community Training School?"

There are twelve Protestant churches in Brookline. The school project is interdenominational, and all these churches are co-operating. Twelve men, acting in the capacity of minutemen, will deliver one of the above talks or lectures in the Sunday schools on four successive Sundays, each speaker using the same general subject assigned for any particular Sunday.

The talks contain, in condensed form, some of the best arguments for community religious training. It required much time and effort to collate the valuable and interesting facts found in the series. The material is so arranged that a speaker may use it literally or merely as a suggestion paper from which to get ideas for an address of his own. Having made a draft of the lectures, Mr. Nourse submitted it to several men of broad religious training and thus procured helpful suggestions and criticisms.

The training school is to open in the Harvard Congregational Church, Monday evening, Oct. 18, at 7.30. Edwin R. Carter, director of religious education in that church, has been appointed director of the school. On the evening of Oct. 10, a mass meeting of all interested persons will be held in St. Mark's Methodist Episcopal Church, at which Prof. A. E. Bennett, Ph.D., of the Boston University School of Religion, will speak on the subject of the community school.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

The Perils of Inattention

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 5–11

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Lesson. Matt. 25:31-46.

Opportunities That Do Not Advertise. This is the culminating word of Jesus speaking as a judge. The startling thing about his parable of acceptance and rejection is the unexpectedness of the sentence. It seems to pass outside the realm of Christian faith and experience altogether. It is the judgment of all nations and Christian faith is not in question at all. The judge is the Son of Man, whose whole life was one of pity and self-giving. And the commendation and condemnation are upon the grounds of likeness or unlikeness to himself in mercy. The sin that is here quite unpardonable is cruel inattention to the needs of others. The condemned had met human need face to face in the ways of life and had not even recognized it. All claims to pity and all sense of responsibility had been denied, and with them all claims upon the mercy of God were lost. The denial of brotherhood is the relinquishment of sonship to God. He waited, though these children of his were in a far country; but he waited for their least thought of a return to him in vain. We are here in the presence of perhaps the most solemn words in all the utterances of Christ. The opportunities of mercy are sometimes rather clamorous, nowadays, we think; but the little opportunities of common life which both display and shape our characters do not advertise.

Watching for Our Chance to Help. There is a call to watchfulness here which we shall be wise to heed. We cannot afford to let these opportunities of Christlike kindness slip past us unimproved. Our Lord is not thinking here of great self-surrenders—going as a missionary, making great ventures of faith, giving all our goods to feed the poor. He is thinking of the everyday happenings of plain people in quite remote and unknown neighborhoods. He brings it down so evidently to the life we all experience that no one can say, "This applies to Babylon, or Jerusalem, or London, or Chicago; but it has nothing to do with our town or village." It is a call to watch on our own streets, as well as on the Jericho road where the Good Samaritan showed what manner of man he was. And the perils of our pre-occupied or self-occupied minds are great. We cannot afford to overlook our opportunities of helpfulness. For they seldom send a messenger to tell us they are coming to meet us.

Christ's Interest in the Details of Our Lives. Our Master is so great that he can afford to spare time and attention for little things. He saw—he sees—the little kindly deeds and hears the little kindly words as we go on our way. Our life is glorified by this interest and presence. But it carries its warning and invitation to be careful and watchful as we go. And his judgment parable gives us a glimpse into the mind of Christ which must make for our humility. If these outside the fold commended themselves to Christ by deeds of mercy, how much more, with our gift of faith and our motive of affection, should we be attentive in order to be kind.

REPLACEMENTS

That ye might be filled with all the fullness of God.—Eph. 3:19.

Keep evil in check by its opposite. Promote the good in whatever form is possible. Counteract error by publishing the truths it would ignore or deny. Circumvent the baneful and corrupting by planting and watering by its side the pure and blessed. We are far too fond of the violent, and too little inclined to the constructive, which calls for patience and humility. Kill the weeds with the flowers, the tares with the corn, for there is an energy in righteousness, truth, love, and beauty which the malignant growths of evil cannot withstand.—W. L. Watkinson.

The Master keeps the lips of his servants by so filling their hearts with his love that the outflow cannot be unloving; by so filling their thoughts that the utterance cannot be un-Christlike.—Frances R. Havergal.

Thou who didst hang upon a barren tree,
My God, for me,
Though I till now be barren, now at length,
Lord, give me strength
To bring forth fruit to thee.

Thou who didst bear for me the crown of thorn,
Spitting and scorn,
Though I till now have put forth thorns, yet now
Strengthen me thou,
That better fruit be born.
—Christina Rossetti.

My principal method for defeating heresy is by establishing truth. One proposes to fill a bushel with tares; now if I can fill it first with wheat I shall defy his attempts.—John Newton.

Jesus was not an agreeable sentimentalist who imagined that he could cleanse the world by rose-water; he was the only thinker who grasped the whole situation, root and branch. He did not propose to make sin illegal; that had been done without conspicuous benefit. He proposed to make sin impossible by replacing it with love.—John Watson.

O God, who givest harvest in the souls and lives of men, help us to choose and to prefer the gifts of thy provision above what we may find or earn alone. Take away from us evil, that thou mayest replace it with good. Help us to love so purely and sincerely both God and our neighbor that there shall be no room left in our hearts for envy or for hate. Teach us the values of the things which are from above, that smaller things may sink in our desire to their true place; and that all evil, seen in its true nature and proportion, may become repellent. In the name of Christ. Amen.

His Greatest Day

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 12–18

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: A Great Miracle and its Lessons. Mark 2:1-12.

Light from the Bible Passage

Fortunate is a man who has friends. "A friend in need is a friend indeed." This sick man had four. Their kindness is matched by their persistence and their ingenuity. The Master valued their faith. (v. 5.) Forgiveness of sins as well as healing of the body are the Lord's gift and not our desert. Both alike show where real authority lies. Cavillers cannot overcome plain facts. John 9 also gives a very interesting evidence of this. This healed man was a "straightaway" fellow. They never "saw the like of such a thing before." The coming and working of Christ have always made this same impression. It is even so with devoted Christians carrying on his work.

Leads for the Leader

Did you ever read the Gospel of Mark through at a sitting? Do it and you will catch a different idea of the narrative. Notice how clean-cut and vividly told everything is. One of the interesting little touches is the frequent use of "straightaway." It is a good Endeavor gospel.

The way to our own happiness lies in making others happy. Think of this man and his friends in this way.

How much can Jesus do with us or through us unless he sees our faith? Have we any faith for him to see?

This is a good start for discussing evangelistic and medical missionary work. Can we neglect either and do the things the Master left in our care?

What do you think of the possibility of our churches having a dual ministry: a minister (to the souls) and a doctor (for the bodies)? And both free? How would it work out?

Thoughts for Members

Deeds not words stop the mouths of critics.

Here is the Master over sin and sickness. Has he lost his power?

Some people are more afraid of offending society than of failing to help it. Christ came to save and not to salve.

If there be some weaker one,
Give me strength to help him on;
If a blinder soul there be,
Let me guide him nearer thee.
—Whittier.

Four men—one at each corner of the cot—all needed. One missing would have made it harder for the others and the sick man? Am I carrying my corner? Or do I let the others do it?

A Moment of Prayer

We thank thee, O thou Great Physician of souls and bodies, for thy love that abides through the ages. We rejoice in the thousands who have been inspired to carry on thy work of this kind in these, our own days. May that love of thine make us always friends in need and in deed for the unfortunates of the world. Amen.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Recent Fiction

The Shadow, by Mary White Ovington (Harcourt, Brace & Howe). Miss Ovington has taken for her theme the life-experience and disabilities of the educated negro. The white heroine, thrown as a foundling into the warm nest of a negro family in the far South to conceal her mother's sin and brought up as one of them, when she comes to womanhood is suddenly acknowledged by her grandfather and has to choose between the race of her nativity and of her gratitude. She goes to New York and is plunged into the industrial struggle which is admirably pictured. The story will compel and inform thought; but is first enjoyable for its romantic and dramatic power and charm.

The Light Out of the East, by S. R. Crockett (Doran). A peculiarly daring paraphrase of the life of Christ. This new Messiah is of the present day, a child waif from the hills of Judea, a humble priest, then a Cardinal, and finally elected to the Papacy as a "dark horse." The process is amusingly like American party politics. The modern note sounds everywhere, often arousing mirth. Yet the result is what the Scotch call "a sair laugh." Pope Christopher defies the hierarchy and becomes a man among men, though leading them into ways of beneficence and peace. His miracles are the result of personal influence or of strange coincidence. Brigands and kings flock to his support with crowds of less picturesque people. He visits France, where a new Sermon on the Mount is recorded by the Associated Press and sent forth by wireless. America prepares for him in true Billy Sunday style. But the New Jerusalem comes to earth on the site of the old one. Success in making over humanity is too speedy and too complete to seem convincing. Also the devout follower of Christ will shrink from the inadequacy of the parallel. Yet the book holds the interest steadily and makes the reader think hard.

Young Hearts, by J. E. Buckrose (Doran). Mrs. Buckrose may be depended upon to choose the latest topics and to treat them after her own humorously sympathetic fashion. This is the story of a Yorkshire family who remove to the country and try to increase England's food supply. They are suburban folk, quite unused to spuds and cows. The servant question takes on new horrors and a local ghost induces some annoying researches in the realm of the occult. In the midst of all this strenuosity Cupid finds room to make his own kind of havoc. The characters, gentle and bucolic, are all interesting, especially the widely contrasted sisters.

The Girl on the Hilltop, by Kenyon Gambier (Doran). Social changes in England, as expedited by the War, make a favorite topic for fiction. This is a particularly lively and enlightening novel of that sort. In the summer of 1914 there comes an American youth to the little village of Castlechepe, intent upon the study of his ancestral home and his kindred. Swept away into the war, he returns four years later, this time as the unknown heir. The vicissitudes of caste and faulty economics form the background of a triple romance. Until the end the hero remains a mystery to most of his acquaintances. Presumably, the author is English, but he makes few slips in presenting the other point of view. The story is one which lingers in the memory.

Gold Out of Celebes, by Captain A. E. Dingle (Little, Brown). A story with abundant material for a good, stirring adventure plot. It is rather crudely worked out, but has some interesting descriptive features of nature in the Celebes.

Presenting Jane McRae, by Mark Lee Luther (Little, Brown). Another story somewhat like "The Hope Chest" in its description of the romance of a young girl, daughter of a drunken hotel-keeper in a country town, and a young man from a home of wealth and social position. The most interesting part of the tale is the account of the young girl's career in the "movies."

Happy House, by Jane D. Abbott (Lippincott). A college girl's prank twists itself into a pretty story with a mystery. One of a group of friends is invited to spend a summer in a remote village with relatives whom she has never seen. Much preferring to be somewhere else she persuades another girl to take her place. These ready-made relatives are gloomy and forlorn in spite of the name of their house. So a real career opens before the charming impostor who eventually finds as well as bestows happiness.

The Girl from Four Corners, by Rebecca N. Porter (Holt). This is a story of a girl's adventure in making a living and a life in San Francisco. The introduction tells of her unhappily circumstanced childhood in a remote mountain town. She has good fortune and good friends, but runs serious risks, from one of which, due to her own well-developed instinct of motherliness, she has the narrowest of escapes. The story makes agreeable reading.

The Book of Susan, by Lee Wilson Dodd (Dutton). This belongs to the increasing output of infancy-to-maturity novels wherein appear the records of the life of one character. The method promotes variety and discursiveness. Susan is a child of the slums, adopted into a home of luxury and cultivation. Her knowledge of evil is both a burden and a defense. She is so sturdy and straightforward, so loyal and unselfish that she belongs among the best beloved of fiction people. Her guardian tells the story in his own way and time. Read in leisurely fashion the book affords much pleasure.

Tamarisk Town, by Sheila Kaye-Smith (Dutton). A strange and powerful story of the struggle in a man's soul between two passions. A piece of rampant paganism. Splendidly sustained and repellent in proportion to its strength.

Lindy Loyd, by Marie E. Hoffman (Marshall Jones). "A Tale of the Mountains" by one who writes with knowledge and sympathy. Birds and blossoms, tilled fields and remote stretches of wilderness enter into the excellent descriptions of the regions.

The World of Wonderful Reality, by E. Temple Thurston (Appleton). This sequel to "The City of Beautiful Nonsense" does not differ, the author tells us, in atmosphere or treatment. The story is a curious attempt to prove the thesis "love is enough," and the result is unconvincing. Romance and idealism do also abide with self-control and hard work.

Joan of the Island, by Ralph Henry Barbour and H. P. Holt (Small, Maynard). Another South Sea romance with a capable and adventurous hero, a beautiful and brave heroine, a weak brother, with a passion for pearls and a liking for drink, a villain who intends to get both the pearls and the girl—several attempts at murder and a big fight! It is a lively tale, holds the interest and ends as it should.

The Matrix, by Maria Thompson Daviess (Century Co.). The romance of Tom and Nancy Lincoln, parents of the President. A mixture of facts and traditions. A fine feature of the narrative is the background of the Kentucky wilderness and the pioneer town.

The Treasure of the Isle of Mist, by W. W. Tarn (Putnams). A grown-up description of a young girl's trip to fairyland and her interesting experiences with the little people. The story is beautifully written and well worked out.

Glory Rides the Range, by Ethel and James Dorrance (Macaulay).

Lotus Salad, by Mildred Cram (Dodd, Mead).

Daisy Ashford, Her Book (Doran).

The House of Dreams-Come-True, by Margaret Pedler (Doran).

Exit Betty, by Grace Livingston Hill (Lippincott).

Concerning the Negro

The Negro Faces America, by Herbert J. Seligmann (Harpers). A study of the facts of injustice relating to the Negro race in the United States since the European War, especially in the South; and so abundant and heart-rending is the evidence of wrong that the book should not only compel more thought on this subject, but also speed action for relief and reform.

Chums and Brothers, by Edgar H. Webster (Badger). Intimate personal sketches revealing the admirable character of colored young people whom the author has known during a life-time of teaching in Atlanta University.

Children of the Mist, by George Madden Martin (Appleton). A book of well-written short stories about the less-favored colored people of the South during the period from Civil War days to the present time. It does not recognize the existence of the educated Negro, but it throws light upon the pathetic problem of those who come up out of the darkness of slavery.

The Voice of the Negro, by Robert T. Kerlin (Dutton). Quotations from the Negro Press for the last six months of 1919, on such topics as: The New Era, The Negro's Reactions to the World War, The Negro's Grievances and Demands, Riots, Lynchings, The South and the Negro, etc. A very remarkable exhibit, and on the whole creditable to the race and showing them as law-abiding, peace-loving, conservative and patriotic. There are no indications of radicalism or of demanding other than just and fair dealing.

For Public Speakers

Pocket Guides to Public Speaking, by Grenville Kleiser (Funk and Wagnalls). The author of this series of ten handy volumes was formerly Instructor in Public Speaking at Yale Divinity School and is considered a leading expert in his line. Certainly these little volumes each contain clear, practical and important information which will be of use to those who carefully follow the author's advice. The titles of the volumes are: How to Speak Without Notes, Something to Say: How to Say It, Successful Methods of Public Speaking, Model Speeches for Practice, The Training of a Public Speaker, How to Sell through Speech, Impromptu Speeches: How to Make Them, Word-Power: How to Develop It, Christ: The Master Speaker, and Vital English for Speakers and Writers.

On Religious Themes

The Imitation of Christ, by Thomas a Kempis, Edith Cavell Edition (Oxford University Press). The martyrdom of Edith Cavell is memorialized in this beautiful little edition which is a facsimile of the copy Miss Cavell had with her in the prison at St. Gilles, and reproduces the markings she made at different times against passages which she found helpful. An eloquent Foreword by Bishop Ryle of Westminster tells of Miss Cavell's last days and of the great funeral service on May 15, 1919, in Westminster Abbey.

A Bunch of Everlastings, by F. W. Boreham (Abingdon Press). Readers of any of the earlier volumes of this Australian essayist will not need to be urged to possess themselves of this one. It is a volume of twenty-three sermons on "texts that have made history." Each text is connected with some one's life, as, for example, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," which was connected with a crisis in the life of Oliver Cromwell. So he gives, and comments on Thomas Chalmers' Text, and Martin Luther's Text, and Dean Stanley's Text, etc. It is a remarkable collection of biographical incidents and each one is used to drive home a fundamental Christian truth.

The Menace of Immorality in Church and State, by Rev. John Roach Straton (Doran). Addresses by the pastor of Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, denouncing the dancing of the day, the immodest dress of women in society, the impurity of the theater as a whole, including the moving pictures, and backing up his accusations by quotations from newspaper advertisements and reports. Too much of this is harnessed up with the church and promoted by church people; and over against it is spineless preaching lacking in condemnation for sin. It is an appalling revelation of a modern Sodom worthy only of condemnation. Of course it is not the whole story but it is a brave word that needs to be spoken.

A Jewish View of Jesus, by H. G. Enelow (Macmillan). Among the multitude of books on the life and teachings of Jesus this sympathetic volume written by a Jew should find a welcome place. It claims the recognition of Jesus as the most influential teacher of religion the Jewish people ever produced; it emphasizes the Jewish birth, environment and education of Jesus. It presents the Jewish idea of the Messiah and shows that Jesus came to fulfill and not to destroy the law and the prophets. It is Unitarian in its theology. But it marks the present-day trend of Jewish thought and for that reason it is notable. It is full of interesting and suggestive material which every student of the life of Jesus will welcome, even though it omits much which is of vital importance.

The Theology of the Epistles, by H. A. A. Kennedy (Scribners). A remarkable, scholarly study of Paul as well as Pauline theology, by the professor of New Testament exegesis of New College, Edinburgh. In addition to the Pauline epistles the author gives careful treatment to the post-Pauline Christianity.

Moses, the Founder of Preventive Medicine, by Percival Wood (Macmillan). A camp medical officer in service in the Near East was led to study the Pentateuch in the light of his experience. He pays great tribute to the wisdom and practical worth of the Pentateuch teaching for camp hygiene and sanitation.

Something More, by Kirby Page (Association Press). A consideration of the vast undeveloped resources of life. There is something more in God, man, Jesus Christ and in life than we have appropriated.

The Resurrection and the Life Beyond, by David James Burrell (American Tract Society). A series of homilies and devotional studies calculated to comfort the sorrowing and to strengthen faith.

The School Hymnal, edited by Milton S. Littlefield (A. S. Barnes). A high-grade hymnal for the Sunday school that is really practical. It is well called, "A book of worship for young people." A fine feature is the number of hymns expressing loyalty and fidelity, heroism, good will and service. The responsive readings, services for special occasions and prayers have been prepared by Dr. Oliver Huckel and are of a high order.

Garments of Power, by Fred B. Fisher (Abingdon Press). Some mystical meditations, which smell of myrrh and aloes and cassia, by the youngest bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

If Not a United Church—What? by Peter Ainslie (Revell). The Reinecker Lectures at the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia, by the well-known Disciples' preacher and editor. The volume takes up carefully and thoroughly the necessity, the growth and the outlook for Christian unity. It is a great plea and a forceful presentation of facts which must be faced.

For Boys and Girls

The Boys' Book of the World War, by Francis Rolt-Wheeler (Lothrop, Lee and Shepard). Written for young people this remarkable history is clear enough to be thoroughly enjoyed by them. But it will also be read with pleasure and profit by adults. The author's plan is interesting. He conceives of a council of five men, a chief of staff, a diplomat, a military expert, an economist, and an American war correspondent. These five tell the story from their various points of view, with occasional discussion of disputed points. Not only is the war described in detail but various points are dwelt upon like The Failure of the Zeppelins, Combats in the Sky, etc. The entrance of America and her share in the war is given due space and the volume closes with the Treaties of Germany and her Allies. It is a notable volume. A large number of excellent illustrations, maps and diagrams add greatly to the value of the work.

The Argonauts of Faith, by Basil Mathews (Doran). As good a history of the Pilgrim Fathers as has been written for young people. It is interesting, full of material which will appeal to the youthful mind. It is accurate, generally, following quite closely to the record of Governor Bradford. Occasionally there is a flight of imagination which it would be difficult to justify, as when the author writes, "As they set foot upon the great boulder by the side of which the boat was beached, they called it Plymouth Rock." But, in spite of such infrequent faults, we may heartily commend the volume, especially for young people. The concluding chapter on "The Building of the New Argo" shows how the Pilgrim love of liberty was perpetuated by the Revolutionay War, the Civil War and the last Great War. It is a splendid climax to a great story.

Paul and the Printing Press, by Sara Ware Bassett (Little, Brown). A fine story for boys of high school age. Paul Cameron, president of the class of 1920 in a high school, starts and edits a school paper, The March Hare. In the course of doing so he learns much of the history of printing, which is indeed a fascinating record in itself. All that is cleverly worked into this tale, which contains much of schoolboy interest in addition to information about printing. It is the best story this author has written and is the first of a new series to be known as "The Invention Series."

The Ring-Necked Grizzly, by Warren H. Miller (Appleton) describes a trip of two boys to the Big River country of the Rocky Mountains. In charge of an old hunter they have a fine time with sufficient adventure. Their main ambition had been to shoot the famous "ring-necked grizzly" and this they accomplished. It was an exciting experience.

The Worker and His Work, by Stella S. Center (Harpers). A compilation of descriptions from present-day writers, of various occupations, the Mail Order House, by Arnold Bennett, The Telephone, by the same writer, A Busy Broker, by O. Henry, The Wheat Pit, by Frank Norris, The Riverman, by Stewart Edward White, The Salmon, by Rex Beach, etc., over forty chapters. Prepared for young people who are looking for a vocation, it is of interest for the average reader.

Joseph, by E. B. Trist (Macmillan). The story of Joseph told in attractive form for young people. Well illustrated in colors and bound in paper.

The Land of Faraway (Macmillan). The first of a collection of very short stories and poems gives the title to this little book for children of five to eight. It is a choice and prettily illustrated little volume at a moderate price.

A Life of Our Lord, illustrated by James Clark, R. I. (Macmillan). "Contains passages from the Gospels, selected with a view of giving a full though not exhaustive account of the works and sayings of our Saviour, such as will be readily intelligible to children." The selections are well chosen, and the twelve full-page colored pictures are of exceptional merit and will interest children.

In the Great Apache Forest, by James Willard Schultz (Houghton Mifflin). This is one of the best of this author's Indian stories, and every boy will know that is high praise. A Boy Scout enlists in Forest Service in 1918 and while at his lookout station high up on a hilltop he is visited by a group of Hopi Indians. One of these, trained in an American school, tells of the Indian customs. There are also many exciting events, including the killing of an enormous grizzly bear, and the capture of a bunch of bad men who had been setting forest fires. It is an intensely interesting and instructive story for boys and girls.

Don Strong, American, by William Heyliger (Appleton). A fine Boy Scout story describing how the boys at home, responding to the call for help in farm work, tried to show themselves good Americans. This was not all clean and easy work. There were troubles. But Don Strong, the leader, playing fair always, is successful in overcoming obstacles.

The Lost Dirigible, by Ralph Henry Barbour (Appleton). Jack Stirling, a young ensign in the navy is sent to the Texas border and there set to radio work in a new dirigible. On his very first trip the airship is caught in a cyclone, damaged by an electric storm, driven across the Gulf of Mexico and the larger part of Mexico and landed, crippled, in the neighborhood of the headquarters of the latest Mexican revolutionist. All hands are captured. The story of the escape of Jack and his chum and the rescue of his commander and other officers is sufficiently exciting. Any boy, or girl, will delight in it.

Dick Arnold, of Raritan College, by Earl Reed Silvors (Appleton). A fine story of life in a small college, where many of the boys work their way through. There are thrilling accounts of football and track events with some discussion of college ethics. The standard is high and Dick and his friends are good both in sports and at their studies.

WITH THE CHILDREN

The House in the Tree

By Janet L. Savage

Peggy was only seven, but she was very grown up in spite of having lived so short a time. Her home was in a little village. There were big shade trees and all the houses had pretty gardens where you would like to stop and pick the flowers until you had bunches of them. The Postoffice was in the center of the town and often Uncle Henry would take Peggy with him when he went for the mail and the old Postmaster would smile kindly at her over the big glasses which he wore way down over his nose, and instead of giving the mail to Uncle Henry he would place it in her small hands. This always made Peggy very proud and happy to think she could be trusted with the letters and papers for the family.

Peggy lived in an old-fashioned white house. It had a wide veranda in front and pretty vines growing over it. There was a big garden in the back yard, and in a corner was the bed of pansies which belonged to Peggy and in it each morning Peggy gathered a bunch to put on the tray for Grandma, whose breakfast was carried to her in her room. A big rope swing had been put up by Uncle Henry and a gay-colored hammock swung between two trees. This was the house where Peggy's mother had been born and she told Peggy all the good times she had when she was a little girl, and these were the stories Peggy loved best; for it was just like fairy tales to think of her Mama ever being a little girl as she was, and doing the things she did for play. Of course, her mother looked just like a little girl who was playing at being grown-up, but to think her own mother had made mud pies, and had parties under the trees with her dolls just like her.

Now Peggy had so much done for her that she was being spoiled and she soon became tired of all her pretty things and one day she left all her toys and started out for adventure. She unlatched the big white gate and walked down the street, stopping at each corner to look back and see how far she had gone alone, for, you must know, Peggy was never allowed to go anywhere unless someone was with her to take care of her. Finally she entered a big field and sitting down under an oak tree began to play with the little acorns that were scattered all about on the ground. She looked up at the big tree and wondered how high it was, and could you reach heaven if you climbed to the top, and what would you see if you lived in a tree.

While she was thinking a tiny door at the foot of the tree opened and out stepped a little bit of a man all dressed in brown from top to toe. His suit fitted him tight, and his cap was pointed and fitted tight and so did his tiny brown shoes and stockings, and his shoes had no heels, but turned up in a sharp point at the toe. He was smiling all over his face and Peggy thought he looked very pleasant. Peggy could have taken him up in her hand, he was so small; so she wasn't afraid to speak to him.

"What is on the other side of the door you came through?" she asked. "That is my house," said the little man. "A house?" cried Peggy. "Could I see it?" she asked. She thought it must be something like her dolls' house, but that was larger than this tree house, for it had four doors and many windows and all she saw here was a door and no windows.

The little man invited her in, but Peggy replied, "How can I go in your house when I am such a big girl?"

The little man answered, "If I clap my hands I can make you as small as I am. Would you like to have me? Then you could go through my small door very easily."

"Oh, do," she cried.

The little man clapped his hands once and Peggy grew smaller. He clapped them again and again until Peggy, looking down at her feet, saw that they had become tiny, tiny, but she wasn't afraid.

The little man opened the door for Peggy to step in ahead of him. Sure enough, there was a house inside and down the stairs came a little lady all in brown, small as the little man who had invited her in. She came up and, putting her arms around Peggy, kissed her and said: "Welcome, my child. We are glad to have you here. Come upstairs and I will show you your room." Peggy didn't know what to make of it all, but she followed the little lady and soon was standing in the cutest little bedroom, all in white, with little bed and rocking chair. What could it all mean? Here were the same things she had at home, only smaller.

The little lady went down stairs and told Peggy to rest and she would get tea ready, and would call her when she had finished.

Peggy sat down in the little white rocking-chair and tried to think it all over as she rocked. Then she went over and touched the cover on the little white bed. Next she opened the wee bureau drawers and there were dainty pink and blue blankets for cold weather, and the small mirror showed her own self when she looked in it. She was smaller than her smallest doll and she wondered if her own dear Mama would know her now.

Before she could wonder any more about the change in her looks she was called down to tea. She found the little man had changed to a light green suit and the little lady had put on a silver-grey gown. They had dressed up for their company while she was upstairs.

The table was so daintily set and there were the tiniest biscuits and jam served on little white plates, and the cups had real tea and cream. Peggy was only allowed to have cambric tea at home and she thought it was nice to live in a tree, people could do such grown-up things without being corrected. The little man and lady told her many interesting things she didn't know about trees, and when they had all finished eating and drinking they took Peggy all

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

You will remember in my mosquito story that I asked what was the best time to kill a mosquito. I have been patiently waiting for some answer, but a Comrade far, far away has answered first, Thomas W. Ward of Carpenteria, Cal. In his letter recently he says: "In The Congregationalist and Advance of July 29, you have an article which in some respects reminds me of the old Corner which our former editor and friend used to publish and which we all enjoyed reading.

"In the July number you had an article about mosquitoes and asked what is the best time to kill one. If I may be allowed a place in your Corner I should say most emphatically, 'The first time you have a chance.' "

This is a good guess, but it is not the correct one yet. Some one else suggests that it is before he bites you, but that is not the proper answer. (And remember it is not the "he-es" that bite.) I think I shall have to wait a little while longer to see if some of you cannot really tell me what is the best time to kill one.

These are days when, of course, we are spending much of our time out of doors and I think you will enjoy another little story from our Comrade Sarah F. Bel of Hartford, Ct. I give her letter entire:

> If you wish to make some "movies" of your own this summer, which I know you will enjoy, get a pasteboard box, punch some holes in the sides of it and tie over the top a piece of mosquito netting. Then hunt around in some one's garden, on parsley or carrot tops, and find a caterpillar about two inches long dressed in green with velvety black stripes across his body dotted with yellow. Introduce him to his new apartment, and tie on the netting so he cannot crawl out. Feed him every day, throwing out the refuse and giving him fresh leaves, and when he is full grown he will crawl up on the side of the box, fasten himself at the end of his body by some silken threads. spin himself a sort of belt to hold himself upright, and proceed with the ceremony of making a chrysalis. I shall not tell you how he does it, because that is the most interesting part of the movie.
> After the chrysalis, wait a few weeks more, and he bursts off the end, and comes out with wings—black wings all trimmed with yellow and shaded blue.

Here is something that is well worth trying and "it does not cost anything." The surprise in store for you will amply repay you.

You know if you really want to get things authoritatively you have to go to Washington or else have Washington come to you. It happens that we have a friend in the Treasury Department in Washington, in the Public Health Department, Alice H. Goodwin. She wishes to be permitted to add to the names recently given the following: "Physicians who successfully combatted yellow fever in New Orleans were Dr. White, Dr. Brown, Dr. Green, Dr. Lavender and Dr. Blue. All were members of the Marine Hospital service, now the public health service of the United States." (Sort of a rainbow staff.—Mr. A.)

I think we shall have to give the plum to this contributor for sending us the most striking list.

I am going to suggest a little contest for you which you can work on before school opens. After this don't you think we would better drop the subject of names? I wish lists of last or family names of people who are either birds, beasts, or creatures of the sea. You may really call this the "bird, beast and fish game." I already have quite a list of each one of these and should like to see what you can do. Mr. Jay is a "bird," Mr. Fox a "beast," and Mr. Bass a "fish." Now, go ahead!

This is not a very hard contest, so I think that a first prize of two thrift stamps and a second prize of one thrift stamp will be about right. Lists submitted in this contest must reach me by the 15th of September.

I am sure you are all getting very anxious for school now and I hope that you will have gained during the summer a whole lot of "pep" for your fall work.

Comradely yours,

through their little home. It was very neat and pretty and they told her they had all they wanted to make them happy excepting a little daughter. They had always hoped some one would come and live with them and now they had their wish, for Peggy had come and they were going to love her very much.

Then Peggy began to think about her home and mother and wondered who would drink the milk and cream from the silver and gold cup that had her name on it, if she wasn't home at tea time, and she thanked the little people for being so nice to her, but said she really must go back to her own home and parents.

In vain the little man and lady begged her to stay and made her many promises, but Peggy said she just couldn't belong to them.

She wondered what her people would say if she went home looking so tiny. They wouldn't be able to find her, she was so small. Indeed, she could have slipped into her Mama's thimble and been completely hidden.

Then the little man told Peggy he had clapped his hands to make her small enough to enter his little door and when he got outside by stamping his foot he could make her grow big again, just as she was. There was just one thing he would ask her to promise before he sent her back home. She had many toys and everything to make her happy. She must promise to learn to be contented with them. Peggy promised she would, and then the little man stamped his foot real hard, and then harder, and again even harder. At each stamp Peggy grew bigger and bigger until she was a seven-year-old girl again in size.

She kissed the little lady and gave her a big hug, and shaking hands very gravely with the little man, she thanked them both for all their kindness to her and went back to her home, getting there in time to have the big cup of milk and cream.

Always after that visit to the little house in the tree she liked her home and playthings more than she used to do. I guess it was because she thought how much nicer it was to live in your own home with those who love you than to live with any one else, even if they were as nice as the little man and lady of the tree house.

An Educational Assistant

In the Congregational Education Society

Mrs. Millacent P. Yarrow has recently been elected educational assistant of the Congregational Education Society and began her work Aug. 1.

Mrs. Yarrow takes up the work formerly done by Miss Mabel E. Patten. Her college work was done at Wellesley and Leland Stanford, Jr. She was married to Rev. S. R. Yarrow and for several years they labored together in churches in California. Mr. Yarrow is not now living and Mrs. Yarrow after teaching in the high school at Palo Alto came East and did work in religious education in Columbia University, later taking a year's work in the same line with Dr. Athearn in Boston University. During this time she worked with Dr. John Dobbs in our First Congregational Church in Malden, Mass. Upon leaving Boston University she spent a year in educational work with the Y. W. C. A., and later was connected with the religious educational work of the Interchurch World Movement, initiating plans and developing methods and materials in connection with some of the religious education surveys.

Mrs. Yarrow, therefore, comes to her work thoroughly equipped through special training and through experience to render most satisfactory and helpful service in the religious education program which the Education Society is prosecuting.

Her position is that of educational assistant to Gen. Sec. F. M. Sheldon, and her office is on the eighth floor of the Congregational House in Boston, where she can be consulted personally or reached through correspondence in connection with the religious education problems of our churches.

On a Summer Sunday

A Greeting from Australia

Sounding across harbors and seas where Australian ships pass to and fro, carried on the still night air for miles through the bush, a native cry comes often to the ears of the dweller in Australia—"Coo-oo-ee, coo-oo-ee." It is a word of greeting; it is also a cry for help. Australia sends this call now to America—sends the "coo-ee" of greeting from one young land, rich in resources, to a land but two centuries older, also blessed with abundant wealth and opportunity; sends the "coo-ee" for help, also, not for material aid, but for the leadership of an elder brother in the realm of national ideals.

This is the message which Rev. A. R. Stephenson, M. A., of Melbourne, Australia, brought to the congregation of Highland Church, Roxbury, at the beginning of his first service there, Sunday morning, Aug. 8. It was an effective introduction, and it stirred the imagination of the whole congregation, even to the wide-eyed small boys, of whom there seemed to be an unusually large number for a midsummer Sunday service. Even in the inevitable August slackness, it was easy for a stranger to see that Highland Church is a family church, where fathers and mothers and children all feel themselves at home.

To the older members of the congregation, Mr. Stephenson's greeting, the handclasp across the sea, seemed to gain in significance when he began to preach his sermon. For in it he brought another message which, having no nationality, is the ultimate and only basis of internationalism. The text he selected was, "God so loved the world," and his sermon—strong, reverent, simple—was a proclaiming of the news which is "old news, new news, the best news," the heart and inspiration of the Christian religion throughout the world. Particularly did he emphasize the fact that the world can be regenerated and saved, not by men who lose patience with its welter of sin and suffering, but only by those whose love for it approaches the infinite tenderness and patience of God.

Mr. Stephenson is to preach at Highland Church throughout August. He is also making engagements for Sunday evening and week-day appointments at other churches around Boston. His illustrated lecture on Australia, given at Mount Vernon Church the evening of Aug. 8, was most enthusiastically received, and he expresses his willingness to give the same talk at other churches which may care to hear it. He may be addressed in care of The Congregationalist. H. F. M.

Two Memories of the International Council

By Alice Freeman Firman

Beside my thrills at Plymouth Rock, in my memory of the ten Council days in Boston, two little incidents stand out which are not recorded in any minutes. One was the sight of a group of small street urchins—so scantily clad they verged on immodesty—boisterously wending their way down Beacon Street toward the Common on July 5. They were punching each other in the head and using language which had a strangely familiar sound to one from the slums of Chicago.

I was seated at a table in a café when I caught sight of the boys across the street. They evidently were admiring the decorations on the front of the Congregational House and were speculating as to what was "doing."

At a table not far from me—but out of sight of the window—were seated a group of our leaders. Now, I ask you, if you ever noticed what a handsome, well-groomed lot of men lead in the affairs of our Congregational denomination? It seemed to me that day they looked more refined and better dressed than usual and I was proud of them! I suppose they were trying to settle the affairs of all the nations of the world as they ate their table d'hôte luncheon. But as I glanced at the urchins across the way—and then at the men around the table—I felt that between them there was a wide gulf—wider than Beacon Street!

And I reasoned this way: There are only a comparatively few of these big men—and they must stick to their end of the job—our great big world job. Let them wear good-looking clothes and eat the best lunches they can—or cannot—afford; and let them be "at home" in their studies and offices to the grand moguls—and grander foreign missionaries from all over the world. But let the rest of us—and our name is legion—who are neither great nor handsome, and who are utterly incapable of straightening out the League of Nations or the tangled industrial situation of our country—let us, I say, feel a personal responsibility for every small boy on the other side of the gulf. Who knows but what that tousle-headed boy, whose top garment was so ventilated as to show his spine to the onlooker, may, through the providence of God, and the personal touch of a consecrated Christian worker, some day become a James L. Barton and wear a Prince Albert coat and preside over an international gathering? Who knows? Doesn't it give one a thrill?

And the other incident was like the former, only different. I came out of a hotel near Mechanics Hall one of the last days of the Council and a tired-looking young woman, an utter stranger, overtook me and asked if I minded if she walked down the street with me. She said she had been wondering the past week what all the people were doing in Mechanics Hall. She had been so busy tending a telephone switch board for some of these very people that she'd had no chance to try to get into the meetings. "What's it all about, anyhow?" she said. And I—a daughter of the Pilgrims—tried to tell her before we reached the New Old South Church!

Then she told me her story—such a sad and sorry story—also as familiar in its general theme as the language of the boys on Beacon Street. I know from what she told me that she wondered if some of us Pilgrims weren't so busy talking about doing things that we had not taken time to do any of them. Here was the gulf again.

And I said to myself, as I went into that magnificent church and listened to some more inspiring addresses: How much we are all needed—all along the line! How necessary it is for the rank and file of us to bridge the gulf—so that the thrills that we get in our big gatherings (and on "our" Plymouth Rock!) may not stop with those who wear a yellow button—with or without the curled-up ribbon attached—but keep on and on till the humblest and farthest removed child of God also thrills.

Once more I thanked my Heavenly Father that "the lines are fallen unto me in"—places of opportunity—and that "I have a goodly heritage." Firman House, Chicago.

There are two freedoms—the false, where a man is free to do what he likes; the true, where a man is free to do what he ought.—Charles Kingsley.

The Summer at Chautauqua

The Religious Work and Forum Methods

By Rev. R. J. Chrystie, Ph.D.

The celebrated Chautauqua Institution is now in its forty-seventh annual Assembly. Founded in 1874 it has actually revolutionized the educational world of America and has come to be of national value from a religious standpoint. Chautauqua was never stronger or more popular than at the present time, fifty thousand people visiting its famous shrines each season. Founded on an essentially religious platform by the late Bishop Vincent, Chautauqua has always abided by its original traditions in the direct religious work department, and never more than now. The religious influence of the Assembly was never stronger than at present. Boundaries cannot be set to the religious spirit here, for it permeates the entire atmosphere of class rooms, fields, grove, lecture halls, and group life. People devoting themselves strictly to the educational work will surely feel the religious spirit and receive impressions of the value of a life of consecration to the religious ideal.

Dr. Shailer Mathews, Dean of the Divinity School of Chicago University, stands at the head of the religious department. The most prominent preachers of all denominations are called for preaching services, men like Bishop Herbert Welch, of Korea, Dr. Hugh T. Kerr, Pres. Lynn H. Hough, Prin. Alexander J. Grieve, Dr. Frederick Shannon, Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, and others. The morning devotional service in the great amphitheater is daily attended by nearly a thousand people and the messages open the inner experiences of the heart and lead to the highest Christian life, showing that religion is not a way of looking at certain things, but a certain way of looking at all things.

The missionary propaganda is given special prominence, a full week being devoted to the Home Missions Institute and another to the Foreign Missions Institute, with rallies, lectures, and study classes. A large new missions building will be erected for this department in the near future. A Sunday School Institute was also organized this year, with Miss Georgia E. Chamberlain as the principal leader. Its course of instruction affiliates with the teacher training work of the International Sunday School Association and will undoubtedly expand from year to year.

School of Forum Methods

The second annual Summer School of Open Forum Methods is also held at Chautauqua the present season. During the past year the forum idea has spread throughout the country more widely than ever. Pres. George W. Coleman and Mrs. Percy V. Pennybacker have toured certain portions of the country in the interests of this advance movement, with the result that forum centers have been established in many places. The movement is being further advanced by summer institutes and assemblies. The interest in the School of Forum Methods in Chautauqua last year was keen and general among the crowds that gather here, and the Open Forum National Council is receiving a welcome this year that insures a great advancement of its interests. Class-room sessions, amphitheater meetings, and general discussions under the lead of prominent forum leaders popularizes the propaganda and a larger sphere of service will surely result. Among these leaders are George W. Coleman, President of the National Council; Robert S. Holmes, one of the national directors; Miss Mabel B. Ury, Chief of the Red Cross Speakers' Bureau; Miss Louise Adams Grout, Chairman of the New York Forums; Prof. Charles Zueblin, noted forum lecturer; Rev. Howard Melish, rector of Holy Trinity Church, New York; Prof. S. H. Clark, University of Chicago; and others. Class-room instruction is given every morning and every afternoon, with forum meetings of a more public character in the evening. Questions from the audience are invited, and answered by experts. Professor Clark gives a Bible Drama Forum with readings and questions. Chautauqua welcomes the open forum idea to its programs.

Congregational Leaders

Chautauqua has always attracted the leaders of Congregationalism, Hillis, Campbell Morgan, Jefferson, King, Cadman, Gunsaulus, Graham Taylor, and many others. This year Congregationalists were particularly proud of their Chautauqua representatives. Dr. Herbert W. Gates and Prof. L. E. Weigle have both given courses of lectures that greatly strengthened the program. The Congregational Board of Education is co-operating with the Sunday School Institute and has sent to the Hall of the Christ a very complete and interesting exhibit of publications of interest to Sunday school workers of this denomination.

The Chautauqua Congregational Association was formed in 1878 and at the suggestion of Bishop Vincent, the Institution gave to Congregationalists a lot on one of the finest sites of the grounds, on which was built a denominational headquarters, and later, by its side, another building for a missions house. As many as four hundred have been registered here in a single season. With the expansion of the work these houses are proving too small and a movement is projected for putting up, as soon as funds can be raised, a new building that will replace both these present houses, a substantial brick structure that will cost some $25,000, and that will be the finest of all the denominational houses at Chautauqua and be adequate for all the various needs of the church in its social and missionary activities, as well as provide dormitories for its workers while at the Assembly. The Chautauqua Congregational Association is an incorporated body and its affairs are administered by a strong board of trustees. Donors may feel assured that money contributed for the new enterprise will be wisely invested. It is hoped Congregationalists will get behind this splendid venture and carry it to a successful consummation.

The Pilgrim Tercentenary was not forgotten the present year. Prin. Alexander J. Grieve of the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, Prof. L. E. Weigle, of Yale, Dr. A. E. Garvie, Principal of New College, London, and others lecturing on such themes as "John Robinson, Puritan," "The Message of the Mayflower," and "The Right and Duty of Freedom."

Chautauqua extends a cordial invitation to Congregationalists everywhere to visit its classic groves in increasing numbers.

Great Meetings of Christian Workers

The Northfield General Conference

By Rev. John Gardner, D.D.

Northfield, 1920, will be remembered for its thunder storms. They started on the first Saturday night when Dr. Tyndall was illustrating his lecture on ether waves, and found the lightning an able, if somewhat erratic assistant, ringing bells, etc., at unexpected moments; and after a few days' interval, became nightly visitors until the Conference terminated. The temperatures were not high, but the humidity was trying. There were compensations in that the country was never more beautiful and the mountain streams were full.

The usual crowds assembled. Every tent, every room in the village, even the dormitories at Mount Hermon, were requisitioned for the accommodation of the visiting hosts. Oklahoma and Montreal, New Orleans and Tokio, the Transvaal and Maine, contributed their quotas. As many as 350 ministers were counted at one sectional meeting. And what appetites these people have! They can stand seven meetings in one day, and clamor for more. I myself must have been consulted by over one hundred clergymen and church workers, and the other speakers were equally busy. Ninety-five meetings in all were held.

Northfield is unique. I know not what instinct guides Mr. William R. Moody in the selection of speakers. He brings together men of different types, and somehow makes them into a team. He tries to keep out of ruts. He seeks suggestion and criticism. He wants to help ministers. He never dictates to his speakers—they are unmuzzled. Yet men who have attended Northfield for years aver that "it is like old times," and "we have never had a better Conference."

Well-Known Speakers

The speakers were all well known at Northfield. Dr. Mel Trotter began his visits 21 years ago. Rev. Messrs. John McNeill and George Inglis were introduced in Dwight L. Moody's day. The others are newer men, but each was well known. Dr. Harris Kirk gave six or seven addresses. He is an outstanding preacher in Baltimore. He has imbibed the spirit of the Jewish prophets and sees things through their eyes. Words pour from his lips. He reads philosophy and propounds it. He is in no hurry in elucidating his theme. But he holds his audience from the start and the impact of argument and personality is strong. I esteem him one of the best preachers in the country.

Dr. John A. Hutton of Glasgow has a heavy handicap in a strong Scotch accent, and an intensity that sometimes makes it difficult to catch his words. Nevertheless he wins. His message is weighty. He is a cultivated and extremely well-read man. He knows more Russian authors than any man I have met. He is burdened with a sense of urgency for the establishment of the Kingdom of God as the only hope of the race. His message was always earnest and sometimes tender. John Hutton is coming to his own in Britain. His addresses at Northfield will enhance his reputation. Dr. John Stuart Holden is a rare combination. Refined and cultivated, there is a charm about his tone and gesture and style which can only be described as feminine. Yet he is virile and his message grips and moves his audience. His personality is that of a strong and versatile man. He has been the first man in a season to ascend the Matterhorn; he is a life member of Lord's, the premier cricket club of England; he has fine moral courage; he goes into the streets of London at the head of a mission band although rector of a fashionable West End church. He is a hard worker, ministering to a large congregation, editing a weekly paper, helping to direct the great convention at Keswick, presiding over a missionary training school. Think of a minister sending fifty of his young people as missionaries during a pastorate of fifteen years! Dr. Holden's preaching has the wooing note. I think, however, that his finest work was done at the ministers' meetings where he gave three addresses of real distinction, and must have transformed scores of lives.

Dr. James Vance of Nashville is too well known to need description. He is spoken of as the father of the Interchurch World Movement. Like many another child it became headstrong and willful, but he loves it still and believes in its future. He is a man of fine spirit, and has the elements of leadership. His messages are always clear and convincing. A man who is very popular at Northfield is the Rev. Mel Trotter of Grand Rapids, father of Rescue Missions all over the country. I was surprised at his development during the past two years. The abolition of the saloon has rendered the old-time Rescue Mission obsolete, but a new challenge is heard and is being responded to. Mr. Trotter means to meet the city man and the artisan in his own habitat and to challenge him in Christ's name. It will be a hard task, but unless I am mistaken this man will make good.

My own work was the Bible hour at nine o'clock each morning. I was requested to repeat a series of addresses on "The Apostolic Church," which I gave a year ago, only in an enlarged manner. People seem to be interested in origins of Christianity and appeared to think that I had something original to say. The newspapers of the East were more than generous in the amount of space they gave me. I had not anticipated preaching during this Conference but was persuaded into remaining for the concluding Sunday morning service when I spoke on "The Challenge of the Bystanders." Northfield has always been generous in its appreciation and I confess myself debtor to the men and women with whom I had friendly conference.

An Interdenominational Statesman

I presume it is fair to call Dr. Herring one of the few, if not indeed the pre-eminent interdenominational statesman of the last ten years. He has seen the meaning of present-day movements; he has shared the visions of the future with the most prophetic; but he has kept his poise and has not been swept by zeal away from the fixed and unalterable laws on which progress has been conditioned.

He has been identified with the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America almost from the outset, and in recent years has presided over meetings of its Executive Committee and has served on many of its most important committees, frequently as chairman. To the Interchurch World Movement he has given during the last twelve months labor almost equalling in amount that required by the duties of his regular office, as a member of the General Committee and of the Executive Committee, and more recently, when troubles and perplexities have multiplied, of a special committee on reorganization. When the American Council on Organic Union was projected, by invitation of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., he naturally was a representative of the Congregational churches, and naturally he became a member of the Ad Interim Committee, and of its sub-committees, until naturally again, by a law of natural selection, he was the man who gave—I think it is not invidious to say—the largest measure of influence to the plans which were finally shaped and agreed upon by that body. I presume the Congregationalists would term him the guiding and controlling spirit—if not the leading spirit—in the "Concordat" with the Episcopalians.

He was a member of the American Mayflower Council, a member of its Executive Committee and of its Finance Committee, and within a few weeks took the Acting Chairmanship of the Finance Committee, because of the absence of its chairman, Dr. H. A. Atkinson, in Europe. The last committee meeting which I attended with him was that of the Executive Committee of the American Mayflower Council in New York on the afternoon of July 29. He then was thinking of the significance of the Pilgrim Contribution to America in terms of international relationships, national righteousness and race assimilations in this our great nation through the processes of Christian Americanization.

A Presidential Proclamation

THE PILGRIM TERCENTENARY

My fellow countrymen: Dec. 21 next will mark the tercentenary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth in 1620. The day will be becomingly celebrated at Plymouth under the auspices of the Plymouth Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission and at other localities in Massachusetts. While this is proper and praiseworthy, it seems to me that the influences which the ideals and principles of the Pilgrims with respect to civil liberty and human rights have had upon the formation and growth of our institutions and upon our development and progress as a nation merit more than a local expression of our obligation, and make fitting a nation wide observance of the day.

I, therefore, suggest and request that the 21st of December next be observed throughout the Union with special patriotic services, in order that the great events in American history that have resulted from the landing of these hardy and courageous navigators and colonists may be accentuated to the present generation of American citizens. Especially do I recommend that the day be fittingly observed in the universities, colleges and schools of our country, to the end that salutary and patriotic lessons may be drawn from the fortitude and perseverance and the ideals of this little band of church men and women who established on this continent the first self-determined government based on the great principle of just law and its equal application to all, and thus planted the seeds from which has sprung the mighty nation.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed, done in the District of Columbia, the fourth day of August in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Nine Hundred and Twenty, and of the Independence of the United States of America the 145th.

WOODROW WILSON.

I sat with him on the afternoon of July 13 in Wallace Lodge, Yonkers, N. Y., when the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook, which had been appointed by the General Wartime Commission of the Churches, was trying to appraise rightly the influence and the effects of the war upon Christian Unity. His voice was heard not simply reporting upon the effects of the war throughout the Congregational brotherhood, but in interpreting the changes which have been wrought in all of the churches and upon the religious life of America. His contacts with religion in America have been most intimate and he could speak as one "having authority."

With the Home Missions Council, which was organized in 1908, Dr. Herring has been closely identified from the beginning. It was the natural field into which his interests and his activities should move. As Secretary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society he would never play a lone hand, against all other home missionary agencies. He exemplified the spirit of co-operation; he was superb at team-work. With representatives of other denominations he made several significant deputation visits to Western states to set in operation joint enterprises. I accompanied the party of choice spirits on one of these trips. Dr. Herring, without any assumption on his part, was naturally a leader. His unfailing good nature, his practical common sense, his spiritual vision, were great assets to the company. How his boyishness—even a kind of prankishness—relieved the strain and made burdens lighter!

When he was taken up into the higher service of the Congregational National Council, the Home Missions Council provided for honorary membership with the sole intention of retaining him; and until this last January he was the only Honorary Member of the Council. He responded to all that is implied in this relationship. At the time of his death he was a member of the Executive Committee of the Home Missions Council, technically no longer a home missionary agent, but retained and serving, because of his personal interests and his sacrificial commitments.

Some things said to me, and some tokens of weariness observed, lead me to believe that that great life was not stopped by the waters off Martha's Vineyard, but that the heart failed really because of great services which he had rendered to the church which he so greatly loved.

As the Australian Delegates See Us

By Rev. A. R. Stephenson

From Melbourne to Boston is a far cry nearly half round the world. The invitation to appoint delegates for the International Congregational Council at Boston reached our Australasian association and a company of seven of us responded. We travelled by the S. S. Vestura, and the Roman Catholic prelate, Dr. Mannix, was amongst the passengers. Each Sunday morning and evening we conducted services in the first and second saloons and these were well attended. We sent a wireless message to San Francisco announcing our approach and we were met on the wharf by Dr. Kelsey of the American Board of Missions. On the following day the Ministers' Fraternal Association gave us a kind reception and entertained us at lunch and we had various experiences of American hospitality while in the city.

On the Wednesday evening we went to the week-night service at the First Congregational Church, where Dr. Gordon of San Francisco addressed about 1,200 people. His address consisted of breezy answers to questions religious, political and social. We wondered if this was the usual attendance at the week-night services in America. We have since found that some fall below that number. On the Sunday morning we attended the First Congregational Church again and in the evening at Oaklands (Dr. Van Horn). The style of the services differed from our own and the "Salutation of the Flag" was a feature new to us. At Salt Lake City we continued our introduction to "the biggest things in the world." Wonderful as is the Mormon Temple and its adjuncts, we wondered still more at the type of men and women they can get to apparently believe their curious faith. They can make fine buildings, get big crowds to their services and make big money in their commercial undertakings. If these are proofs of the success of a religion, the Mormons have achieved success. At Chicago Dr. McCollum and Dr. Gammon did what they could for us. The writer had the privilege of preaching at Ravenswood in the morning (Rev. John Thomas) and at Powell St. in the evening. Since then he has preached at a number of our churches and so have the others. We find the congregations offer us greetings after the service with a genuine cordiality which in its volume is fresh to us, but at the same time is heartily appreciated by us. Our folk are less demonstrative in this way. The classic prayer for the minister by the Welsh deacon, "Lord, keep him humble, we'll keep him poor," might not be answered if appreciation is too generously expressed.

Arrived at Boston we duly registered at the Mechanics Hall and were assigned to various hospitable homes, and during the week attended the meetings, with what fidelity we could. The meetings were full of delightful interest, it was fine to hear men talk whose names are known around the world. The method of conducting the service of praise was a new feature to us. We hastened from gathering to gathering, but while Boston is a charming city it is not easy for a stranger to find his way around very quickly and several fine meetings we missed. To us there was a real delight in hearing some American orators with the best of the characteristics we associate with their best men. The promoters of this great gathering should not be discouraged if they are forced to acknowledge that the speeches and discussions did not quite achieve the expected interest and enthusiasm. The large attendance of delegates required extensive accommodation and the meetings were widely scattered and the companies broken up. Continuity of interest was difficult. But if every hoped-for result was not secured, yet we all acknowledge the great benefit and help secured from the gatherings. The cordial receptions, the unwearying attention of the able officers who cared for our many needs, the splendid zeal which secured the excellence of the historical and missionary exhibits, the fine picnics to Plymouth and Provincetown and the hospitality of the churches there, and through all the general courtesy of all our American hosts and hostesses, all united to make this memorable visit a time of profit and usefulness to us all.

Prohibition and its influence we were all eager to learn about and made inquiries among all classes regarding it. To rid the country of this strangling monster has been a Herculean performance and we shall return to Australia stronger advocates than ever for the evident benefits of prohibition for our own country. The attitude of the United States to the League of Nations and to the Irish question had puzzled and distressed us in Australia and we find that many Americans were equally puzzled and distressed by this.

The multitude of denominations makes the problem of a United Church of America harder to solve here than it is with us. And at the same time this very variety makes all efforts toward that end of more insistent importance. Every country has its own problems, largely they are the common problems of the race; we shall go back to Australia with renewed zeal of service, much strengthened in doing our work for the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth.

East St. Hilda Church, Melbourne.

Dr. Gunsaulus in New York

As an evidence of the strength and popularity of Congregational ministers, St. Nicholas Collegiate Church, the New York church of Theodore Roosevelt, and the oldest church in the city, has invited two of our clergymen to be supplies during the summer season. Dean Charles R. Brown is to fill the vacancy in September and Dr. Frank Gunsaulus in August. I had the privilege of hearing the great Chicago preacher the second Sunday in August, morning and night.

At the morning hour the church was well filled, including the gallery, and the distinguished divine took as his text the "sea of fire" John saw, developing with consummate skill the theme of the necessity of holding the negative and positive elements of the character in one strong unity. The message was delivered with the characteristic vigor of the speaker, and abounded in telling epigrams such as these: "Have we exchanged fervor for fever?" "No virtue is safe that is not enthusiastic."

At the evening hour the church was almost as full as at the morning hour, notwithstanding the intense heat reflected from the pavements of Fifth Avenue. Many who were there in the morning returned in the evening to hear his treatment of the subject announced in the morning, "Henry Ward Beecher." By his skillful treatment the great preacher seemed to live again before the audience, some of whom had known him personally. Dr. Gunsaulus took up that phase of the life indicated by his humor as based on "the joy of the Lord." He closed the biographical discourse with telling effect by rehearsing the anecdote of the newsboy whose stock had been overturned by the rainstorm in Fulton Street, when Mr. Beecher appeared on the scene. "What is the matter, my boy?" asked the great preacher, looking sympathetically down into the eyes of the disturbed lad. "Nuthin', sir, since you have come," responded the lad confidently. "That," declared Mr. Gunsaulus, "typified the coming of the Christ into the world. It was as if Christ had asked the world what is the matter with it. 'Nothing, Master, since you have come!'" That, he declared, was the gist of Mr. Beecher's great sermon which he heard one morning on "What Christ Means to Me."

The morning sermon was forty-five minutes and the evening fifty, and the audience stayed and was glad. H. H. P.

The Question of Ministerial Dress

Dear Mr. Editor:

You answer so well many questions, wise and otherwise, I wish you would enlighten me concerning the following query: Why do so many of the "brethren" dress and seemingly want to look like "preachers" instead of like men?

I am a youngster in His service. I despise Prince Alberts, black hats, and "ministerial" ways in general. Tell me, is a "mode" necessary to our profession? Couldn't we serve better, if we dressed, acted and looked like ordinary men?

You probably know that there are a great number of young preachers who feel the same way about this matter, and I am sure that they, like myself, would appreciate a word of counsel.

LINCOLN MACKENZIE.

Why Mechanics Hall?

Dear Mr. Editor:

Will you permit one who had the privilege for several months of being closely associated with the Committee of Arrangements and the Boston Local Committee of Arrangements for the recent International Council to speak briefly concerning certain criticisms of that great gathering which have appeared in the Congregationalist and Advance?

Of course no one, least of all the committees who were behind the scenes, would claim that all the arrangements and their execution were perfect.

At the outset two courses were possible. One would have been to arrange for a select body of representative men to come together and spend a week or more in intimate fellowship and frank discussion of important themes. The other course, which was the one adopted, was to call together the largest possible number of our people from all lands and to make the Council a worthy demonstration of what has come out of the great adventure of the Pilgrims. To this end every Congregational church in the world was invited to send as many delegates as it would. At the time when this course was decided upon and for months afterward it was intended to hold the sessions in Tremont Temple, contrary to the statment of one of your contributors that it was the fact of holding the meetings in Mechanics Building that gave the committee courage to invite delegates from all the churches.

As the plans developed it became evident that Tremont Temple would not give sufficient room and at a joint meeting of the two committees the whole matter was discussed. There was decided difference of opinion, but the urgent representations of a member of the Boston Local Committee carried the day and there was a practically unanimous vote to go to Mechanics Building.

Almost every defect in the carrying out of the program was due to the largeness of the plans and the wonderful way in which Congregational people responded. Had there been only a few hundred chosen men and women present everything would have gone smoothly. But in that case we should not have had the wonderful celebration of the Pilgrim tercentenary which we did have and at least two thousand people would not have carried away the inspiration and renewed courage which came to them through their contact with Congregationalism in its world-wide sweep.

For Christian Teachers

Dear Mr. Editor:

Your Educational Number is full of good things. The Editorial Message is a needed word for the hour. But I want to say that the best and most cheering word in the whole number is the statement that faculty members at Olivet in future must not only have satisfactory scholarship degrees, but be Christian men and women. Are there any other colleges who still adhere to this which used to be the policy of all colleges calling themselves Christian? The failure of much of our teaching may be traced to a lack of the motive and power that come from a vital Christian faith. Mere scholarship never yet made a real teacher. Nothing has ever shaken my loyalty to my own Alma Mater like its failure to continue this ideal of its earlier days. If you could call all the so-called Christian colleges back to this ideal I, for one, would have no fears for the future of education.

IN THE CONGREGATIONAL CIRCLE

How They Do It

An Exchange of Methods in Church Work

The Gospel Chariot

By Bliss Isely

Motor busses used by United, Wichita, Kan., have solved the problem of caring for members of an abandoned down-town parish and at the same time have boosted attendance so much that it is necessary to build a new $200,000 edifice to care for the crowds. The Sunday schools are filled to overflowing and what is more the children—and grown folks, too—come on time.

The motor service was started in November, 1919, when United was formed by the merger of Plymouth and College Hill Congregational churches. College Hill was situated in the newer residence district of Wichita, while Plymouth, near the business center, was growing steadily weaker as its members moved to the newer residence sections. It was decided to abandon Plymouth and merge the memberships into one organization which would use the College Hill property. Then came the problem of holding the down-town congregation. Street cars are slow and necessitate transfers with resultant delays.

Going to Church by Motor

Then some one thought of motor busses—Gospel chariots, they call them now. Two big cars, belonging to a Wichita "jitney" company, were chartered at a cost of $1.50 a Sunday for each. The chauffeurs contracted to drive through the old Plymouth parish, get their loads at specified corners, and arrive at the church on the hill at 10 A.M. They then returned to their regular bus lines, returning at 12 o'clock to take the passengers home. A regular schedule was worked out by Rev. C. C. Burger, who had been pastor of Plymouth, and was retained as co-pastor with Rev. H. C. Herring, Jr., of College Hill.

"Now, if you are not at your corner on time you will miss the car," explained Mr. Burger.

So on the first Sunday after motors were chartered, little Betty Christie, Ben Schermerhorn, Gene Robinson, Genevieve Kirk and all the other little folks of old Plymouth parish watched the clock as they never had watched it before on a Sunday morning. Not one was late. More persons came than the management had counted on and both busses were filled to overflowing. Later it was necessary to add other cars.

Neither the Plymouth nor College Hill Sunday schools had been noted for punctuality before the merger, but the motor cars changed that as far as the Plymouth group was concerned. They were at their classes at 10 A.M. Tardy ones from the College Hill parish gasped when they arrived and saw the crowds before them.

The next Sunday little Vera Darling of the Hill contingent remarked to her mother: "We'll hurry this time 'cause we don't want the Plymouth folks to beat us when they come so far." Similar speeches were made in other homes on College Hill and the second Sunday saw better attendance. The germ of promptness spread until the school has almost a perfect record for punctuality.

Attendance received a great impetus. In a short time the merged congregations, both in church and in Sunday school, were larger than both congregations taken singly had been. Parents of Plymouth parish had been content to send their children to Sunday school alone as long as the church was near home, but when it involved a ride of several miles the parents went with their youngsters. Furthermore no provision was made for motor trips to the 11 o'clock preaching service and old folks had to go with their children or miss the motor altogether. The reaction on College Hill grown-ups was immediate. When parents on the hill observed Plymouth fathers and mothers going to Sunday school with their children they, too, attended.

The most remarkable feature of the merger is that every regular attendant at services in old Plymouth remained as a regular attendant at United. The motor bus service is responsible for that condition, as there were members who would have given up church altogether, or would have attended some of the more convenient down-town houses of worship if it had not been for the Gospel chariot.

Utilizing the Church Basement

By Marjorie E. W. Smith

"The banker is careful to see that the barber he gets for a tenant for the rooms in the basement is a good one, one that he can recommend. He knows that such a tenant will attract patronage to his building and incidentally to his bank. . . . The church needs something in the basement. The young men and women are drifting to the call of attractions outside of the church, and the church must provide attractions that will hold them. . . . What we need is a seven-day church."

So spoke the governor of Iowa in January, 1917, and at least one church in Des Moines is fulfilling the governor's idea of what a church should be and do. It was one April afternoon that I had arranged for a meeting at Plymouth Church, Des Moines, at half-past two. Imagine my surprise upon entering the building to hear a great noise and shouting, a commotion very different from the sacred quiet one usually finds in houses of worship.

"Come on, Joe, let's you and me work up."

"Say, I betcha I cun beetcha to that there post."

"It's my turn."

Dr. J. E. Kirbye, pastor of Plymouth, smiled at the question on my face, and explained that the noise came from the playground. Then he took me downstairs into a large room gay with dozens of little children. As he entered, 15 or 20 of them ran to him, crying, "Is the skatin' rink goin' to be open?" "Open de rink. I wasn't here las' time." "Why doncher open de rink?"

When he told them that he would open it, every child seemed to yell "The skatin' rink's open." "Come an' skate." Some of the children preferred to stay and swing in the playroom, ride the merry-go-round, shoot-the-chutes, or bob in the bobber. Some played games and others listened with wide eyes to a story of the East, begging for another story as soon as it was finished.

Then Dr. Kirbye took me away from these happy children into a smaller room. About the walls I saw evidence of an enthusiastic Camp Fire Club which holds its meetings here every Friday. A Boy Scouts organization also meets regularly in the church. Seated about a long table in this room were 15 or 20 little girls busily sewing. One practical little girl was making a nightgown for her doll so that it would not muss its dress at night. She said that she did not have much time to play with

"Beatrice," because she had a little baby brother to take care of at home, and added sagely, "Boys is hard to manage."

Naturally I wanted to know all about the playground in Plymouth church, why it was in a church, and how it ever came into existence.

When Dr. Kirbye came to the Plymouth Congregational Church of Des Moines, Io., he found it to be a large building with a cemented basement under all of it. Only a small portion was in use, while the rest was dark and dingy. Plymouth is situated on the edge of the business district. Every day Dr. Kirbye saw scores of children playing in the streets. As he was thinking of some means of amusing them in a safer and cleaner way, he remembered the large room in the basement of his church. Why not clean it out, put swings and shoot-the-chutes in it and let them play there?

So the coal was removed into a much smaller room, the walls, windows, and floors were relieved of the cobwebs and dirt, and lights were put in. Then one day some of the men of the church came and sawed and hammered until they had completed dozens of little benches just the right height for their small friends. Three chain swings were hung where there was plenty of room to swing as high as one could wish. Finally, then, there came from the factory the shoot-the-chutes, the bobber, and a little red merry-go-round which the children could run themselves.

Every afternoon so many children came to the playground that it became necessary to find some other form of entertainment. Next to the playroom was the immense dining-room which was used two or three times a month. The tables and chairs were piled up in one corner of the room, thirty pairs of roller skates were donated, and the dining-room beeame a skating rink.

So it is that Dr. Kirbye's church has something in the basement, and a great many children are happier in consequence.

This was before we were in the war, but one Saturday evening in September, 1917, I was again passing by Plymouth Church. Lights were streaming out of the windows in the basement, and I supposed that there was probably some entertainment going on for the children. As I neared the building, the strains of the Missouri Waltz floated through the air. Glancing in at the open windows, I saw that the room was filled with soldiers and girls.

The next day I again called to see Dr. Kirbye, this time not as a visitor to the playground, but to find out why they had dances in the church. When Camp Dodge was built, Des Moines immediately began making preparations for its new responsibility, that of affording the soldier in his leisure hours proper and wholesome entertainment. Plymouth Church was far from backward in this work, and at the end of a few weeks the large room which had once served as a dining-room and again as a skating rink was converted into a most cosy reading, writing and entertainment room for the soldiers. It was called Plymouth Center, and the members of Plymouth Church and their friends responded whole-heartedly to the work of making it a happy and inspiring home for the men going to the front. A piano, victrola, numerous books and magazines, tables, chairs, and rugs were contributed, and Plymouth Center soon became very homelike and restful. In addition to the articles contributed, hundreds of dollars were spent in further furnishings and in upkeep.

At least once a week, usually three times a week, from 100 to 150 soldiers were entertained by the Girls' Volunteer Aid, and other patriotic organizations here. These "parties," not dances, never varied from this plan, namely, that part of the evening should be devoted to a program of music, speeches, dramatics, etc., supervised dancing under the direction of a war worker, and refreshments furnished by the organization entertaining. The parties opened at 7.30 and always closed promptly at 10.30.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

Even if one does not enjoy the church service, it is unwise to neglect it, for the preacher is the dentist that fills the cavities of the soul.

Every Sunday afternoon after the special vesper services of splendid music and interesting speakers, the soldiers enjoyed a homey hour in the Center. They were always served coffee, doughnuts, and sandwiches by the church free of charge, and many times three hundred or more soldiers were served dinner. After the little informal hour, the men were invited to stay for the Christian Endeavor meeting.

This personal work with the soldiers themselves was carried on in Plymouth Church basement, all during the war. In addition to this, under the direction of Mrs. Zoe Pearl Park, then director of the church music, hundreds of young women here received military training. Large classes in Red Cross and First Aid work also met in the church regularly.

Now that the war is over, Plymouth Center is being put to another use. Carloads of clothes were gathered together there and sent to the Armenians, Syrians and Jews. Into this headquarters for this work there has come from the state of Iowa a large amount of money to be sent across the water, in addition to the clothing and such other supplies as have come in for the destitute of the nearer East.

For years now Plymouth basement has been an active force for good, and so Plymouth Church has become a seven-day church in the best possible way.

Successful Campaign for Money

By Ethelind J. Bristol

Don't let any one say, "It Can't Be Done." The older members of First, Milford, Ct., said it, but we did it just the same.

Our church was having changes made which required new and additional lights, costing about $100. The Christian Endeavor Society was asked to pay for them. As we had not sufficient funds, the question was how to do it. Our pastor suggested a way he had seen worked out and we decided at least to try it.

The plan was to have the different members of the Society earn the money by doing odd jobs outside of their regular work, or by saving. It must not be taken out of their regular salary. We counted on 50 members earning $2 each, or twenty cents each for the next 10 weeks. We put our campaign on a military basis with our President as Captain, and 10 Lieutenants under her. The 10 Lieutenants were members of the Executive Board of the Society. We then "drafted" the members into service, giving the Captain and Lieutenants each five members under them. Each Lieutenant reported every Sunday night, on a chart made by one of our young men, the amount each member of his or her team had made during the week. By this chart we knew who were slackers and which team was ahead. The "dead" ones were replaced by others, drafted in their place.

A prize was offered for the person earning the most money, one for the team bringing in the largest amount, and one for the person telling the best story of "How I Earned My Money." Then we had an Experience Social and each told his or her experience.

Our social was a supper, the admission was the money we earned, and only those who had worked could come. Some one played popular war songs, and we formed a "bread line," and marched around tables where we received our rations. We sat down in two semi-circles, facing an artificial camp-fire and ate our supper, after which we turned out all the lights except those covered with red crepe paper and told our story, and awarded the prizes. The prizes were silver Christian Endeavor pins.

The most money earned by one person was $10, and the largest amount by one team about $35. Nearly all the teams went "over the top." We advertised in the church calendar that any one having odd jobs to be done would please notify the President and she would send them some one. We did things we had never done before, such as getting the minister's dinner and serving it when he had guests, dusting, scrubbing floors, shampooing our own hair, chopping down trees, painting, sifting ashes, saving carfare, and many other things.

We paid $121 for the lights in the church and chapel, paid the expenses of our social (prizes, etc.), and had $25 left toward another big job.

LOMBARD has recently purchased for a parsonage the property adjoining that of the church.

ILLINI. Rev. C. L. Belknap has resigned the pastorate of this church to accept a call to the church recently organized by State Evangelist Spooner at South Pekin. During the year and eight months which Mr. Belknap has served this field ten have been received into the membership of the church, $5,875 pledged to the Mid-West Leadership Fund and $5,000 to the Pilgrim Memorial Fund.

Brodhead Forces Increased

Recently the church of BRODHEAD was reshingled and repairs were made to the parsonage and outbuildings, at a cost close to $500. At the May communion, 24 persons were received into membership, 19 of them coming by letter from the local Presbyterian church, which has been disbanded, two on re-confession of faith, and three on confession.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Young People's Camps

The three Young People's Camps planned by the Conference of South Dakota were carried into successful operation this summer at Blue Dog Lake, Waubay, under the direction of Rev. Carl P. Bast of Milbank; at Placerville in the Black Hills, under the supervision of Rev. Glen Lindley of Rapid City; and at Lake Andes under the guidance of Rev. Malcolm Miller of Armour.

The Black Hills Conference carried away attendance honors with a registration of sixty young people. Waubay stood second with twenty-nine in spite of the terrific and unprecedented rains just before the conference. Bridges and roads were washed out and many thus kept from attending. The situation at Lake Andes was not as favorable—the attendance was small and it may be best next year to hold this conference in another place. The Waubay people supported the Blue Dog Lake conference loyally, attending the evening sessions and the Sunday services and helping in many ways. One evening they gave a basket supper for all of the delegates. The lake is beautiful and the pavilion makes an ideal meeting place and this conference should be much larger next year. The Hills conference is already faced with the necessity of limiting the registration until more accommodations can be provided. It is hoped that an assembly hall can be erected soon, built of logs, to be in keeping with the rest of the camp. The beauty of the spot with its towering hills and roaring mountain stream, combined with its comparative seclusion and the possibility of additional buildings will eventually make this conference camp a rival of Estes Park and Lake Geneva.

The program included morning classes in mission method and material under the direction of Miss Mary Lamberton of the W. B. M. I. and in church school organization and Young People's work, the latter classes taught by Mr. Paul R. Reynolds from the Chicago office of the Education Society. The afternoons were crowded full with swimming, games, hikes, boating and all sorts of recreation. Stories, stunts, sing-songs, boat rides, campfires, heart-to-heart talks by the leaders, and quiet devotion periods filled the evening hours.

Space does not permit mentioning all the leaders. Mrs. Alan M. Fairbank had charge of the girls' activities in the Hills conference. She had a splendid program for the girls and was always ready at the Campfire with special stunts and songs. There were many others, pastors and wives, who came to enrich the spirit of the camps and touch the lives of the young people in this wholesome way. The spirit and success of the undertakings is perhaps typified by the following quotation taken from the letter of one young man who came to the Waubay Conference for one day, Sunday: "Believe me, I am going to be there at the first tap of the gong next year and I won't miss anything from start to finish."

petition in a field where there is hardly room for more than one religious organization.

Mr. McRae has proved himself an energetic leader, having built up the membership of the church school to more than double its number in 1916, organized a Young People's Society, held special meetings and generally made the church a community center. The musical ability of the pastor and his wife has added to the attractiveness of many programs. Mr. McRae also helped the church to erect a new house of worship, which was dedicated in October 1918. The church voted in the spring of this year to increase the salary to $1,800 and parsonage, so that a good opportunity awaits the minister who shall undertake this pastorate. S. E. B.

TENNESSEE

Chattanooga Holds Memorial Services

In the shade of the large pin oak trees set out by the Congregational missionaries 103 years ago at Bird's Mill, on May 30 members of PILGRIM, CHATTANOOGA, held memorial services. Bird's Mill is seven miles east of Chattanooga in a flourishing farming section and situated on the south bank of the Chickamauga River. The site of this old mission, which was the first established by the American Board, was selected in 1816 by a Cherokee Indian and Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, representing the Board. The mission was opened in 1817 and closed in 1838 when the Cherokees were removed west of the Mississippi. It was first named Chickamauga, but in 1818 when Jeremiah Evarts, a member of the Board, visited it, the name was changed to Brainerd after the pioneer Indian missionary.

It was here that Rev. Samuel Worcester, the first corresponding secretary of the Board, came on a visit. Dr. Worcester reached here May 25, 1821 and died the following June. Just before his death he said, "I had rather leave my poor remains here than at any other place."

It is remarkable the amount of good accomplished at this mission from the beginning. The first year Rev. Mr. Kingsbury preached to an audience of 100 each Sunday morning. The boarding school was such a success that many Cherokee applicants had to be refused admission. Among the many Indian converts here some of them became noted leaders. One was Miss Catherine Brown, a half-breed, who was converted while attending school, and later became an earnest spiritual teacher in her tribe.

WHERE AMERICAN BOARD MISSIONARIES SERVED MORE THAN 100 YEARS AGO

What remains of the old mill established 103 years ago at the first mission at Brainerd, Tenn., now known as Bird's Mill. Some of the visitors are shown examining the old relic. The top floor has been added since the missionaries first erected the building.

It was fitting that the Congregationalists of Chattanooga should hold services on the same spot where a century ago heroic men and women worked with great sacrifice for the salvation of the Cherokees. The exercises on May 30 were simple but impressive. Mr. C. W. Lusk, Chairman of the Board of Trustees, and teacher of the Pilgrim Men's Bible Class, presided. Robert S. Walker, President of the Pilgrim Men's Club, was historian for the day. In introducing him, Mr. Lusk said that it was fitting that he should have been selected for this subject, since he was born within three miles of the old mission on the Chickamauga in an old house the logs of which were hewed out by the Cherokees, and that as a young man he brought grain to the mill to be ground. In opening his story, Mr. Walker made a demonstration with an old Cherokee mortar and pestle, showing how they ground their meal. Rev. M. S. Freeman, pastor of Pilgrim, gave a brief address of the work accomplished by the American Board and its great growth. The most impressive service was held in the afternoon in the old neglected graveyard. Standing by the old marble monument that marks the grave of Dr. Worcester, Mr. Freeman read the last letter written by Dr. Worcester and placed a wreath of flowers on his grave.

All that now remains of the mission is the stone foundation of one of the old buildings; the four large pin oak trees; the old graveyard containing the graves of about 100 people; the remains of the old mill, and Mission Ridge, the faithful old landmark of nature that lies between this old mission and Lookout Mountain, which will forever perpetuate the efforts and sacrifices made by these early missionaries to this country.

Ludlow Responds to Cause of Missions

In spite of a small membership Mabel Memorial, Ludlow, Rev. C. H. Plummer, pastor, has contributed $200 to missions during the present year. A new building is much needed. The finances of this church are all raised by a contribution box which is placed at the church door, no individual pledges being made. Mr. Plummer was formerly in the Episcopal Church, leaving that body in 1904 to enter the Methodist Church. He became a Congregational minister by license Nov. 11, 1906, being ordained at Corbin, Ky., March 3, 1920.

Savannah Has Cottage Prayer Meetings

Savannah, Rev. J. C. Cromer, pastor, has received more than 20 members since January. The regular prayer meeting in the church has been supplanted by the cottage meeting. The pastor takes 15 minutes, talking on the Pilgrims and church history. He follows Dr. T. P. Prudden's booklet, "Congregationalists, Who They Are and What They Do," supplementing this feature with material from the current numbers of The Congregationalist and from his own experiences in Pilgrim country here, in England and Holland. Twenty minutes are given to a devotional topic and prayer, and this is followed by a social time. For village and country parishes the cottage meeting provides needed social contact, catches up new people as it goes the rounds of the homes and keeps good feeling among people.

MASSACHUSETTS

Innovations at Edwards, Northampton

A Sunday morning story and occupation hour for the primary and junior church school children was held during July at Edwards, Northampton, under the direction of Miss Helen Story. The younger children dramatized Bible stories told by Miss Doris Hallett, a public school primary teacher, while the older ones made a set of Oriental models, under Miss Story's supervision, for the use of the church school. A fifteen minute assembly period closed the hour. The attendance was unexpectedly large and much interest was shown.

Through the initiative of the Edwards Endeavorers, the young people's societies of the Congregational, Baptist and Methodist churches have united in conducting a community vesper service this month on the Smith College campus. Hotel guests, members of the college summer school, and other occasional visitors have enjoyed these services, and the good attendance shows that the service fills a real need. It is hoped that community vespers will become a regular feature of the summer church activity.

Lynnfield Church 200 Years Old

Lynnfield Center, which began its existence 200 years ago this month as the Second Parish Church of Lynn, has not much of the old Congregational blood left, but it is earnestly endeavoring to meet the needs of the community. There is a spirit of union and good will that promises well for the future. A change in the constitution last year made provision for an associate membership list and this year, after the every family canvass, over 40 names were enrolled. At the annual meeting the reports showed good interest in the different departments, with more than $200 left in the treasury. The salary of the pastor, Rev. F. D. George, was increased $300.

Pilgrim Tercentenary Collection of Sixteenth and early Seventeenth Century Dissenting Books and Manuscripts

Incunabula of English Dissent. Over three hundred items, most of which are not to be found in American libraries, including many unique or extremely scarce works—a private library.

All kinds of celebrations have been planned in honor of the Pilgrim Tercentenary. Most of these only last a few days. What better way of celebrating than for some American institution or individual to purchase this collection as a permanent memorial of the Pilgrims?

PITTSBURGH BIBLE INSTITUTE

Prepares for the Gospel ministry and for all forms of Christian work. Tuition is free. Students may enter at any time.
The student of little means and even of no means is given an opportunity for training.
The Institute stands for the full inspiration of Scripture; the full Godhead; the Deity of our Lord; the blood Atonement; the necessity of regeneration, and the work of the Holy Spirit.
It differs from most Bible Institutes in its teaching on the Ages.
Send for its Prospectus and for some of its free sermons and tracts. For further information, address

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

Personals

ALLEN, E. B. In an article which was published in the Christian Century, John Spargo, the famous socialist, spoke disparagingly of the work of the Christian ministry and questioned its helpfulness. The article stirred up so much comment that the Christian Century offered a prize for the best answer to Mr. Spargo's arguments. About seventy manuscripts were received and six were published. The readers were asked to vote which reply should be given the prize. It went to Rev. Ernest Bourner Allen, pastor of Pilgrim Congregational Church, Oak Park, Ill., by a large vote.

MOORE, LEON, and wife, Curtis, Neb., were "surprised" on the eve of their departure for the vacation by about a hundred friends who gave them a generous purse of money with the admonition not to return "till it's all gone."

NICHOLS, N. R., Congress Park, Ill., was the recipient recently of a gift of $80 from friends of his one-time parish, Norwich, Vt. The gift was in recognition of the 80th anniversary of his birth.

READE, MR. JOSIAH T., who was elected clerk of First Church, Lombard, Ill., in 1873, and held that office for 43 consecutive years, celebrated his 91st birthday on Aug. 4. Mr. Reade has given himself unsparingly to the church and community. He is still in active business, traveling back and forth to Chicago each day and between times acts as business and financial manager, custodian and librarian of the Lombard Free Public Library of more than 4,000 volumes.

TYLER, W. A., Crete, Neb., has been elected Associate Superintendent of the Nebraska Congregational Conference. Dr. Tyler will begin the new task about the middle of September, devoting his time largely to mission churches.

REV. FRANK FALES LEWIS

Rev. Frank Fales Lewis, who died on the morning of July 7 at the hospital in Geneseo, Ill., was born in Stillman Valley, Ill., Nov. 11, 1861. He was the only son of L. M. (late of Stillman Valley) and Mrs. Helen Lewis. The early period of his life was spent on the farm where he attended the district school. At the early age of fifteen years he united with the Congregational church at Stillman Valley. He prepared for college at Ottawa, Kan., entering Beloit College in 1880, from which institution he was graduated with honors in 1884. After a period spent in teaching and kindred service he entered Yale Theological Seminary, graduating therefrom with the class of '88. Immediately following his graduation from the seminary he was married to Miss Mary G. Allen. To this marriage were born three sons, Mason and Selwyn, now of Chicago, and Allen of Wisconsin, who with the widow and aged mother survive him.

His first pastorate was at Putney, Vt., where after five years of service he resigned to accept a position as joint field secretary for the state societies of Sunday School and Christian Endeavor, in that state. Later he was assistant pastor at the First Congregational Church in Burlington, Vt. He also, during his stay in Vermont, organized a church at Hardwick and was instrumental in the erection of an attractive house of worship there.

Following this period of service with churches in Vermont, Mr. Lewis had pastorates in Nebraska, Wisconsin and Illinois. At the time of his death he had just moved to a new field in Cornwall, Ill., from which he was borne to the hospital in Geneseo never to return.

Mr. Lewis had traveled quite extensively in foreign parts, particularly in the Holy Land. He was quite successful as a lecturer on the Passion Play as well as other topics growing out of his travels abroad, and was one season on the Chautauqua platform. He was also prominent in Masonic circles—his illustrated lecture on "The Temple and the Quarries" being received with marked favor in many lodges of that order throughout the Middle West.

Funeral services were conducted in Stillman Valley on July 10, by the pastor of the Congregational church there, assisted by Rev. O. F. Davis of Chicago, an intimate friend of the deceased for some years. The interment was also at Stillman Valley.

O. F. D.

WILLIAM SEWARD JEFFRIS

William Seward Jeffris died at his home in Janesville, Wis., Sunday morning, July 25, after a long period of invalidism.

He was a member of the First Congregational Church for nearly fifty years. He was Sunday School Superintendent for fourteen years; member of the Board of Trustees for about forty years; in short he performed almost every service from janitor to organist that contributed to the maintenance of the institution. Mr. Jeffris was a graduate of Beloit College, class of 1879, a man of scholarly tastes, widely traveled in America and in Europe, a banker, and a citizen of the most exemplary type. He is survived by his wife, two daughters, and one son.

A Colored Congregational Leader

A half century ago the only outstanding Negro whose leadership was to be valued in national measurements was Frederick Douglass. Today a large number stand forth as intelligent, clear-minded, true-hearted, conservative leaders of their race.

GEORGE EDMUND HAYNES

High in the ranks of the constructive forces of Negro leadership in this time of racial crisis is George Edmund Haynes, Ph.D., who has charge of the Negro Survey for the Interchurch World Movement. Dr. Haynes' wide practical experience, thorough training in social and economic studies, efficiency as both educator and administrator and earnest devotion to the ideals and fundamental dynamics of the Christian Church constitute his unqualified fitness for this service to the Christian forces of America. In speaking of his personal qualities Dr. Graham Taylor of Chicago has pronounced him "a man who commands the respect of all who are aware of his keen-cut mind, his scholarly habits, his sound practical judgment and his social, democratic convictions and sympathies."

Dr. Haynes is a Southerner by birth, and received his preliminary education in the high schools of Hot Springs, Ark., and at the Agricultural and Mechanical College in Normal, Ala. His graduation from Fisk University in 1903 was followed by studies in New Haven leading to the degree of Master of Arts from Yale University. Further graduate study at Yale, together with two years at Columbia University, the New York School of Philanthropy and as Fellow of the Bureau of Social Research of the Russell Sage Foundation, led to the degree of Ph.D. from Columbia University. Before receiving the latter degree he was for three years traveling Y. M. C. A. Secretary for work among colored students. While studying in New York City he made a valuable survey of industrial conditions among Negroes in New York City. The results of this study were published under the title, "The Negro at Work in New York City." After a brief study of social conditions in Europe he was called to the chair of Social Science in Fisk University.

His work at Fisk University was conspicuously successful, not alone from the point of view of the class-room and the stimulation of young men and women who have since made their mark in places of colored leadership but also from the wider community and even national point of view. He was the chief factor in bringing into existence and functioning order the National League for Urban Conditions among Negroes. There are now thirty local branches in both Northern and Southern cities carrying out valuable programs of community welfare, touching housing conditions, recreation, opportunities for work and welfare among workers. A chief factor of the League is contributed by Dr. Haynes' leadership in securing utmost co-operation between white and colored citizens in the personnel of official organizations anl local co-operation. Such co-operation along various lines is one of the prime necessities in the strained racial relations of the hour. Both Northern and Southern white church leaders have full confidence in Dr. Haynes.

During the war Dr. Haynes rendered invaluable service in the Department of Labor at Washington as Director of Negro Economics. Through state and county organizers his work was successful in alleviating disturbances in areas of mingled white and Negro laborers and in introducing plans of mutual co-operation.

Through his leadership in the conduct of the survey of Negro churches and communities in both city and country the Christian Church is assured of an efficient, wise, thorough-going and sympathetic treatment of the greatest Home Missions challenge of the day.

As a fellow church member Congregationalists may take deserved satisfaction in such a man, for such a job, at such a time. R. W. R.

Dr. Herring's Intercessory Prayer

One Friday night we had to miss the pastor and Dr. Herring took the preparatory lecture. He gave as his theme, Intercessory Prayer. To one not unacquainted with the meaning and the practice of intercessory prayer, this high address was a never-to-be-forgotten privilege.

Ever since then, we have paused on his name in the printed page, and have paid respect to his earnest tabulations.

Today, as we look back upon that manly form standing before us that evening, we find ourselves repeating: "For thus shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance into . . ." S.

The First Church in Cambridge.

A Great-Hearted Leader

In the death of Dr. Herring our denomination loses a great-hearted leader and the sad news will bring genuine sorrow to a larger number than we can easily know. There is one phrase which was on his lips occasionally but all the time in his heart—namely: The mind of the denomination. His leadership illustrated this in a fine way. He looked on his denomination in a Miltonic way as of a huge personage, functioning with mind, heart and soul and as its chosen leader he tried to find out what its mind is. Nothing distressed him more than having to meet the cabals and machinations of those who tried to use him for selfish and political ends.

Churches as well as individuals are sometimes thoughtless of the time and strength and plans of such leaders. Once when I charged him with a failure to do a certain piece of observation work which seemed to him most important and in which I was much interested, he replied, "Yes, I did fail you, but if you only knew how insistent Rev. Dr. Blank and his church were who made me take that journey of over one thousand miles for a twenty-minute talk, you would not wonder." And now that our big-hearted, splendid brother is gone let us remember his fine spirit of service and his remarkable leadership and all because he constantly sought to know the mind of the denomination as also he did the mind of his Lord and Master. FRANK S. BREWER.

Geneseo, Ill.

Life, full of strength and joy, is what all men need and long for. Life without strength or joy is tragic—and also unnecessary, for the sources of joy and strength are within the reach of every soul, whether it believes so or not.—J. R. Miller.

Host—"Yes, I get rid of a lot of these cigars during the year—giving 'em to my friends, y' know."

Mother—"What's the matter, darling?"

Child—"P-p-pa hit his finger with the hammer."

Mother—"Don't cry about that; you should laugh."

Child—"I-I d-did."—London Blighty.

They had just become engaged. "I shall love," she cooed, "to share all your griefs and troubles."

"But, darling," he purred, "I have none."

"No," she agreed; "but I mean when we are married."—Success.

"Well," said her husband, "did you take the house?"

"Which one?"

"Why, the one that was described as overlooking a splendid garden, richly adorned with statues, in which we would be at liberty to promenade?"

"I did not," she returned in disgusted tones. "It was a cemetery."—Boston Transcript.

Little Jimmy went with his mother to stay with an aunt in the country, and his mother was worried as to how he would behave. But to her surprise he was angelic during the whole visit—always did as he was told, and never misbehaved. As soon as he got home, however, he was his natural self again. "O Jimmy," she said, "you were so good while you were away. Why do you start behaving badly now?" "What's home for?" asked Jimmy, in pained surprise.—Chicago News.

They had been dining in state in the dining car. Husband, who is a teacher of English, was glad that little daughter had behaved so perfectly. Mother also was in a happy frame of mind. There were numerous other diners in the car, and the parents were proud of their child. Not a single thing had happened to mar the serenity of the occasion.

Finally the meal was over, and they started to leave the car. Their way took them past all of the other tables. Suddenly the little girl felt impelled to ask a question.

"Mother," she called in a shrill voice, "aren't we going to wash the dishes?"—Los Angeles Times.

OUR READERS' FORUM

The Lord's Day Issue in New Hampshire

Dear Mr. Editor:

The Lord's Day League has carefully refrained from any public discussion of the dismissal of Rev. E. A. Tuck, for several years its field secretary for New Hampshire and Vermont. The publication of a circular letter sent broadcast by Mr. Tuck and friends and printed in The Congregationalist of July 22, as well as letters of inquiry on all sides, require a brief statement on our part. Even now I hesitate to make it, as I have held Mr. Tuck in high regard and have appreciated, with our Directorate, his many valuable points and services.

The circular referred to utterly misunderstands or willfully misrepresents the League. This may be due to the fact that it is signed by the pastor of Mr. Tuck and his family and by two other Concord friends, splendid men but humanly sympathetic. I am loth to believe that Mr. Tuck would willfully misrepresent the organization with which he worked in full sympathy, so many years, and which has treated him with such marked generosity and kindness.

We venture to say no more in this letter than to make an absolute denial of three assertions in the circular. (1) The League did not and does not "decline to co-operate with the churches of New Hampshire." It expressly asserted the contrary in the strongest terms and asked for a fuller and more successful co-operation. We have reason to believe that a large majority of the churches of New Hampshire, when they understand the issue at stake, will stand with us as in the past. The six New England states should stand together in a battle against a common foe, "defending against the encroachments of business and pleasure." (2) "The ideal of the League is (not) the enforcement of the fourth commandment in a Theocracy." It has never advocated nor practiced the enforcement of the fourth commandment. It has advocated the enforcement of the laws on the statute books. It believes that the church makes a mistake when it leads in the repeal of moral laws. It holds with our Lord that "the Sabbath was made for man," body, mind and soul, as a child of God and a loyal citizen. Its change of name ten years ago from the "Sabbath League" to the "Lord's Day League" was our evidence that it is not allied with the Jewish "Theocracy."

(3) "The methods of the Lord's Day League are (not) divisive." It has helped hold the churches of New England, whose child it is, for a quarter of a century and made her a most conspicuous Defender of the Lord's Day. A large number of the leading men and women of New England have been gladly enrolled on her official boards, including its honored Presidents, Bishop Foster, Senator Hoar, John D. Long, John L. Bates, also Bishops Hamilton, McVickar and Perry, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Drs. Lorimer, Henson, Gifford, Arthur Little, A. H. Plumb, Reuen Thomas and scores of others, conspicuous today, all of whom stand on its "divisive" platform.

We notice, Mr. Editor, that you make the suggestion in an editoral that the League "made a mistake" in dropping Mr. Tuck. Perhaps if you knew all the circumstances you would think rather that it acted wisely. Its officials did not drop Mr. Tuck hastily, but after repeated meetings and conferences. They were unanimous. They saw an inexcusable disregard of the principles and policies of the organization. They were more lenient than any business organization could or would have been. When its representative advocated a bill which, if passed, would open Sunday in New Hampshire to certain sports, games and amusements, it could no longer delay.

It made no mistake even though that bill may become a law. It had opposed similar or less dangerous bills in the other states. Why lead in favor of an open Sunday bill in New Hampshire? Such a course would make the League a laughing stock of men and angels, and justly destroy its standing in the eyes of friends and supporters. The League can survive defeat but it cannot survive disloyalty to its principles and to the "Lord of the Sabbath."

Martin D. Kneeland.

Secretary, Lord's Day League of New England.

Good Music of Both Kinds

Dear Mr. Editor:

I agree with you in your main contention about good music "for the youth of today," but are not your comments about the "clown leader" and "trick player" and the "crime" of the music you disapprove of, unduly harsh?

You seem to condemn by implication all convention and prayer meeting and Sunday school music except the "standard hymns of the church." I have seen like statements made about the "gospel hymns" ever since Moody and Sankey first published them. They have been an unending source of bitter diatribes by musical critics for half a century, and yet many of them hold their own today and have been the means of numberless conversions and much genuine spiritual help, even though they may offend the fastidious musical ear.

I deprecate, as you do, the song leader who shows himself off, or the piano player at a convention who destroys "what worshipful spirit there might have been in the large number of youth present," which you seem to imply was very little.

I, too, admire Professor Smith's leadership, and I have heard him lead young people in many of the type of hymns which you seem to despise, like "Sunshine in My Soul," and hymns of that class.

Is there not room in our hymn books for young people for hymns of both classes—the best gospel hymns and the standard hymns of the church? I do not know what hymn book or publishing house you so severely condemn, but I have looked through several hymn books for young people, and I find they all contain a large number of the best old hymns of the church, a considerable number of the best "gospel hymns," and some new hymns of like character, with a swing and a lilt which is perhaps more pleasing to young people than to sober musical critics.

I have heard most dismal singing, both in young people's meetings and older ecclesiastical gatherings, where only the standard hymns of the church are used; listless, lifeless, depressing to the last degree, and I have known of more than one convention half spoiled by such singing.

Why not use both kinds, at least in young people's meetings, but always under the best and most Christian leadership that can be obtained? Professor Smith is a good model.

Pilgrim.

Essentials

Dear Mr. Editor:

We must, of course, agree with Mrs. Ethel Bowen White (in a recent article in The Congregationalist) that "cleanliness is next to Godliness," and that cleanliness and neatness add greatly to self-respect. Yet there is danger in the over-emphasis upon the "niceties of life."

The niceties of life, like leisure for self-development and æsthetic joys, are uncontestably pleasant and desirable, but must, for some of us, remain luxuries. It is hardly true that whether we and our children and our homes are beautifully neat and orderly is "not a question of time or strength or money." For some it is not. Some there are who would be neat in the most abject poverty, some who would be slovenly amid riches. But for the majority of us, it does indeed depend upon time and, therefore, upon money. For us, the great problem in bringing up our children is to choose once for all what the essentials shall be, and to give up the luxuries, both in things and in child-training.

There is a great distinction, often overlooked by women of leisure, between orderliness and sanitation. Sanitation is a necessity. Orderliness, however pleasant, is a luxury. Clean toothbrushes, hairbrushes, underclothing and refrigerators are essentials. A spotless dress, always mended, dustless floors and woodwork, toys always in their place, are luxuries.

One must not forget that a mother should be more to her children than a very neat maid. There are the things of the spirit and of the intellect, the development of "that inner eye, which is the bliss of solitude." It is not a case of "souls soaring in dreaming heights." A mother of two or three children, with no maid, no laundress, no dressmaker, cannot keep house and children and self immaculate without giving all her time to this alone, and rarely without losing some of her natural sweetness of temper.

Am I not giving my children greater riches if I spend my afternoons with them in the woods than if I stay at home busy with house-cleaning? What matter if toys sometimes are not put away, if I do not fail the children at their story hour or their songs at the piano? What matter if their clothes are sometimes tumbled off in haste, if the daily bath at bed-time is not omitted? What matter if an occasional hole appears in a mitten, if the children are but turned out-of-doors for a glorious morning of play in the freshest of air?

Dorothy Canfield Fisher is my comforter in moments of discouragement, when mending piles high and housework seems insurmountable, and nowhere more so than in her essay on "Moral Atmosphere." A sunny, happy, sweet-tempered mother is a greater blessing to a child than a paragon of neatness. And a child is richer if he is allowed to whittle, to cut paper, to paint, to saw wood, to play with water, than if he is repressed for fear of disturbing the order of the house.

Essentials! How have you chosen?

Karen Monrad Jones.

The Talk of the Sanctum

In this Issue

Here is another paper covering a wide variety of interests including some very important ones. Our cover picture continues our series of Notable Church Edifices with a view of First Church, Portland, Ore., and a brief outline of the church's history appears on page 325. Among the many interesting articles we call special attention to Sherwood Eddy's on "The Problems of Austria," as he has just seen them, Mrs. Firman's appealing picture of "How the Other Half Dies," the informing statement of important plans for "Parish Evangelism," Our London Correspondent's report of the latest move toward church unity, some timely poems, and conference reports.

We judge that our readers are much interested in our series of pictures of Notable Church Edifices, and now is a good time to remind you that we shall be glad to receive more good photographs of really notable Congregational church buildings, suitable for reproduction on the cover of The Congregationalist.

What Women Have Done

We should like to publish some short stories—true ones—with names and places—telling what has been accomplished by some of our most successful church women's societies, and explaining just how they did it—whatever it was. Answer this:

What was the best achievement by a church women's society that you know about, and how was it done?

These stories should not be over 500 words long and must reach us before Oct. 1. We offer first, second and third prizes of $5, $3 and $2 for the best ones.

We know of many churches in which the Ladies' Aid Society, or the Women's Society or whatever they call it, is the livest part of the church. We are sure our readers can tell us some stories regarding their societies that will be an inspiration to others and of practical help. We shall all await the response with interest, and we wish to hear from small societies as well as large ones. We are especially desirous of having the methods explained so that others will be better able to undertake a similar plan if possible.

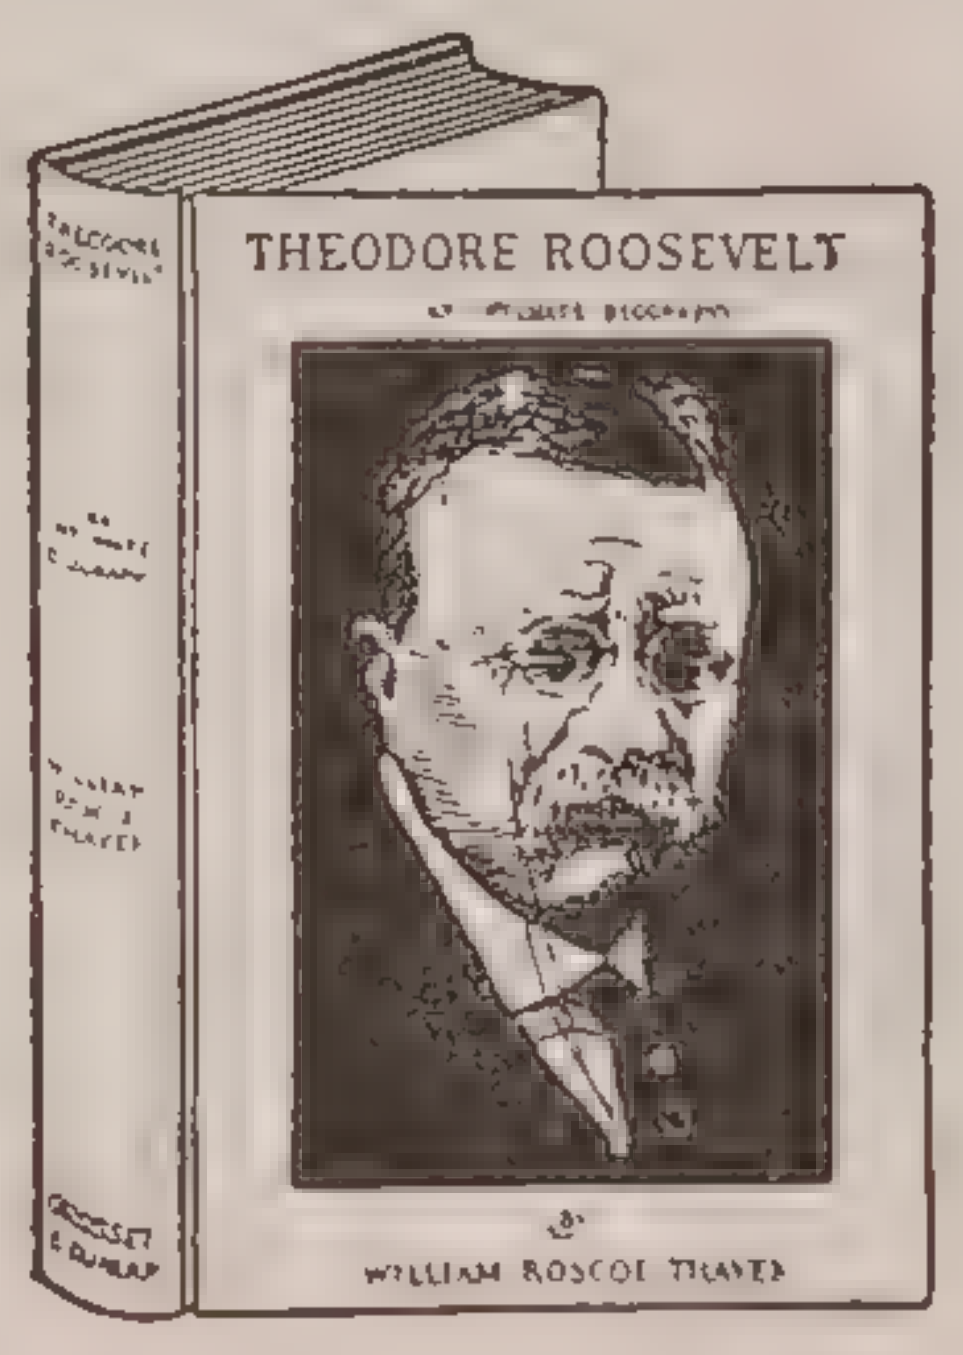
In the Circulation Department —

Last week we expressed the hope that some of our friends would get a little better acquainted with us during the leisure hours of summer vacation days. And sure enough, before we had gone to press, along came an answer to our question in one of those hearty letters we are always glad to receive: "Thank you for all the good papers that have been coming out despite the summer's irregularities. And really a fellow enjoys the leisurely perusal of good literature possible in August much more than the frenzied glancing through of the news in November." Strange how some folks read our thoughts before we have uttered them, isn't it? And these ministerial fellows are especially keen.

This subject of getting acquainted leads us to ask you a very personal question: "Do you read The Congregationalist and Advance regularly each week?

Enthusiastic testimonials bear witness that a host of readers do enjoy the contents in every number. But we have a feeling that here and there may be a subscriber who has not fully formed the habit of reading the paper. If you happen to be in the latter class may we suggest that you take the time to read one copy through? You will be surprised to find how many good things you have missed. And then you will surely get the habit of reading it regularly.

This Remarkable Book Free to You



This latest and best biography of Theodore Roosevelt, by one who knew him intimately, is one of the most widely read and talked of books of the year. All who admire this Great American will welcome Professor Thayer's splendid contribution. Charmingly written, with personal anecdotes which cannot be found elsewhere, it is a rare and choice volume for all lovers of The Outstanding Figure in Our National Life during recent years. This book is printed from the same plates which were used for the first $5.00 Edition. The type is large and easy to read.

How You Can Get It Free

By sending us two new yearly subscriptions to The Congregationalist and Advance at $3.00 each—$6.00 for both. Being a weekly reader and appreciating the real value of the paper you can easily persuade your neighbors to subscribe. Here is a splendid inducement to make an effort which will benefit your friends as well as yourself.

Act At Once

This offer will close October 15th

The Wonder of a Day

"Today I must abide at thy house."
"Today is salvation come to this house."

The sun climbed over the hills of Moab that day just as it did on common days. To this money-making man there was nothing to indicate that this was to be other than an ordinary day of business and increase of wealth. But in God's purpose it was to be far otherwise. He who had come down to seek and to save was this day to find a lost pearl in the muddy streets of Jericho and restore it to the heaven where it belonged.

This was Christ's last day in Jericho. Zaccheus did not know that, but so it was. It dawned like other days, but in all the calendar there was never such a day for Zaccheus and his house. They kept its anniversary every year after. No question about that. When he was an old man, leaning on his staff, his face would brighten, and his heart carol a hymn at the memory of that happy day that fixed his heart on Jesus and his home in heaven.

Gray days, with no sign of splendor, dawn upon us, but oh how full of opportunity they are! The chance of a lifetime faces us—an eternity of blessedness is begun in our souls.

"One poor day!
Remember whose, and not how short it is!
It is God's day, it is Columbus's,
A lavish day! One day with life and heart
Is more than time enough to find a world."

At the dawning of each new day let us take heart of grace, for we know not what possibilities of good it may bring us, what surprises of heavenly grace may come into our lives, what celestial visitors may knock, compelling us to say at eventide, "We have seen strange things today."

Today under some common tree by the roadside, a divine love may come into your heart that will change your life from slime to sapphire. Today at some Damascus gate a heavenly vision may break on your soul that will turn your life into a channel of service to God and man. Today the prayer you have offered so many times for the conversion of a dear one may be answered, and the joy of angels over converted souls become your joy on earth. Today God's sunshine may break through the cloud that has shadowed your life, and the peace of God flood your soul. Today may be the great day of your life, if before the sun goes down your soul shall have taken journey to that land where there is no night.

That will surely be a "lavish day," God's day, when you shall find a world of new experiences, a world where dear ones wait to welcome you with choral joy; when Jesus says: "Come and abide in my house and occupy the place I have prepared for you." We have had good days, in the past, but it is our joy to remember that the best is yet to be.

J. B. Silcox.

EDITORIAL

What Happened at Provincetown

Provincetown has rightly and fitly made much of its three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims. We shall have a report of the proceedings in an early issue, but we should like to recall here and now the conditions and circumstances of that first landing. Cape Cod is the inevitable landmark for any one who sails up or down the New England coast. For ships coming from across the Atlantic it may not count at all. It was no unknown country for the mariners of three hundred years ago. It was on all maps, as the nose is on all faces. Champlain had called it Cap Blanc. "It consists," he says, "of sand, which is very conspicuous as one comes from the sea." It got the name that stuck from Bartholomew Gosnold eighteen years before the Pilgrims came. Captain John Smith left the naming of it to Prince Charles, who called it Cape James after his father the king. The Pilgrims meant to strike the coast to the south of it. They seem to have first sighted the cliffs of Truro. Then they ran, or were craftily run by their interested skipper, among the shoals and, turning north again, cast anchor in Cape Cod Harbor, under the shelter of the extreme point of the land.

That was the 21st day of November according to our reckoning (new style) and they had been sixty-five days at sea since leaving Plymouth. There was some disaffection on board and talk of license when they got on shore on the part of a few. Therefore the compact was drawn up and signed in the cabin of the ship before any one landed. The first needs of the cramped people on the crowded ship were for wood and water. The first landing party of the men went on shore and brought back a load of cedar wood, of which they remarked the fragrant smell. The first demand of the women was for a chance to cleanse the soiled linen and it was for this they, as soon as possible, went on shore. In this harbor the ship lay at anchor for more than a month, from Nov. 26 to Dec. 26, when it sailed across Massachusetts Bay from the Cape to Plymouth Harbor, where it was anchored for the winter a mile off shore. The landing which we celebrate on Forefathers' Day was of twelve men from the exploring shallop on Dec. 21, while the Mayflower was still at anchor in Cape Cod Harbor.

Work-Weariness

Why is the world, just now, so little in love with work? We find symptoms of what we may call work-weariness in all directions. The ease with which strikes and "outlaw" strikes are organized; the reluctance of will for serious endeavor; the widespread prevalence of selfish extravagance and the search for excitement; a certain decadence of ambition in many quarters, even the alleged decline in church-going have all been attributed to this cause, as the ultimate explanation has been sought in a spiritual reaction from the experiences of war. When such upheavals of the worse than brutal forces of human nature as we have seen in the centers of our slow-ripening culture are possible, is the culture itself worth while? Why not go back to loaf and bask in such sunshine as we have and let the days go by?

We have our finger here, we believe, on the real cause of this slump in the creative energy of the hitherto strenuous races of the world. It is a symptom of spiritual disease. After the fever comes the chill. But back of both fever and chill is the doubt as to whether the work we are doing is worth while. We have climbed with toil and strain, are we arriving anywhere? We have toiled and endured, have we anything worth while to show for it? Unless the Church can answer these questions with a positive and decisive message, a hope that manifestly grows toward assurance in the experience and life of witnessing souls, we cannot see much promise for the future of the Church. Men are not at all just now in a mood to listen to negatives or palliatives. They want to listen to those who have a distinct message and who like their Master speak with authority and not as the scribes.

Bread for the day and games for holidays less and less satisfy men's souls and make them content with daily toil. The motives of provision for wife and children are less incitive when the world in which wife and children are to live promises so little. We can only meet this chill of disillusionment by a positive call to opportunity and a prophetic message of hope. We urge all our pastors, then, to seek and find the deep, the everlasting things in the Good-news of Christ and to present them to their people as good news. We are not alone. God is not careless. Christ has made provision for us. We are working with him for justice and kindliness to others. Salvation is equipment for service. No man can be saved alone. It is worth while to work when God is the architect of the building of the future. It is well to deny ourselves when we are following Christ's example. What we do not know today, God knows. The endlessness of life is a blessing only when it may be spent with God as his children—themes such as these warm the heart alike of preacher and congregation. The suggestions of God's Word are many. They give a clue for the interpretation of human life which never fails. How great a thing it is to be a preacher when he has so wonderful a message of God's love and work and can illumine man's whole life and destiny with the joy and glory of it!

Campaign Expense and Contribution

There has been much political talk this week about campaign contributions and testimony has been taken before a United States Senatorial committee sitting in Chicago at which managers for the two leading political parties have given sworn testimony. That testimony is not concluded yet, but we may say at this stage of the investigation that there has been nothing thus far on the part of the party organizations which need seriously alarm the American people in regard to that danger which always threatens a democracy from the undue influence of wealth. What is done outside the regular organizations for financing the expenses of a campaign, by combination of businesses like the liquor trade which have, or think they have, a special interest in the choice of one or the other of the candidates, is a matter much more difficult to probe and, after all, of less importance as affecting the result by corruption which must work underground to accomplish anything. But we are not frightened by the mere mention of sums that are measured by two or three millions of dollars. For the fact is that what we call the legitimate expenses of publicity and propaganda are to be measured by the size of our population, and the wide expanse of the country. We all learned that in the primary contest, where the cost of getting candidates introduced to the public in all the corners of the land taxed not only their own resources but also those of their wealthy friends. And now Mr. Hays, the Republican manager, spreads his budget before the country and the Senatorial committee, and it amounts to $3,679,037, in which publicity of all kinds is reckoned at $1,346,500; while, equally under oath, Mr. Homer S. Cummins, former Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said that $2,000,000 was enough for a national campaign, but that the expenditure of $3,000,000 would not be proof of corruption. In the last Presidential campaign, he said, the Democrats spent about $2,300,000. The amounts are large, but so is the country; and the high cost of living affects political managers as well as the voters to whom they appeal. But if the United States is too big to make propaganda cheap, it is also too big and too various to be bought for cash.

We wish some measure could be devised which would cut out the use of large sums of contributed money altogether. It is a peril which must be considered. It would be impossible, of course, to charge up all reasonable expenses to the Government. For, human nature being what it is, that requires government decisions as to what is reasonable and would, in a political system such as ours in which office holders are allowed to take active part in politics, serve to entrench the party already in power. The prohibition of expense altogether is equally impossible, for the public must be informed, it is part of the education of the people. Men must be free to give, but they must not anywhere be compelled to contribute. We think the Republican managers have done well in limiting the amount to be received from any single individual.

That is a suggestion for public policy. Absolute publicity of amounts and, if necessary, of names, with a full public accounting at the end of the campaign would give, we believe, as much legal security as would be necessary to make effective the private diligence against abuses which can never for a moment be allowed to sleep.

The Spirit of the Lambeth Appeal

One impression comes to us from all reports which we have seen of the Lambeth Conference which as its chief message to the world formulated the appeal on which we commented last week. And that is an impression of the high quality of spiritual emotion and the unexpected unanimity of view of the more than two hundred and fifty bishops who took part in the Conference. We are now getting some of the repercussions of their call on the mind of the Christian people of England. Our English correspondent in a letter which we print this week gives us some of them. Others come through the British newspapers. Among these the British Weekly has led in opening a correspondence with leaders of the Free Churches. From their letters and from other sources we have put together some selections which will show how profound has been the impression produced by this reconsideration, overture and appeal for a new and good understanding between all who belong to the Holy Catholic—that is, Universal-Church, though outwardly associated in separate communions.

How deep that impression is may be indicated by the saying which our correspondent quotes from the former President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, Dr. Scott Lidgett: that this is the greatest ecclesiastical event since the Reformation. From the Episcopal side we may quote what Bishop Gailor of Tennessee said at the final meeting of the Conference:

> The wonderful unanimity with which 250 bishops from many lands reached an agreement on the essential principles of Catholic reunion must live in their memories as a blessed experience, and as they separated to return to their distant posts they would carry with them a clear, a wider vision, and a deeper and more confident assurance of the reality of their service.

The consciousness of the presence and leading of the Holy Spirit which brought these hundreds of leaders in a communion which more and more takes footing round the world to a substantial unity on this much debated question of the visible reunion of Christ's one and universal church, is a call to every one of us to consider their proposals in a like mood of reverence and brotherly deference to the consciences of others. That we may all approach the overtures and suggestions in this spirit is evidently a matter of courtesy as well as of opportunity.

We and they alike are seeking for a way to make the witness of the apparently divided church effective in a world which is at a crucial and perilous stage of its history. Disagreements, inherited and of individual convictions, are inevitable; but bitterness of spirit and indulgence in recriminations or denials of the brotherhood of all of Christ's followers at such a time are denials of Christ himself. It is too soon to give a considered answer to proposals which have come upon the churches suddenly. We must wait and ponder before we embark upon any venture from which there can be no turning back. But it is not too soon to recognize and accept the tone of brotherly consideration which has made this appeal from the Lambeth Bishops so great an event in the history of the Kingdom of God on earth.

A Parable of Reformers

There came unto me a Reformer, and desired me to join his Organization for the Elimination of Superfluous Buttons from the Back of the Coats of Men. And he solicited my Contribution. And he did not persuade me to part with any of my Hard Earned Cash. And he read unto me Statisticks concerning the number of men who had been Held Up by Robbers catching hold of the Buttons as they were fleeing, and of the men who were caught in Machinery and pulled in by the Buttons. And he had computed that if the cost of the Buttons were saved, it would provide Chewing-gum and Nose-powder for Nine Million Stenographers for a Thousand Years.

And I said, There are More Important Evils for me to fight.

And he said, How darest thou say that any Evil is unimportant?

And I said, I know not what Evils God esteemeth small, or whether He esteemeth any Evil to be Unimportant. But I know that no one man can fight all the evils in the world at one time, save within his own soul; and that the officer who marcheth his men against Impregnable Breastworks is Court-Martialed and Shot; and he who fireth a Big Bertha to kill a Mosquito is Cashiered. Therefore will I fight the evils which I can probably overcome, and which are great enough to deserve my Limited Effort.

And he said, Thou art an Apologist for Sin.

And I said, Thou liest. Nevertheless, hear a Parable. There is a certain City where the Police went on strike. And that was not so Appalling as the fact that Thousands of men who had appeared Lawful broke out forthwith in Lawlessness. And after certain days of Window-smashing and Looting and Violence, when Order began to be restored, there came unto the Chief Captain of the Police a Committee of certain good men who said, Behold, there are a Thousand Games of Craps running Wide-open on the Common, and only Six Policemen, and they heed it not. Now send more Policemen, and stop them.

And the Chief-Captain called his Sergeant, and he said, Pull off them Six Cops, and send them to Scollay Square; and see if thou canst start a few Crap-games in Harvard Yard or around Bunker Hill Monument.

And he said unto the Committee, Those Thousand Crap Games look Awful Good to me. They mean that there are about Four Thousand men there who might otherwise be Raising Rough House in Scollay Square; and they are taking the Long Green from one another instead of Sticking-up law-abiding citizens. Unto every man whom I find Shooting Craps will I give Absent Treatment.

And the Reformer said, Evil is always Evil, and should always be opposed.

And I said, The Crap-shooting on the Common was a Temporary Mustard Plaster to draw Congestion from Inflamed Spots.

And the Reformer said, I verily believe that thou art thyself a wearer of Buttons upon the Back of thy Coat. Turn thee around that I may see and rebuke thee.

And I said, Thou shalt not see my back, but I will Mighty Soon see thine.

And I opened the Front Door and he departed.

And this I did, not that I would call any Evil Small, but that even good men and Reformers are entitled to a moderate sense of proportion.

In giving our too brief account of the life of Dr. George F. Pentecost we left out both a qualifying word and an account of his earlier work as pastor in Baptist and Congregational churches in Boston and Brooklyn, N. Y. He belonged at that time to the school of open communion Baptists and those of the close communion school made his way hard in prominent Baptist pastorates. Following on four years of evangelism, he became pastor of the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church in Brooklyn. It was his later work as a pastor which was done in the service of the Presbyterian communions of England and America.

The record for consecutive service in one of the Cabinet positions belongs, we believe, to former Secretary of Agriculture James Wilson of Iowa, whose death last week we have to record. He was the third holder of the position and occupied it for sixteen years with Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt and Taft. In holding, he also put his individual stamp upon it, marking out new lines of organization and service to the farmers and the country and giving the department a character and policy which it has never since lost. He was known all over the country as "Tama Jim," from the county in Iowa where he settled when he came from Connecticut at the age of twenty. But he was born in Scotland and showed many of the Scotch qualities in character and work. He had his training on the political side in the Iowa legislature and in Congress and on the educational side as professor in the university and director of the agricultural experiment station of his adopted state after he left Congress. He was interested in crop experiments, good roads, forestry, the diseases of plants and animals and methods of marketing. He knew how to interest the people and his work was widely educative as well as national in scope. Always a pioneer, with the not always mated gifts of broad-mindedness and personal popularity, he ranks high among the great Americans of his time.

The Problem of Austria

A Study of Present-day Conditions

By Sherwood Eddy

The three centers of most desperate human need in the world today are probably Austria, Poland, and Russia. In this article I will endeavor to describe conditions as I found them in Austria. The old Empire of Austria embraced some 52,000,000 people, including eight nationalities, bound together in unstable equilibrium. The Hapsburg monarchy was the keystone of the tottering arch, while the army, the police, the bureaucracy, and the Church formed the four parts of the framework that held the Empire together. There was no national consciousness and no patriotism possible under this system of autocratic tyranny and oppression in Church and State. With the War, the Hapsburgs have fallen and the Dual Empire lies in wreckage. It has been divided now upon national lines into seven different states.

Austria an Epitome

Austria furnishes an epitome of divided and distracted Europe. The seven little states into which it is now divided are working at cross-purposes, endeavoring to exact indemnities one from another on account of centuries of past wrongs. There is little willingness to co-operate or assist one another. Austria proper is left with barely 6,000,000 inhabitants, one-third of whom, or 2,000,000, are crowded within the capital, Vienna. And Vienna itself is in a state of practically permanent economic blockade. Formerly the trading and banking center, the market for the agricultural and mining surplus of Central Europe, Vienna is left today without industries or agriculture to support it.

The little Republic of Austria has only six per cent. of the coal which it requires. Most of the coal mines and industries have gone to Czecho-Slovakia. More than seventy per cent. of the industries of this little Czecho-Slovak Republic are working at full speed. Meanwhile Austria suffers in isolation. Railroad traffic is largely paralyzed. Factories are almost at a standstill. The paralysis of trade springs from the breakdown of currency, and Austria is compelled to live mainly on credits and food from America. At present the American dollar will buy 140 kronen (crowns). The crown, formerly worth twenty cents, fell to a third of a cent, and has now risen to two-thirds of a cent.

Troubles of the Currency

The present rate of exchange is fatal for the people of Central Europe who desire international trade. One can employ a maid or a servant for less than a dollar a month, if you could afford to provide her food, but without enough food even for the family, a servant is impossible for most. If you buy, however, the best American typewriter, it will cost you from six to eight thousand dollars in Austrian money.

As we entered Austria from Czecho-Slovakia we were searched at the border by representatives of both governments, the one to make sure we did not carry their currency out of the country, and the other to ascertain that we did not bring in more than the five hundred kronen allowed a traveler. It gives one a novel sensation to have a policeman search you from head to foot. With the collapse of the currencies several of the states of Central Europe are almost prohibiting exports and imports because they do not want the almost worthless paper money of neighboring states and they are afraid that free imports will depress their own currency. Railway carriages entering a neighboring state are often seized, and some international control is needed for the railroad system of Central Europe. The innumerable trade restrictions in turn foster corruption and bribery.

Many officials, underpaid and underfed, are no longer trustworthy in the performance of their work. The League of Nations should take in hand the states of Central Europe and should lay down the principle that no state should undermine the economic condition of another.

Austria herself is caught in a vicious circle. The depression of money leads to trade restrictions, and these in turn to still further depression of the currency. Austria cannot procure coal because she cannot pay in manufactures, and she is not able to produce manufactures for lack of coal. The lack of rolling stock hinders the transport of coal, and the lack of coal in turn prevents the repair and production of the needed rolling stock. The spirit of nationalism and provincialism has been strengthened by the war and there is a lack both of good will and of a sense of solidarity in Europe.

Rev. Sherwood Eddy

There is often food in the country districts and it is both plentiful and cheap, but the country is on a strike against the city and does not want the paper money of the latter; and the city starves while the country supports itself. Austria is now living largely on foreign credit and foreign food, but this is economically ruinous to the country. She is consuming the remnants of her capital and of her productive resources.

The Look Ahead

One can see but three possibilities for Austria: (1) An international control or co-operation by the Allied nations to rehabilitate the nation, advance credits, start industries, and fix trade relations; (2) Permission for her union with Germany, which would save Austria; (3) Her relapse into misery, starvation, and growing barbarism, which in turn would threaten the rest of Europe.

People in well-fed America, possessing one-third of the world's wealth, can form no conception of conditions here in Austria. You sit in your restaurant as a foreigner or as an alien enemy and can have anything you are able to pay for, but the crowd passes on the street, hungry, weary, apathetic, fatalistic, and hopeless. The death rate has risen 46 per cent. since the beginning of the war, and mortality from tuberculosis has increased 250 per cent. Some 25,000 hospital beds have become useless owing to the shortage of hospital supplies. A hundred thousand school children in Vienna are underfed or diseased as a result of the food shortage. A recent medical examination of the school children of the city showed that the children of the middle class were in worse condition and more anæmic than children of the workingmen. The juvenile court is overrun daily. The increase of crime and the attempts at murder on the part of little boys are ominous signs of conditions in hungry Vienna.

The Classes that Suffer

It is the middle class, the intellectuals, and the lowest of the poor that are now suffering most in Austria. Present incomes of the middle class range from 3,000 to 80,000 kronen a year, i. e., from $20 to $500. The poorest of the pensioners get the lower sum. Teachers and assistant lecturers receive from 10,000 to 20,000 kronen a year, or from $70 to $140. The government allows each individual to purchase for one week only one three-pound loaf of bread, a pound each of potatoes and flour, a quarter of a pound each of meat and fat, and one-third of a pound of sugar. This is only 35 per cent. of the food necessary to keep a person in normal health and not more in food value than many Americans would eat in a single day. Even to procure this minimum ration and barely exist costs 9,000 kronen, or $65, a year. Very few middle class people have any meat save on holidays. From their scanty allowance they must pay an income and salary tax. On an income of $150 a year the poor man must pay one-sixth in taxes. While the middle class salaries have increased threefold since 1914, food has increased fortyfold and clothing is eighty times its cost at the beginning of the war.

Take, for instance, an average intelligent family in Vienna. Before the war they had meat twice a day, holidays in the country, books, music, pictures, and recreation. Such a family today is without servants. They have had no new clothing in six years. They have no heat for their house in the winter. Meat and butter they never see, and milk only in extreme sickness. Their meal usually consists of bread, "substitute tea," dried beans, and potatoes. One by one they are selling pieces of furniture to keep the children in school. A new pair of boots or a winter coat would be the height of their ambition, but an overcoat now costs three months' salary for a professor.

The writer heard that dress suit cases were especially cheap in Vienna. The first one priced was 5,000 kronen, or $40, whch would mean three months' salary for an official. The annual income of a professor in the University is now quite inadequate to provide for himself, his wife, and one child a single suit of clothes, underclothing, and one pair of shoes apiece, and that without making any provision whatever for rent, board, and heating. As a matter of fact, the family has a bare subsistence, spending what little they have for food, wearing out their old clothes, and not daring to think of the future. There is a terrible depression among educated people, and it is impossible to get work where they may utilize their training. Students are turning to farming, shoe-making, or any other form of manual labor. Literally not one in ten of the middle class people in Vienna can live on his income.

The Results of War

As you pass through the streets you see sad wrecks of the war. A woman goes by selling papers, with a pale, weazened, gray-blooded baby in her arms. A crippled soldier next passes selling matches. He is emaciated and shattered in health. Next you see a bow-legged child with rickets; then pale little children who are consumptive.

Worst of all is the dead, hopeless attitude of the people. They feel they were betrayed and deceived by their rulers, led ignorantly into the war, and that the real facts of the political situation were kept from them. They were the mere puppets and tools of autocratic rulers in Church and State.

Religion for centuries has been for many an outward form. It has been a lengthening shadow cast over life, an intolerable burden upon their inner freedom. They tell me, however, that every man goes to church at least three times—when he is baptized, when he is married, and when he is buried. Two of these times he is carried and once he goes of his own free will. The superstition of a dead state Church still holds many of the women and children. Disillusioned and disgusted, many of the men, however, have repudiated this caricature of reality masquerading under the name of religion. Without a strong, dynamic faith, life drifts on without plan or purpose. Individuals have lost the feeling of personal responsibility.

On the street we pass great queues and long lines of people waiting by the hour before the doors of the American Relief Administration. Queues are formed for everything. Time hangs heavily on their hands. Here is a population of 2,000,000, half of whom are hungry, and only one-fourth of whom have work that can support them.

I visited the homes of the poor and saw sights that I shall never forget. I went through those human kennels, unfit for habitation—dark holes and stifling smells where one could hardly force himself to breathe the air long enough to make a hasty inspection. Here were a widow and four children in two little holes in a filthy alley, living on 150 kronen, or one dollar, a month. In the next house was a family with the father dead, the mother sick, one boy dwarfed and underfed, another boy of seventeen striving to support the family, but able to procure only one-third the amount of food they require. Here was another family with a starved little child nearly two years old, weighing only twelve pounds. The father had been lost as a prisoner of war, perhaps still living in some distant prison camp in Siberia. Hundreds of thousands of these prisoners are still lingering in these camps in many lands, not yet returned to their homes. The mother of the little child is dead. The child was lying upon its back, its legs twisted with rickets and softened bones, more in the shape of a bow-knot than human limbs. Here were children of three or four with old, wrinkled faces that have never smiled, and starved children that had never walked with their feeble, spindle, bow-legs.

I went through one hospital and looked down the long rows of cots in wards where every child had tuberculosis. In other wards every child had rickets. The softened limbs are placed in plaster casts. Some they are trying to bend, others must be broken to be set straight. I go with the doctor down the wards as he is trying to call forth a smile or a laugh and kindle the spirit of play in these little, starving wrecks of the war. Would that the men who started this war could look down these rows of suffering humanity and see the hell that war has made of Central Europe! Here is a boy of nine who cannot stand upon his feet from sheer exhaustion. The mother is doubled up, propped upon a broomstick, her bones softened from underfeeding. I saw the long lines of mothers coming with their bread cards to get food for their children at home. Some 40,000 children a week are being fed by the Friends' mission. The American Relief Administration is giving one meal a day to 300,000 children in Austria this year and plans to give a meal a day to 200,000 next year.

Let every American who has a happy home thank God for enough to eat, the chance to work and earn a livelihood, faith and hope for the future. But let us not pass by on the other side and leave stricken Europe to its fate. Now is the time to apply the practical principles of Christianity as the Good Samaritan among the nations.

The Revolutionary Homestead of General Artemas Ward, Shrewsbury, Mass.

This historic house is still occupied by the descendants of the commander-in-chief of the first Revolutionary army. General Ward was engaged in repairing the Shrewsbury meeting-house when the order was delivered which took away his British colonelcy. He immediately proclaimed himself a patriot leader and at Cambridge on April 20, 1775, took command of 16,000 farmer boys and men. He invested Boston with such success as to compel the British to evacuate it. In 1786 General Ward was instrumental in putting down the outbreak known as Shay's Rebellion. His wife was a great-granddaughter of Increase Mather, thus linking this famous homestead directly with Puritan history.

Humors of Old-Time Connecticut Church Life

Recollections of Days that Were

By George S. Bryan

A retired clergyman who was a good friend of mine when I was doing research work on the staff of a well-known encyclopedia, used to brighten our luncheons with reminiscences of the days when he labored in small New England parishes. "At A—," he said, naming a typical and historically famous village, "I once asked an old parishioner of mine the reason for the peculiarly separatist character of my congregation, in which hardly any two members could be got to agree on anything. Smilingly he replied, 'Why, dominie, all that most of them have to do is to get more like themselves every day.'"

It is recorded that in one fine old hill town the Reverend Timothy Collins, first pastor of the First Church, was continually at war with his flock from 1731 to 1752, when he voluntarily resigned and took up the practice of medicine. Committees were appointed to eject him from the parsonage right, and time and again attempt was made to carry to the Consociation charges of unfaithfulness in the ministerial office; but for twenty years the undaunted parson maintained himself in his place, defied the opposition, and ministered to the spiritual needs of his doubtless admiring townsfolk.

On one occasion the clerk made entry that it was "Voted, after dark, that Mr. Collins have the choice of the pews for himself and family." Doubtless he chuckled as he did so; for it had been provided by a previous vote that "no act of the town should stand in force that was passed after daylight failed to record it." It will thus be seen that the "joker" did not originate in modern secular legislation.

A Remarkable Stove

The same town was the scene of the memorable stove controversy. In 1816 seven progressive young men purchased a stove and requested permission to place it on trial in the meeting-house. Up to that time, the congregation in cold weather had endured the rigors of an unheated sanctuary (save, possibly, for a few foot-stoves), and had thawed out during the intermission, when its members gathered in the "Sabbath-day houses" and nibbled their nut-cakes and cheese.

The permission was finally granted; and accordingly on Saturday afternoon the stove was put up in the 'broad aisle," about in front of the tenor gallery. Sunday arrived, a warm November day, with brilliant sunshine flecking the immaculate steps and falling through the clear windows. Good old Deacon Trowbridge, a late convert to the stove party, could not refrain from gathering up the skirts of his great-coat as he passed the fearsome innovation. Editor Bunce, proprietor of the village newspaper and strongly pro-stove, was, however, at some pains to manifest his satisfaction in the change, and warmed his hands with elaborate relish. But Uncle Noah Stone scowled and muttered; and one maiden lady, after fanning herself for a time, appeared to fall into a swoon. Upon her recovery in the outer air, she declared that "the heat of that horrid stove" had caused her to faint. Which was the more remarkable inasmuch as, owing to the warmth of the day, no fire whatever had been lit.

A Forceful Conscience

Back in 1740, in another town of the same county, there had been a division of the church over the new mode of singing. The custom had been for a deacon to stand before the pulpit and "line out" the hymns; but now certain advanced spirits wished to try singing with no lining-out and under the direction of a suitable precentor. So it was voted "that we should half the time; that is to say, to sing one day all the old way, the next Sabbth day all the new way, for the space of a year, and then to have a reconsideration of the matter."

But Dick, a Negro slave belonging to the pastor, one Sunday interfered with churchly decorum, while the new method was being practiced, by descending heavily from his seat in the gallery and departing. The fair-minded parson was much displeased, and duly summoned Dick to the study.

"Dick," said he sharply, "why did you do so, and disturb the congregation?"

"Conscience, massa, conscience," glibly responded Dick.

"Dick," demanded the parson, "what do you know about conscience?"

"O massa," replied Dick, now fairly at bay, "I—I don't know 'zactly, but it's somethin' er udder in here"—touching his breast—"somethin' er udder in here that says 'I WON'T!'"

We may be reasonably sure that the parson was patient with Dick; for we have evidence that patience was one of the parson's characteristics. After the church had reluctantly increased his stipend to the munificent sum of ninety pounds a year, it refused to continue donations of wood. Thereupon the parson issued a pronunciamento in which he said: "This may give notice to the inhabitants of the town that I will for peace's sake comply with the terms of ninety pounds and it may be so entered upon record for six years." Once he prayed at the top of his lungs for three hours at the death bed of a converted Indian chief, while outside a medicine man, retained by the unconverted wife, made day hideous with noisy incantations. The parson won out; and the defeated medicine man, quite exhausted, gave a final yell of rage and rushed for the Housatonic River, in whose refreshing waters he submerged himself to the neck.

Sabbath Breaking

The old-time churches were strict in many of their requirements. It was usual to put a brother on probation for the diaconate by choosing him to "officiate in the place of a deacon" before he was finally elected. Even that notable man, Roger Sherman, who, out in the great world, was perhaps the most widely trusted public man of his day, had to endure this ordeal. Sabbath-breaking was dealt with severely. One instance of this which occurred as late as the forties of the nineteenth century, may be related.

When the Housatonic Railroad was first built, the rails, as was then usual in American construction, consisted of a wooden base and, fastened upon this, thin iron strips. These iron strips would sometimes get loose at the ends and curl up, forming "snake-heads" as they were graphically called; and the snake-heads not infrequently led to accidents and injuries. One Sunday a man, walking on the track, observed a snake-head and pounded it back in place with a stone. This benevolent labor of his was observed and reported, and the justice-of-the-peace fined him one dollar and costs.

How the Other Half Dies

The Pathos of the Alleys

By Alice Freeman Firman

We have heard so much in recent years concerning the subject "how the other half lives," that the expression has become stereotyped. But I have never thought, until lately, much about "how the other half dies." The more I know of it, the more grewsome it becomes. And it is because I feel we do not sufficiently appreciate the comforts attending the out-going lives of our dear ones, that I want to say these few words:

One morning—New Year's morning—before the glad greetings had all been exchanged in our home, a little child came rushing in to ask that we come at once to the tenement in our rear. When we reached the top floor and opened the door we knew by the strong odor of carbolic acid that something unusual had occurred.

A frightened young mother was holding her littlest baby frantically to her breast, while the three older ones were crying into her skirts. She pointed into the next room, saying, "He has swallowed half a bottle of carbolic acid!"

The doctor tried to prevent the poison from doing its deadly work, but in less than fifteen minutes the soul went out to meet its God. Of all the heart-rending scenes I have witnessed I think this was the worst. I have thought for many months—months which have now grown into years—that God had "wiped away all tears from my eyes." But I have to confess that I commenced that New Year with tears as I watched the life of that young husband go out in that absolutely forlorn place. He lay across a bed which was devoid of any bedding but an old ragged comforter, which partly covered him. When we asked the sobbing young widow if he was dressed she replied, "All but his leg"—and we saw leaning up against the wall the artificial leg which has been a part of his anatomy, so to speak, since he was run over by an engine five years ago.

That leg, if I may be pardoned the expression, was the only other article of furniture, besides the bed, in that bare room, where last night had slept this mother and father and three babies. The oldest child, a boy of eight, slept with the grandfather in a narrow cot in another room. The story was all too familiar. Despair, caused by the advance of a fatal disease which had been keeping the man in the county hospital for many months, had overcome him. He could not bear the thought of going back to what he had termed "jail" tomorrow, after his holidays with his wife and children.

Let God be his judge. I watched that crushed young woman, who is only twenty-seven, as she fondled his head in her arms, sobbing for her young husband. They were not immigrants. They were born in the mountains of Tennessee.

I thought of the expression of another of our poor women, who used to say in explanation of her long sufferings on the sea of matrimony, "You know how 'tis, Mis' Firman, if you love a man." Yes, I know. And it was because I know so well that the tears came when I realized that morning anew "how the other half dies." I recalled the comforts with which we surrounded our own. The freshest and whitest bedding, the most wholesome atmosphere, the most skilled doctors, the patient, white-capped nurse. I could almost catch the odor of the June roses with which friends had filled the house of death. And more than all I remembered the conscious presence of God himself as the gates of pearl swung open for another to enter in. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." I am not saying but what this young suicide "entered in." He was a stranger to us—his family having come to be our neighbors only a few days ago.

But his dark blue flannel shirt was so dirty! And there was no pillow under his head! And the unattached leg against the wall was so pathetic!

God help us to appreciate our mercies as we "walk through the Valley of the Shadow of Death" with our loved ones and "fear no evil for thou art with us."

I recall the outgoing of the souls of three little children who met their death by asphyxiation and were laid out on the cold ground in our alley while all the remedies possible were being applied to resuscitate them. I remember how dreadful it seemed to me to have them die with such dirty little hands and aprons besmeared with their last luncheon. There they lay and breathed their last with "no downy pillow under their heads," and the undertaker's wagon carried the little bodies down the street to the morgue less than an hour after they had been hilariously at play. Some of you have held in your arms little children whose lives were going out. You know the sacredness of the experience. Oh, let us think more often of the mothers who catch no glimpse of the Great Beyond when their little ones enter in!

One night—near midnight—the pastor of our house was wakened and asked to hurry to the death bed of a man, a stranger. The woman who came said, "We can get along when we are well and not thinking much about such things, but when we are dying we all want God." The man was conscious and apparently understood the message and the prayer. We hope he "entered in" after a checkered life in this world, an account of which would not sound well in the obituary notices in The Congregationalist. But as far as we can judge it was not what Paul would term an "abundant entrance."

That man's funeral was in the back room of an undertaker's establishment and the forlornest occasion you could imagine. The minister from Firman House had an audience the like of which has never graced our church on a Sunday—old "bums," sober for the hour—who listened with open mouths to the straight message from the Gospel. And they cried when some of us who do not pretend to be professional singers, sang "Some Day the Silver Chord Will Break."

I remember a night when we went down Madison Street and saw a man lying dead in the gutter, and—but never mind. I have told enough.

There are still some people who ask why we feel it our duty to live right down here on the alley. Perhaps one reason God put us here was that we might realize "how the other half dies"—and try to bless those that mourn accordingly.

An Addendum of a Cheering Character

Some time has elapsed since the foregoing article was written and it seems only right to tell the end of the story of the little widow with the four children.

Soon after her tragedy a prominent member of the Second Congregational Church of Oak Park telephoned us to ask if we had a family—American preferred—which his Bible class of young women could help in a personal way.

Of course we told him, without any doubt, that his message came just at the very time to help the Lord answer our prayers.

Those suburban friends have been true sisters to the little woman in the rear. Automobiles have frequented our alley. Rides into the country and short vacation trips have been made possible for the fatherless children.

Clothing, provisions and furniture have been given the family, transforming the home. But best of all the young widow has been led by all these experiences to know and trust her Heavenly Father. We told her that New Year's Day that he cared. We told her he would look after her. We remember her wistful expression as she used to hear a couple of hundred voices lustily singing:

"No matter what may be the test,
God will take care of you,
Lean, weary one, upon his breast,
God will take care of you!"

But she knows now it is all true.

One day a big auto truck stopped in our alley and her household goods were carried away to her new home which has been provided for her and the children and the old grandfather for life.

The little home is out in the country on a large farm where are other similar homes. She will have her own garden, and all the milk and vegetables she needs and fine schooling for the children. In addition she will receive twenty-five dollars a month.

All this is made possible through a splendid philanthropy which is working in conjunction with the United Charities of Chicago. We hear of so many cases that do not "make good" that it is a pleasure to report a success now and then.

And we hear so many criticisms of some of our big charities, and complaints of too much investigation and red tape, and too little heart, that it is a pleasure to throw a bouquet at a time like this.

But most of all we want to thank the good Father of us all who is never "slack concerning his promises" if we do our part in the trust.

Object for Intercession

For Those Who Are Cut Off from Social Life by Infirmity:

O Lord, who rememberest the troubles of thy children, visit, we pray thee, those who by reason of infirmity are set apart and often shut up to loneliness. Give them the joy of thy presence and in thy mercy make them of use and provide interests and joys for them in the circle of their friends and helpers. In the name of Christ. Amen.—R.

A Story and a Question

A Hungry Man's Experiences in Church

By Winfred Rhoades

Let me tell a story. After the story let me ask a question.

A man was called upon to pass through a serious crisis which for months drew heavily upon his spiritual reserves. During this period he had no power of going to church to have the strength of the Eternal poured into his soul by one who could tell him about God. But at last, after months in hospitals and other months sitting in the sunshine, came the day when the sick man felt that he might safely make the journey to church.

It was a beautiful church, good to the eye both outside and inside, filled with a fine congregation of men, women and children—filled to the doors. The music was of the quartette sort; one enjoyed it more if he didn't watch the attitudinizings of the tenor and the bobbings of the soprano's feathers, and the anthems didn't convey much meaning to the mind and soul as the words were not printed and could not be understood. But at last came the sermon, and the eager visitor hoped to be fed. His soul was hungry. The minister preached—on The Child, with a big T and a big C; the sort of thing one reads in the child-nurture bulletins! It all led up to the announcement that a Go-to-Church Band was to be formed after the service, and a plea for enrollment. There were pleasant, friendly greetings at the door, but one man's hungry soul went out hungry still.

A second Sunday at the church brought a similar experience. No matter what the topic was; perhaps something almost equally "special." The minister's sermon may have been useful for making the church machinery run smoothly, but it sent the stranger with a hungry soul to hunt up another church next Sunday. Here he fared a little better, but came away still with harassed spirit, craving some great word about God and the meaning of life. At last, in a church of a kind considered outcast by many good folk, he heard a prophet tell thrillingly of the power and presence of the Eternal in the life of the world. The hungry soul was fed.

Is it because people have no expectation that their souls will be fed, that they stay away from church?

Of course a minister has excuses. If his week is filled full with mimeographing church announcements, running the Boy Scouts, overseeing the Camp Fire Girls, planning theatricals for the young people, picking out lantern slides, superintending church improvements, managing the men's club, attending committee meetings, working up a funny reading for the church social, originating an "entertainment" to raise money for new carpets, typewriting letters by the ream, hunting up a novelty for Sunday night, fuming and fretting all the week lest the "activities" of the church should not be "successful"—is it then any wonder, when funerals and church calls have been added to these time-consumers, that when Sunday looms up the minister welcomes the request to preach on tuberculosis, or on playgrounds, or on the advertising clubs of America, or against the wearing of stovepipe hats in Kalamazoo, both because it gives him a subject to preach about and because the accompanying circular outlines give him something to say on that subject? If the minister—the average man, I mean, who is not a genius—exhausts himself over "methods" to induce people to make the daring experiment of coming to church, how in the world can he prepare himself with anything big for the æonic needs of the soul when he gets it there?

This is no time for the church to let the one thing needed—the profound, searching, inspiring, envisioning, character-making, life-giving message of Christ—be drowned out by the whirring of the wheels of the machine. There are always souls battered and bruised by the whacks of fortune, straining to understand, fighting against the age-long temptation to curse God and die, and longing for some healing word of strength from the Eternal. And that is not all. If ever there was a day when the unadulterated Christian spirit was needed in the world, that day is now. If ever there was an opportunity for the Christian spirit to show what it can do to save the world, that opportunity is with us now.

The fighting has ceased, but the spirit of war is not banished, and will not be till the world has been won to brotherliness of feeling. The war has ended, but anarchy threatens to take the place of war. If ever there was a time when Christianity needed to speak mighty words of justice, and progress, and order, and good will, it is now when the world is to be made over before our eyes—to be made over, unless we want it to slump back into the old condition, with the surety that the vast, lurid tragedy will be repeated. If ever there was a time when the healing compassion and reconciling spirit of the Son of man needed to be made dominant in the words and actions of Christians, that time is surely now.

Doubtless it is not to be expected that every minister should be a prophet. But if a man is going to preach at all can he not find something to say about the Eternities? Can he not tell something about the life of Christ in the soul—the kind of life that shows mankind the way to freedom from hatred, and greed, and fear, and distrust, and the spirit of murder, and that leads out into salvation both social and individual? When we cry out about the unwillingness of people to come to church, is it, perhaps, that they are hungering for some convincing and awing assurance of the presence and activity and power of the Everlasting in the daily life of the universe, some help to perceive that the daily struggle and suffering are worth while and that the one thing sure is the ultimate triumph of the great and good ideas, and we give them—child nurture, or information about an every member canvass for money!

Is is enough to be always whipping up the organizations, and striving for an appearance of "activity"? Will a social club called a church, though never so "lively," and never so full of novelties, save the world "from the body of this death"?

Since my own experience of search, I, for one, am thinking harder than I used to about the hungers of the soul. When I go to church I want my hunger fed.

These two things—the æonic needs of the struggling human spirit and the momentous opportunities and duties of this Day of the Lord—these two things are sending out a high challenge to every church of Christ and every minister of Christ. It is a time to call men's souls to companionship in life and in deed with the God who is the undaunted Lover of the world and the invincible Leader of men into hard and costly tasks. It is a time to take the labors, the sufferings, and the cost of life, and lift them up where they can be seen under the illumination of the Everlasting Sun. It is a time to stimulate and strengthen individual souls with great demands—no sweetened pap out of a silver spoon, no puling over trivialities, but the lifting up of a Christ who was the daring preacher of a revolutionary ethic, and who took the cross willingly as part of the day's cost because it is glorious to save the world or any part of it.

These are the greatest days the world has ever known, except those so great that history is dated from them. The world must go forward and upward at this time. With a passionate yearning we say that it must go forward and upward. But progress is a spiritual affair. It comes as the souls of men demand it and make it. Then let the churches make it their unforgotten first business to give forth a message that will feed and develop souls, and send them out into daily life to save the world.

No depositor lost a dollar in a national bank failure in the year ending Oct. 31, 1919, reports John Skelton Williams, controller of the currency. One small failure involving loss to depositors broke the record of security for twenty-two months before Nov. 1, 1919—a record 3,000 per cent. better than the yearly average of the forty-year period previous to 1914. The banking power of the country is now over $45,000,000,000, three times the banking power of the whole world in 1890, as calculated by Mulhall, the chief authority on banking.

"Not less than fifty Nonconformist ministers in one Welsh county alone have during the last three years abandoned the ministry and returned to secular life in order to secure a living wage. A few have gone back to the mines; others would go, if they could pocket their dignity. There are ministers who have had a fairly good education, some of them possessing university degrees, who preach to congregations in which there are men of the manual worker's class whose income is double, in some cases treble, their own," says Rev. J. Vyrnwy in the Edinburgh Review.

Constantinople is as intimately connected with Christianity as with Mohammedanism. Indeed, we might well say that Constantinople is even more closely connected with Christianity than with Mohammedanism. It was the center of Eastern Christendom for 1,100 years, and for several centuries was a more important place in the Christian world than Rome itself. The Turkish occupation since 1453 has not transformed the old Christian city into a city that belongs solely to Islam. Still less is Constantinople a Moslem "Holy Place." It is no more a Holy Place than Budapest or Belgrade or Bucharest or Sofia, each of which was conquered and temporarily held by the Turks. But let us freely admit that it is both a satisfaction and a convenience to be considerate to Moslem feeling whenever this can be done without being unfaithful to our principles. It could be done easily enough if Constantinople became the capital of the League of Nations. Mohammedans would be turned out of it only in the sense in which Christians would be turned out of it. Both would owe an equal respect to the international capital of reconstructed Europe.—The Spectator.

Program of Parish Evangelism

Adopted by Eighteen Denominations

By Rev. Frederick L. Fagley

Secretary of the Congregational Commission on Evangelism

The churches of America have been asked by their denominational evangelistic bodies to co-operate in a nation-wide program of parish evangelism this coming year. The program recommended to the churches follows very closely that which has been used by many Congregational churches the last two years. The program does not rely on high pressure methods of so-called professional experts but on the organized prayerful efforts of the congregation led by the pastor of the church. It is expected that each congregation will adapt the general program to meet its individual needs but that in general the work of all the churches will follow the same plan. In this way, while each church will have all possible freedom of initiative and action there will be possible much more denominational co-operation as well as co-operation among the churches of each community.

The program which has been adopted by eighteen denominations divides the year's work into three periods: The September–December, The January–Easter and The After-Easter Periods.

The September–December outline includes these items:

An evangelistic or membership committee to be appointed in each church. This committee, under the pastor's direction, to adapt the program to meet the needs of the parish and to assist him to carry the program through.

A Fall Church Rally to acquaint the community with the church, its program, its personnel, its ideals and its outlook.

A survey of the parish or community to locate the unchurched.

A Fall Reception of members.

The January to Easter period:

Preaching of the fundamentals of Christian belief.

The enlistment and training of personal workers who will assist the pastor in presenting the gospel appeal to every one for whom that church is spiritually responsible.

The Pastor's Training Class.

The use of the "Fellowship of Prayer" in church groups and by individuals.

Holy week devotional services, either in the church or by groups of churches.

The Reception of members at or near Easter.

The After-Easter Period:

Development of church work to give new members individual tasks.

Locating and reclaiming absentees.

Reception of members on Pentecost, Children's or Mother's Sunday.

Among the denominations co-operating in this nation-wide program are the following: The Northern and Southern Methodists, Northern Presbyterians, Northern Baptists, Lutherans, Reformed Episcopal, Disciples, Reformed, Friends, Methodist Protestant and Congregational churches.

The evangelistic leaders of the various denominations have adopted this program of pastoral evangelism because they have observed that wherever new members come into the church through pastoral and personal evangelism they come in a natural and normal way, they are led to the decision by those with whom they are to live and work, the pastor who receives them is the one who will guide them through the days to come, and these new members enter the fellowship of worship and service of the church with every element in favor of their remaining faithful.

They have observed further that the churches that have followed a program of parish evangelism in the past are deepened and enriched in spiritual life and that there is year by year a growing efficiency in all departments of the work.

RESULTS EXPECTED

The adoption of this general program for the local church will aid greatly in the development of co-operation among the churches of the same community. Local Federations have been much embarrassed in their work in the past by the fact that the different denominations had different programs. This made a general community program for all the churches an impossibility. Now with the denominations advocating the same program of parish evangelism local co-operative evangelistic efforts should be set forward very much indeed.

For example, this year all the churches will be asked to use a Prayer Booklet during the Lenten period. "The Fellowship of Prayer," which has been so widely used in Congregational churches the last two years will be used this year in many other denominations. This will make it possible for an entire city to unite for worship with the same Bible readings, hymns, meditations and prayers. In some cities arrangements are already made to have published during the Lenten period in one of the daily papers the chapter which is the reading for that day.

Dr. Burton, who has prepared the booklets for the last two years, has prepared the one for next year with this interdenominational use in mind. The readings are from the Gospel of St. John. The reader who uses the booklet during the Lenten period will read practically all of the Gospel. The meditations and prayers deal with the great objects of religious thinking and human need.

Another phase of the program in which co-operation will be possible is the Pastor's Training Class. In some cities efforts are to be made to have all Protestant children dismissed one afternoon each week for religious instruction. If all the churches go together in such a program it will be possible to do many things which one church or one denomination alone could not do.

Holy Week services will also be helped by all the churches working together. Especially will this be true of the Good Friday meetings. Many communities can secure what Detroit did last year when through co-operation the churches were able to secure the closing of all schools, stores and factories on Good Friday afternoon.

FALL RALLIES OF MINISTERS

The fall campaign will be opened by a series of all-day rallies of ministers in a dozen strategic centers. These meetings will be held under the auspices of the local Federation of Churches of the city. The team of speakers will be under the leadership of Rev. Charles L. Goodell, D. D., Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism of the Federal Council. These meetings will be held in Buffalo, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Detroit, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Harrisburg, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

Among the denominational secretaries who will take part in these meetings are Rev. George B. Dean, Methodist; Rev. H. F. Stillwell, Baptist; Rev. George G. Mahy, Presbyterian; Rev. William Freemantle, Reformed Episcopal; Rev. Charles Schaeffer, Reformed; Rev. Jesse Bader, Disciple; and the secretary of the Congregational Commission.

The different denominational bodies have been busy gathering together the best helps for the pastors of their denominations.

This use of literature as well as the use of a general plan will do much to foster a better spirit of co-operation among the churches.

It is very significant that after the failure of grand schemes of church co-operation there should come out this splendid plan for real co-operation among the churches on a plain, workable, practical program of work in the field each denomination realizes as most vital to its mission. It is to be noted that this program does not depend upon noise, overhead organization nor the high pressure methods of so-called professional evangelists but that its reliance is on the quiet, educative processes of the ministry of the home church stimulated by careful organization and the fellowship of the whole Christian Community.

A Leap toward Unity

The Lambeth Appeal as Seen in England

By Our London Correspondent

The "appeal to all Christian people," issued by the Lambeth Conference, has at once lifted the whole question of unity onto a new plane. It has, in fact, brought the great issue within the sphere of practical politics. It goes far beyond the most sanguine hopes and it comes at a moment, when, for a variety of reasons, the unity movement was sagging and its best friends were beginning to despair. One reason why this appeal from the bishops has created such a deep impression is that it comes like a bolt from the blue. The bishops sat behind closed doors, and the nature of their deliberations has been kept secret until this appeal was made public.

THE APPROACH TOWARD UNANIMITY

The agreement obtained by the bishops, I may say, on the very highest authority, was of the most unanimous nature. The spirit of unity brooded over the Conference, and the yearning for a new outlook and new measures to bring all Christian churches into close association became deep and irresistible. The Oxford Conference on Unity and the conference on faith and order had paved the way, but impetus was given to the movement by the fellowship that existed between chaplains of all denominations on the battlefields and by the ever-growing comity between missionaries of all the churches in the foreign fields. Out of this atmosphere, in which genuine yearning for closer relationships mingled with a shrewd sense of the peril to organized Christianity of a continuance of strain, suspicion and scarcely veiled hostility between the churches, has come this eirenicon breathing Christian charity and love.

The Difference of Tone

The bishops' appeal is an olive branch. The whole scheme of the document is a surrender of the exclusive tone which English Episcopalians, at least, have been accustomed to adopt. The acknowledgment that "all those who believe in One Lord Jesus Christ and have been baptized into the name of the Holy Spirit;" share "membership in the Universal Church of Christ," is to us, in England, an abandonment by the bishops of an attitude taken up in 1662 and sustained, sometimes with ferocity, until now. High Churchmen have always denied the name of Churches to English Nonconformists. Bishop Gore has never to my knowledge referred to a Congregational, or Baptist, or Presbyterian, or Methodist Church as a Church. He always pointedly calls them "other Christian Communities"—even when he is addressing Free Churchmen. Now there is none of this patronizing exclusiveness in the appeal from the Lambeth Bishops. They call themselves "communions' and they call the non-episcopal churches "communions" too.

Then the admissions that the divisions in the Catholic Church are "by no means wholly blameworthy" and that "the great non-episcopal communions stand for rich elements of truth, liberty and life which might otherwise have been obscured or neglected," seem to reverse all the historical judgments which Episcopalians in England have flung at Nonconformists for two hundred and fifty years. If sincerity were not writ large upon it, one might be tempted to look upon the appeal as a subtle piece of ecclesiastical chicanery. But it simply cannot be so regarded. I incline to the view of Dr. Scott Lidgett, ex-President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, and a wise Free Church leader, that this gesture from Lambeth is the greatest ecclesiastical event since the Reformation.

Fellowship, Not Absorption

The Lambeth Bishops are not appealing for the corporate absorption of the non-episcopal churches within the Episcopal Communion. The spider and the fly story does not apply. Recognizing that the Spirit of God has worked through the non-episcopal churches, they express the view that the time has come for reaching out toward the goal of a reunited Catholic Church. They see the vision of a genuinely Catholic Church, loyal to all truth, gathering together in visible unity all who profess and call themselves Christians, possessing in common all the treasures of faith and order inherited from the past and retaining much that has long been separately distinctive in their methods of worship and service. To this adventure of good will, and, still more of faith, the bishops believe God is calling. As a basis of faith the bishops call for whole-hearted acceptance of the Holy Scriptures, the Nicene Creed, Baptism and Holy Communion. As a sort of guarantee of the authority of the whole body of the Church they press for acceptance of a reformed Episcopate, with bishops as fathers. But the Episcopate is made a matter of order and not a question of faith in God.

Reciprocity of Commissioning

At the same time they qualify their plea by saying that Episcopal bishops and clergy would accept from non-episcopal authorities a form of recognition which would commend them to the non-episcopal congregations. An evident desire to give and take is present in this clause. The Episcopate is not, however, likely to be a tremendous stumbling block with non-episcopalians who are eager for unity. Within the last decade Baptists have appointed superintendents and Congregationalists have appointed moderators—all bishops save in name—while Wesleyan Methodists have gone even further in the direction of an Episcopate. English Baptists and Congregationalists have ceased to emphasize, as they once did, the independent theory of Church polity and are placing their emphasis now upon the spiritual essence of the Church.

Free Church Reactions

The final reception of the bishops' appeal has been cordial. Dr. J. D. Jones praised its admirable spirit, and accepted it as a distinct step in advance. Dr. J. H. Shakespeare said it marked a substantial and hopeful advance on the famous quadrilateral of the Lambeth Conference. Dr. Scott Lidgett saw in it an appeal worthy of a great subject and a great occasion. The Free Church newspapers welcomed the spirit of the Bishops' appeal and discuss it sympathetically. The opinions of laymen in the churches, who are not so enthusiastic for unity as the ministers, cannot be gathered and synthesized until a process of education in all that the bishops' appeal implies has gone forward. The next step, I gather, will be for the Archbishop of Canterbury to call a Conference of the Free Churches to consider the whole issue. He is being urged to take this course and it is certain that his overtures will be met with a spirit of friendliness and good will. The unity question is destined to occupy our serious thoughts for months to come: and whatever may result from the Lambeth appeal it is quite certain that a new era of "mutual deference to one another's consciences" has opened before the churches.

British Tercentenary Celebrations

English commemorations of the Tercentenary of the Pilgrim Fathers are not, after all, to be on an ambitious scale. Our Government has made no State grant, and though Mr. Lloyd George is president of the committee responsible for the celebrations, his part will be the comparatively small one of presiding at an Albert Hall meeting on Sept. 16. On that day London is to honor the Pilgrim memory by three gatherings arranged by the Congregational Union. In the morning a meeting will be held in the Memorial Hall—built on the site of the Fleet prison in which the persecuted Independents of the Seventeenth Century were incarcerated—to emphasize the religious aspects of the Pilgrim Movement. The civic aspect of the movement will be commemorated at a meeting held later on the same day in the Mansion House, the official residence of the Lord Mayor of London and a building which was partially paid for out of fines levied upon Nonconformists who refused to vow loyalty to the Established Church when elected to civic offices in the City of London. At the Albert Hall meeting Dr. J. D. Jones will speak for England and Dr. Parkes Cadman (who is receiving a particularly warm welcome from his English friends after six years' absence), for America. This meeting will assuredly be a great demonstration of Anglo-American good will.

Echoes of the International Council

Now that we are back from the International Congregational Council we are all confirmed in the view that it was, as Dr. Horton puts it to me in a private note, "good and successful." It made us realize the world power of Congregationalism and the value of its distinctive witness to the spirituality of the Church and the freedom of the individual in the Spirit of Christ. But above all other things the Council sent us back with a revived faith in American good will toward the old country. And we Congregationalists were compelled at Boston to see that those Pilgrims whom we drove out three hundred years ago, builded better than they knew when, using the Congregational Church as a model, they established a new state in New England.

In retrospect all our memories are happy and grateful. We were regally entertained and we drained the cup of fellowship in circumstances that can never fade from our memory. I found on my return to England that Congregationalists here had followed the proceedings of the Council with eager zest. My own reports sent from Boston to the Christian World were, I find, from innumerable letters received, read all over England with interest, and the suggestion has been made that they should be gathered into a brochure and issued as a souvenir of the Council.

Councils to Come

It is evident that the success of "Boston 1920," secures the perpetuation of the International Councils. Whether ten years is not too prolonged an interval has been seriously discussed. Five years hence, it is felt, another Council might find such world and ecclesiastical changes that a review would be valuable and inspirational. I fancy that difficulties owing to distance may make it impossible for the Council to accept the invitation to meet next in Australia; but the suggestion has been made that a small English and American delegation, lay and ministerial, might be sent to hold miniature Councils in Melbourne, Sydney and Adelaide. The trend of opinion here is in favor of the next Council being held in some English provincial city or town. I have heard mention of Bournemouth in this connection and certainly our lovely city among the pines would offer an ideal meeting place.

The Saloonless Land

Many of the delegates to the Council have given their people impressions of America as they saw it. All seize upon one point—your emancipation from the saloon. It is not too much to say that the English delegates came home almost green with envy over Prohibition. Rev. George Shillito, Chairman of the Lancashire Congregational Union, has declared as a result of his experience, that "life in a prohibition country is sweeter and cleaner than in Old England." The cleansing power of prohibition deeply impressed this minister from a Lancashire industrial town. "It simply burns itself into one's thought," says Mr. Shillito.

Other delegates have expressed appreciation of the way the prosperity of the United States filters down through all grades of the community. Especially they admired the superiority of your working-class housing conditions, besides which our slums and hovels stand condemned. One outcome of Boston, 1920, is a deepened sense of the necessity for fuller interchanges between England and the United States. Every day makes it more obvious that the moral leadership of the world must rest with the English-speaking peoples and to that end everything that conspires to make England and America really understand each other should be facilitated and blessed. A. P.

Those who have treated of the sciences have been either empirics or dogmatical. The former, like ants, only heap up and use their store; the latter, like spiders, spin out their own web. The bee, as a mean between both, extracts matter from the flowers of the garden and the field, but works and fashions it by its own efforts. The true labor of philosophy resembles hers; for neither relies entirely or principally on the powers of the mind, nor yet lays up in the memory the matter afforded by the experiments of natural history and mechanics, in its raw state, but changes and works it in the understanding.—Lord Bacon.

English Opinions about the Lambeth Appeal

First Reactions to an Unexpected Overture

"We desire at the outset to pay our heartfelt tribute to the noble and lofty Christian spirit which has inspired these conclusions and proposals. Free Churchmen will thank God profoundly when they come to realize that a new era has dawned in our relations with the Church of England. For the Conference has approached the question of reunion from an entirely fresh standpoint."

—The British Weekly.

"Such a document would have been impossible twenty years ago. The Anglican Church, as represented by the bishops, has made a great advance. This appeal may not effect all its authors hope; it may not bring about the reunion they desire; but it has already and at once done this—it has changed the ecclesiastical climate, and it is bound permanently to sweeten the relations between the Episcopal and the non-episcopal churches. All this ought to be, and will be, frankly acknowledged by all good Free Church people, and for it we all ought to and we do, devoutly thank Almighty God."

—Rev. J. D. Jones, D. D., in The British Weekly.

"The eagerly anticipated document on Reunion, now issued by the bishops of the Lambeth Conference, is a real contribution to the discussion of the subject. It represents the greatest advance yet made by any body of bishops belonging to the Reformed Churches, and its appeal must command the utmost respect, and lead to renewed conferences."

—The Christian.

"The appeal is entirely admirable, and is in itself a positive gain, and not only marks a decided advance, but it will go far to develop the feeling of brotherhood in the churches, without which unity of form is not only of little worth, but may be a delusion and a snare, and even a betrayal of truths vital to the Gospel of Christ."

—Rev. John Clifford, D. D., in The British Weekly.

"Anglicans on one hand, and Nonconformists on the other, naturally viewed the proposals from different standpoints, and midway, perhaps, was the view of the public press. This view concentrated almost entirely on the tentative steps toward reunion, and especially on the readiness expressed by the bishops, in the interests of unity, to accept a form of commission or recognition from non-episcopal churches, parallel with the acceptance of Episcopal ordination by Nonconformist ministers. The general public, we gather, regard this offer as (if we may use the familiar expression) 'playing the game'—a fair offer to meet on equal ground."

—The Christian World.

"But I would lose no time in expressing my deep appreciation of the spirit in which the appeal is made, the sincerity of its desire for more effective and visible union, and its frank and hearty recognition of our equality of fellowship in Jesus Christ our Lord. The Free Churches must meet the appeal in kindred spirit, laying aside every prejudice and cherishing the same magnanimity in purpose and outlook."

—Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D., in The British Weekly.

"I do not see how the conditions offered can be accepted by us without ultimate absorption into the Episcopal Church. As a Congregationalist I must also entirely decline to sign any credal statement, however historic, as authoritative over my judgment and conscience, and in this I believe I am speaking the mind of the vast majority of my brethren."

—E. Griffith Jones, D. D., in The British Weekly.

"The appeal of the Lambeth Conference on the Reunion of Christendom comes to me like a breath of spring. It reveals a new spirit and a new outlook. It recognizes a changed world, in which conditions, possibilities and responsibilities have all alike been transformed. We seem to have passed at one bound into a warmer atmosphere."

—Rev. R. C. Gillie, President-elect of the Free Church Council in The British Weekly.

"The bishops also put aside the idea of absorption. This is a large gain and simplifies the situation. It is necessary to say so because, in spite of friendly conferences, there are still some in the Anglican Church who think if they only stand their ground and wait, we shall return. We are ourselves partly to blame because we so often depreciate our own case, and speak as if the reasons for our severances had ceased to count. But absorption and futile compromises being dismissed, the way of mutual understanding and honorable sacrifice lies before us. And if it is not an easy, unadventurous road, it does go straightforward to a goal."

—A. T. S. J., in The Christian World.

"No one who desires that the prayer of our Lord for the unity of his followers should be answered can fail to be deeply moved by the appeal of the archbishops and bishops of the Anglican Church to all Christian people. It is an appeal which we are bound earnestly and prayerfully to consider. To begin with, it breathes a genuine and warm desire for the closer unity of all who believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, and it marks a great advance on any pronouncement that has been made by the great Anglican Communion. It admits what we have always claimed as a fact—that we of the non-episcopal communions, composed of believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, are Churches, and that we form a vital and integral part of the Holy Catholic Church. We have never questioned this fact for the Anglican Communion, and we have insisted upon it as a fact for our own."

—Rev. Charles Brown, D. D., in The British Weekly.

Loving things new and old,
Nor measuring life by gold—
A Man we loved!

World wide his vision clear,
To countless hearts how dear,
To weak and worried—near,
Our Servant true!

Leaving earth's task well done,
Heav'n's work with love begun,
Now life through God's dear Son—
Our faithful Friend!

For us remains the work!
Let none his duty shirk,
For God or man or kirk,
Till we go Home!

John's Philosophy

By George L. Parker

John was a gardener, cut other people's grass, and found pleasure in other people's flower beds. He sat in the last pew in my church, and, I suppose, took more pleasure in seeing other people there than in being there himself. In everything he did he seemed to place other people first. "John," I asked him one day as he looked at my poor attempt at a border of nasturtiums in my garden, "what's the matter with my nasturtiums? They are miserable things."

"You don't pick 'em enough, Sir," John said.

"But I want to see them, here, in my garden, John. I don't want to pick them; I have more flowers in the house now than I know what to do with."

"They won't grow, Sir, nor blossom out big unless you pick 'em: pick 'em and give 'em away and they'll do better and better. An' if you pick the biggest an' give 'em away the mean ones'll gradually die out."

That was John's whole philosophy of life. I have been trying since then to make it mine. Pick the best of all our gifts, pick 'em and give 'em away, and the mean ones'll gradually die out. Kill out the mean and small by gathering your best and giving it away. There is a scattering that enricheth.

Back to Alaska

Rev. S. Hall Young, D. D., the veteran Presbyterian Missionary to Alaska, whose books have made him widely known, sets out this month for a four months' trip in Alaska, to study particularly unoccupied missionary fields. He represents two Boards of his own church and also the Home Missions Council. He expects to be back in New York about Jan. 1, 1921. His report will be of value to all denominations doing missionary work in Alaska.

Tercentenary Hymn

Sung in the Church of the Pilgrims, Provincetown, Mass., Sunday morning, Aug. 29, at a Tercentenary service. Written for this occasion

By Mrs. K. M. H. Sewall

Tune: Benediction

God of the Ages, thine eternal years,
As with a flood, sweep on with gathering might;
The cycles man counts long and full of fears,
To thee are but as watches of the night.

Yet in the calm of thine unending days
The time-marks of our lives thou holdest dear;
Then to our threefold century's note of praise
Thou wilt, our Father, bend a listening ear.

For those who fearless sail the wintry sea,
Braving the dangers of a world unknown,
Their high endeavor here to worship thee,
And in a land of freedom build a home—

For all this heritage of faith held dear,
For fresh revealings from thine open Word,
For truth unfettered—for each added year
A fuller, richer life, we thank thee, Lord.

Still as swift changing seasons come and go,
In love that changeth not, to us draw nigh;
Still may our children's children ever know
The days of thy right hand, O Thou Most High!

Evils of Intemperance

International Sunday School Lesson for Sept. 19. Prov. 23:19-21; 29-35.

This is the Temperance Lesson of the quarter. There will be another on Oct. 31. We shall relate the two, taking up certain teachings of the text today in a general way and dealing almost entirely with the results of intemperance in the second lesson. Let us keep this relationship in mind.

It is amazing how accurately and vividly the whole subject is represented in the text. Apparently drunkenness and the results of it are today just what they were centuries ago when our text was written.

The Fascination of Liquors. See v. 31. Any one who ever has gone into a brilliantly lighted saloon on a cold night, seen the way in which the liquors were displayed, felt the charm and fellowship of it, knows what attraction lies in the sight and smell and taste of alcoholic drinks. The wine is sparkling and it "goeth down smoothly." All the external charm and fascination that invite indulgence are there in the most beguiling forms. Many a young man has begun to drink because of the allurement of the milder liquors. Evil does certainly know how to clothe itself in the most attractive ways. This is why we must be on our guard so constantly and appreciate clearly the way in which beauty is used to deceive and enslave those who yield to its spell in the form of intoxicating drinks.

The Stimulation. V. 33 shows this clearly. Alcohol inflames the imagination, and stirs up all the powers of the mind and body to unusual activity. This stimulating power of alcohol is used to advantage in medical science at times. Even this is less accepted than it used to be. In all forms of common use, however, the stimulation of alcohol is one of the most quick and dangerous methods of firing the whole range of personal functions so that they will burn with gratifying ardor. Any one who wants to feel the throb of bounding life under stimulation will get the experience quickly from the use of alcohol. The appeal of this is profound. Men and women are pressed by the urgent demands of the work that they are forced to do. They are tired and spent by the pressure of their tasks. They feel the need of stimulants. They find the materials at hand in alcohol, which until so recently was easy to get. So they give their wearied physical bodies the joy of a fresh stimulation and before they know it have become the slaves of a habit whose shackles they cannot break.

Lesson Points

1. God means us to be complete masters of ourselves.
2. Drunkenness is a social vice; avoid those who drink.
3. It is the first step that is dangerous.
4. Christ is the only final Redeemer from the sin of excess.

The Delusion. V. 35 portrays accurately the way in which intoxication produces delusion. The drunken man says that he is not hurt when he is struck and feels nothing when he is beaten. The world that is called into existence under the influence of alcohol is utterly false. The true physical values are distorted. This, however, is the least of the results produced. The whole moral and spiritual universe is thrown out of adjustment and true proportion. That which would have seemed right under normal conditions loses its real value, and that which would have appeared wrong seems to be right. Under the whip of intoxicaton men will do what they never would have done under natural conditions.

This is one of the worst features of the indulgence in alcohol. God meant us to keep our moral insight clear and our moral response quick and positive. But alcohol robs us both of our true vision and our right response. This is a sin of the most deadening kind. To deliberately take our moral and spiritual discernment and sensibility away is to violate the deepest meaning of our nature as children of God. A drunken man is not funny; the sight of him is a tragedy. It makes a true man shudder to witness it.

The Power of the Habit. V. 35 sets forth the power that the habit of using intoxicating liquors gains over a man. He will seek the source of his undoing again even although he knows the harm that it has done to him and to others. The repentance of a victim of alcohol when he is sobering up does not last long except in rare instances. The indulgence in the will-wrecking habit weakens the power of resolution. By as much as the habit gains in strength the power of decision is weakened. So the user of alcohol becomes at last a slave to his desires for stimulants because his will has become so weak that he cannot use it. He is like a king who has given up his crown and put on the shackles of a prisoner. Such an act is apparently unthinkable; yet it takes place constantly wherever men and women give themselves up to the use of alcohol for stimulant. There is no folly that is more fatal and sure in the penalty that it involves.

PILGRIMS OF THE FULLER DAY

A Tercentenary Hymn

By MARY ALICE EMERSON, Ph.D.

Tune: "St. Catherine"

"More light shall break from out Thy Word,"
The Pilgrim prophet said of yore.
That voice the modern church has heard
And pledged God's sons from shore to shore.
Comrades in step we'll work and pray,
We Pilgrims of the Fuller Day.

Not ours alone the feet to tread
Where once heroic martyrs strode;
His "least of these" must thence be led
By rock-firm, love-smoothed, narrow road.
Builders are we of God's highway,
We Pilgrims of the Fuller Day.

The Holy City will appear
Apocalyptic from above,
When we raise towers in godly fear
On Truth and Faith and Hope and Love.
These cornerstones foursquare we lay,
We Pilgrims of the Fuller Day.

On banner flung to starry skies
Emblazoned not our mortal fame;
His white cross calls to high emprise,
Our countersign is "In His Name."
Demons or men can ne'er dismay—
We're Pilgrims of the Fuller Day.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

rganizing the Church for Work

omment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 12-18

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Acts 6:1-8; Rom. 12: 8.

Christ's Need of the Executive Talent. We ke the word talent itself from one of Christ's arables. It is an individual gift and the busiess and governmental history of our time has ut a special emphasis upon it. A pastor must ave his cabinet, just as much as a president. or the executive talent which Christ needs is power of leadership through co-operative orking together. No pastor should, no pastor an, do everything himself. If he could, it ould be bad for him and bad for the church he attempted it. If a man has no art of orking with others he has no place in the adership of the church. This need and queson of organized, co-operative work came to the ront very early in the history of the Church. hey were living as one great family in Jerusaem when complaint arose that there was caressness or partiality in the distribution of upplies. The widows of the Greek-speaking hristians did not fare as well as those who ere at home in the city and spoke the Hebrew ongue. The Apostles were driven to organize ne church for special kinds of work and apointed and ordained deacons to tend tables.

Where One and One Make More Than Two. church so organized, with its work carefully tudied, faced and distributed, much more than oubles its power and usefulness. It is like ompressing steam that it may work and not o off in a cloud, as the steam does from the pout of a tea-kettle. It is the work of the eader to know what is to be done, how it may e done, who has the appropriate gifts and how hey may be combined so as to get the best esults. And it is the work of all the rest to oin forces as he suggests without jealousy or nvy. The leader may have to discover talents, s Jesus did when he chose his disciples; and o train them in the school of effort and experince. It must be a very good reason indeed hich will excuse us from taking the part for hich the leaders of the church think we are tted. For if by co-operation we can increase ur work and weight of witness, co-operation for that reason our great opportunity. The eader, the pastor would never accomplish much every time he asked for this co-operation he ere met with a refusal.

Finding an Opportunity for Every One. In rganizing the church for work the pastor or eader will avoid making it an oligarchy—a lace of authority for a few—and will seek to ake it a democracy, with an opportunity for very one. It is a difficult task, but he must emember that there are all sorts of talents, as here are all sorts of tasks, and that many of hese talents are latent. Our leader is to be a iscoverer and a trainer of talents as well as n organizer. He will try to make each member of the congregation, even or especially the hildren, feel that he has a part in the work nd not only a part, but his special part, withut which the work will not be done as well as might. It is a difficult thing, but that is hat executive talent is for.

MAN HIS OWN ENEMY

Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God.—Heb. 3:12.

You yourself can open the door to any outside influence; you can make over the dominion of your soul to some one or something other than God, in which case you may have many things to suffer that are not primarily of his ordaining. But this can only be your own doing; it is literally true that you have no enemy but yourself, for when God sends pain and loss, through any human agency, it is never to work you harm but ultimately blessing; keep the door of your heart, the citadel of your being, closed against evil and evil is helpless against you, notwithstanding the havoc it may seem able to cause to the outer man.—R. G. Campbell.

In the spiritual domain all deaths are suicides.—Gaston Frommel.

We would have health, and yet
Still use our bodies ill;
Bafflers of our own prayers from birth to life's last scenes.
We would have inward peace,
Yet will not look within:
We would have misery cease,
Yet will not cease from sin:
We want all pleasant ends, but will not use harsh means.

Of all the fallacies and scurvy cheats put upon men by their trusting others, there are none so shameful and indeed pernicious, as the baffles which men sustain by trusting themselves.—Robert South.

The sinner judges himself, passes sentence upon himself as being unworthy of the unspeakable gift. Men have always been refusing great benefactors and splendid gifts. A thousand times over they have had no ear for great music, no sense for sublime truth, no eye for divinest beauty, they have turned away contemptuously from immortal philosophers, discoverers, poets and painters, but the greatest refusal of all is to reject the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of men. —W. L. Watkinson.

There is nothing in the whole world able to do us good or hurt, but God, and our own will; neither riches nor poverty, nor disgrace nor honor, nor life nor death, nor angels nor devils; but willing, or not willing, as we ought.—Ralph Cudworth.

O Lord, our Aid, in all thy protection protect us, we entreat thee, against the weak desires and easy follies of our own selves. Teach us thy will that we may do it, and in our obedience reveal thyself that we may love the way of thy commandments in drawing nigh to thee and finding thee our Father and our Friend. And this we ask in the name of him who loved us and gave himself for us and who has shown us what thou art. —Amen.

Nothing Less thán the Best

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 19–25

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Good Work: Finding It and Doing It. Eccl. 9:10; Col. 3:22-25.

Light from the Bible Passages

The writer of Ecclesiastes believes that work is a natural thing in life. If it needs to be done it should be done with strength and done NOW. There comes a time when man cannot work. Good work comes from good spirit in the worker (8:15). Good work is that which can command our full strength (compare the marginal note on verse 10). The best work, according to Paul in the Colossians passage, is not done "for show," nor under the strain of being watched. It comes when we put not alone our hands to it, but our hearts into it. Another reading for "hearts" is "souls." Soul-work knows no equal in results.

Leads for the Leader

Try to carry your thoughts in preparing for this meeting along the line that work is a privilege and not simply a duty. Not that I must work, but that I am permitted to work. Does it not dignify it? Does it not suggest the privilege of being a co-worker with God? Will it not spur us to doing good work?

Is not good work that which you can ask God to help you to do?

If we thought of all work as being done for God, how would that affect hours of labor, the way we labor, the amount we turn out?

How much in common have good work and right worship?

Shall we find our life-work or let it find us?

Good work is its own reward. Is there any other?

Thoughts for Members

It may not be question of finding new work but of doing our present tasks in the best way.

To work is to be Christlike and Godlike. "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." And I work! Say that too. If you destroy the sequence, life loses heart, and joy, and meaning, and value. Swing into line and life never loses its tone and flavor.—Maltbie D. Babcock.

O Lord of life, and love, and power,
  How joyful life might be,
If in thy service every hour
  We lived and moved with thee,
If youth in all its bloom and might
  By thee were sanctified,
And manhood found its chief delight
  In working at thy side!

—E. S. Armitage.

Life is not pleasure nor pain, but an earnest business with which we are entrusted, which we are to carry on and to carry out with honor. —De Tocqueville.

A Moment of Prayer

We thank thee, O Father, that we are young and strong and eager. We thank thee for our dreams of days and tasks to come. Teach us, we pray, to use our youth and strength today in noble Christlike work, done for his sake. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

The True Story of Priscilla and Polly

By Louise Diman

Priscilla and Polly's summer vacation used to end about the middle of September. Although they always thought it a hard fate to have to begin school while it was still warm weather, they really did not mind it as much as they liked to think that they did. To walk back and forth from school as the days began to grow cooler, looking for horse-chestnuts along the way, was a joy in itself. And then those autumn afternoons. To be allowed to have a bonfire in the back garden, and to roast potatoes and apples, was one of the events of the season. Did ever anything taste better than a roasted apple, eaten off the end of a stick, or a half-cooked potato, flavored strongly with ashes? There was nothing like them.

Those were the days, or rather the nights, of torchlight processions, when long lines of men and boys would march through the streets in the evening, to the music of brass bands, carrying flaring torches. These shone out with great effect, as the streets were not so brilliantly lighted as now. These processions took place just before a president was elected. The people whose houses were along the line of march burned colored lights in their front yards, and to all the children the spectacle seemed wonderful beyond words.

Late in the spring used to come the college torchlight procession, when the students went through the yearly performance of burning their books. Of course Polly and Priscilla and their friends could not bear to be outdone by grown-up college students, so they had a bonfire for burning their books too. They threw all their arithmetic exercises into the flames, and sang an original dirge, beginning "Matthew-Matics corse we burn." Both children liked rhymes of all kinds, and stowed away quite a number of them in their small brains. They were fascinated with the ballad of Chevy-Chace, and used to call themselves Earl Percy of Northumberland, and the Doughty Douglas, and career about the yard on clothes-poles, hurling imaginary spears at the enemy. They found it a little difficult to enact the part of the hero in that ballad called Richard Witherington, who

his stumps,

but few things were too difficult to make a try at, in some way or other. It was rather hard, too, to understand the relationship described in one of the stanzas, where it said

There was slain with the doughty Douglas
Sir Hugh Montgomery,
Sir Davy Liddall that worthy was,
His sister's son was he.

How could he be his sister's son? Priscilla used to inquire. It was like the conundrum which asked "If Moses was the son of Pharoah's daughter, who then was the daughter of Pharaoh's son?"

All children go through the age of loving riddles. One of Polly's favorites was, "What is it that is black and white, and red (read) all over?" The answer being the newspaper. She was heard to propound it as "What is it that is black and white, and green all over," and was rather surprised that the answer did not come out just right.

They both enjoyed the pun in the old limerick about Henry Ward Beecher. Does any one remember it now?

Said the great Congregational preacher,
To the hen, you're a wonderful creature,
The hen just for that
Laid two eggs in his hat,
And thus did the Hen-re-ward Beecher.

This was interesting as having to do with hens, as well as being an example of humor. Hens, or indeed almost any kind of birds or animals seemed to Polly and Priscilla just about the same as human beings. One of their favorite stories was a certain tale by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, about "The Hen that Hatched Ducks." They used to long for a pond in the garden where they could raise ducks and sail boats. Small toy boats were the rage at one time, although they had to be carried some distance to be set afloat in anything larger than a tub. But there was such a large fleet one season that an association was formed known as the "Ocean Spray Sailing Club," which held business meetings on the woodshed roof.

Speaking of clubs, it was astonishing how many different kinds there were. There were croquet clubs, and tennis clubs, and cooking clubs, and eating clubs. A sewing club (not very popular) and a club for getting up early, which was rather short-lived. In some of these societies the members made up names for themselves, which varied according to circumstances. At the beginning of a meeting it was not uncommon to have one of the associates ask, "who am I today?" It was quite a mental effort to remember always just which was the right name for the particular occasion. For some reason best known to themselves Polly and her cousin Nelly preferred to play tennis under the names of Edith and Maud, but Priscilla had no use for such ladylike appellations. She preferred something more out of the common, such as "Dick, the Dashing Dynamiter of Dish-Pan Dispensary," for example.

For two or three years there was great enthusiasm for what used to be called Natural History. There was no talk then of "Nature Study." It was at that time that all the children joined the Agassiz Association, and had their names printed at the back of the St. Nicholas. They founded a museum of Natural History, upstairs in the barn, for which they collected stones, shells, butterflies, deserted

If!

If a butterfly could sing
What would be his song,
As he flutters o'er the flowers
Or gaily flies along?
I think 'twould be a song of thanks
To the God above,
Just to show that he was glad
Of his care and love.

—Sarah F. Bel.

Dear Comrades:

I thought there would be more who would like to contribute to our Lunch Fund for Dorchester Academy. You remember I wrote about it first in the Corner for May 27. Then July 1 I gave a report of having received up to that time $11.20. Since then gifts have come in to the amount of $5.32. It may yet come up to $25.

One Comrade sent in the coupon on her First Liberty Bond. Good use for the money! Elizabeth Travis of Hudson, O., sent in money which she earned selling extra vegetables from their garden. Another gift came from a Comrade who "was brought up on The Congregationalist," and is now seventy-five years old. (Pretty good food, it seems to me.—Mr. A.)

A letter from the mother of two Comrades in Cambridge, Mass., writes: "My two boys, Paul, aged 12, and Richard, aged 9, and myself are much interested in your Corner. The appeal for funds to help supply lunches to the boys and girls of Dorchester Academy is the reason for my writing. Enclosed is a small contribution to add to the amount. I am glad to see for the children a revival of Mr. Martin's Conversation Corner, and so we look each week for your letters." (Other Comrades' letters are what make it good.—Mr. A.)

Then a Comrade, from Ware, Mass., writes: "I am one of those who meant to have sent a little money for those lunches and forgot to do it. I enclose fifty cents, hoping it is not too late."

Some of our older members will enjoy this part of her letter: "As an honorary member and occasional contributor to the Conversation Corner of blessed memory I welcome the Comrades' Corner. One of my pleasant memories is of a call from Mr. Martin while I had a short vacation in East Gloucester in the summer of '98. He was so kind and friendly, as if we had always been acquainted and were friends."

Two sentences from the letter from Elizabeth Travis, referred to above, set me a-thinking. They are: "I am just back from my vacation. I was on the beach of Lake Erie twice, but I hope some day to spend a vacation on the shore of the Atlantic Ocean—a sure enough beach." I suppose she would agree that the Pacific Ocean has one of that kind, at least.

I could but think of some strange "opposites" in this world. A girl who lives in the beautiful mid-country wishes she could see the coasts. A boy who lives by the sea wishes he could have a sight of the mighty mountains. A boy who lives in the city would just love to be out in the country among the pastures and brooks. The girl who lives out there in the country longs for a sight of the city. So it goes, the world over.

After all, it is a hopeful sign. It shows that such boys and girls have thoughts outside their own "bailiwick." It means that they are not self-satisfied, for a certain amount of dissatisfaction is a good sign. So I hope you will continue to long for a sight of your "opposites," and I especially hope the time may soon be when your hope comes true.

Perhaps when you see the sea for the first time you will feel like the country woman, spoken of in London Punch. After her first glimpse of the sea she said, "Aint it astonishin', Willum? Who'd have thought there could be as much water as that?" To which her worthy spouse replied: "Yes, an' remember, Maria, ye only see "what's on top."

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

Bruised in the Handling

By Mary Davis

The home life of the Cheneys was particularly charming. Big, burly John Cheney was more like a big brother than a father to his tow-headed youngsters. It was a joyous sight to see him striding across the pastures with a merry group of boys and girls in hot pursuit.

Martha Cheney mothered her babies well. She had many social interests but the children were put first. She sang to them, read to them and told them stories until their little heads were golden treasuries of the best in the English language.

Martha believed in children attending church. Just before the sermon either John or she withdrew with the little ones but Junior and Betty stayed through the sermon. They did not attend Sunday school, however, as Martha said frankly she did not consider the modern Sunday school efficient. She did not care, she went on to explain, to have her little folk taught by untrained teachers. She boasted a little in her well-bred way of the Biblical knowledge that her children possessed. Betty knew all the Psalms mentioned by Ruskin in his memorable list.

At twelve, Betty was a fair, serene maiden, contented with the small golden world in which her mother enclosed her. But when she entered on the road of the teens, the docile, gentle Betty disappeared and in her place stood a self-conscious, high-spirited girl, who heard a hundred voices of her own generation calling to her.

Rather against Martha's wishes she insisted upon joining a Sunday school class made up of girls of her own age. Martha frowned again when Betty became passionately attached to the bright-eyed, capable-looking stenographer who taught the class. Martha was shrewd at estimating social values but she overlooked a significant item in the biography of Miss Lewis. That was her personal friendship with God. The old blind slave, who talked daily to God, possessed such grace and distinction that wise men came for miles around to sit at his cabin fire and listen eagerly to his conversation. So Miss Lewis awakened in her girls a desire for noble companionship.

The pure in heart see God. With most of us the dust of the years lie heavily upon the long, long thoughts of youth. We are creatures of habit. We bend our energies to the one task of making a living, and little by little we forget the time when we stood at the Golden Gate.

Martha failed to understand the little mystic in her household. One morning at six o'clock she intercepted Betty at the front door. "I was going up Stump Hill to see the sunrise," explained the girl, slipping her little Testament into her middy pocket. Martha looked at her sharply. "It cost me thirty dollars the last time you had tonsilitis," she scolded. "Really, Betty, you are old enough to have more sense."

Betty went back upstairs without a word. The Testament was not read that day. Martha disapproved of Betty's going off by herself. She called it morbidness. She forgot that our poets, our reformers, the seers of our generation and many another of God's children find him in the solitudes. Martha planned to occupy Betty's time and she plotted shrewdly against her attendance at the Consecration Meetings of the young people of the church.

Martha Cheney was an affectionate, well-meaning mother. By exacting physical and mental measurements her flock would compare favorably with the finest of Young America. But she laid rude hands upon her little daughter's soul and shriveled it. She filled her house with a crowd of happy, thoughtless youngsters. Betty was active in the Scouts and had the principal part in the Junior Play. She had so many happy hours in her day that she forgot her old desires. And then, Miss Lewis accepted a position in Washington.

When Betty became a High School Senior she was a beautiful, intelligent girl. Martha Cheney asked her one day if she didn't care to join the church before going to college. "Frances, Josephine and Barbara will join this Easter," said Martha. "I told Dr. Dunston I'd talk with you about it."

Betty looked up from her Latin. She frowned a little as if she was recalling something unpleasant. "No," she said slowly, "I don't care about such things now."

Martha missed the note of wistfulness in Betty's voice. "Well, I'd be the last one to force you to take a step like that," she said briskly, "only Dr. Dunston and I thought it would be pleasant for you to come into the church when your friends were doing so."

Betty shook her flaxen mane decidedly and buried herself in her Latin prose and Martha went on embroidering, ignorant of the fact that she was sending Betty out into the world, cheated of the friendship of the Supreme Companion.

Evangelizing Billy

By Mary Louise Daniels

Friends of the Harvard Man and his Smith College Wife would have said, could they have viewed the prospect through some magic spy-glass, "Dubious proposition! Better sell your land and come back North!" They could not know how compelling was the call of the land and the balmy, pine-scented air; how alluring the hope to wrest secrets from the sand in the shape of thrifty rows of pecan and satsuma trees.

To look from the cottage door in those early days, four years ago, was to see two other like simple structures and a few roof suggestions in the distance. However, when the Harvard Man emerged at early morn, clad in appropriate overalls and jumper, he was not considering the number or style of shacks round about, rather how soon he should be able to begin upon his own permanent home over yonder half a mile away. Sweet content ruled in his heart and patience held him steady.

Early in this new game of life the church situation was appraised. That was not much of a task. A few years previous the company which opened up the land and invited settlers had given a lot for a union church and a mill company at a distance had promised lumber free with which to build if the men would go after it. The men went and a few willing-hearted ones worked on the church building until the alarming truth was forced upon most of the families that a living could not be earned from promises and hopes. The community had therefore melted away and the half-finished church was left to make its own mute appeal.

Meanwhile, a Methodist preacher had been coming once a month to hold a service for the few in a small dance hall. Such was the situation when the newcomers cast a glance about. The Harvard Man was mechanical and resourceful. He found one other man of like temper and the two used odd minutes in planning and hammering, setting windows and hanging doors. During the dull season after planting, other men joined them and several women led by the Smith College Wife painted the seats and the outside as far as they could reach. Evidently the privilege of ladders was denied these wise-hearted women.

That summer eight more families left for the North. A little group remained—and Billy. With the building now sufficiently near completion for use, the Harvard Man gathered the very few available and they deliberately and earnestly organized a "Union Church." The Methodist Board was notified of the new enterprise and the dance-hall service ceased. The first pastor was a once-a-month man of Presbyterian persuasion.

A tiny Sunday school had struggled along with changing fortunes. Now Billy was the one community child left. However it was a plain duty to provide for one hungry, receptive little soul, as plain apparently as if Billy were a dozen little eight-year-olds. The Wife wrote a friend about this period, "Billy, his teacher, R— and I held Sunday school regularly. Billy wanted to go and we thought a child ought to have that privilege." Billy was another woman's child, by the way.

Then a family moved into town with four children and the school expanded with a bound. It seemed a signal for other families to arrive and new Billies to join the little procession. A ship-building company bought land not far away and employed men who made their homes in the Harvard Man's neighborhood. "We went after all the new people and made them attend church and Sunday school if possible."

Mr. S., an Illinois man, then found his way to the little town. He was a man of prayer and had prayed that he might be of use in the Master's service wherever he should settle. The Harvard Man was just then praying for helpers to direct and develop the growing church life. When he came to know the Illinois man he saw in him a Bible class teacher for men and began at once to work up such a class for the new leader.

The Wife, looking back over the last three years, recently summed up progress in these words: "Our little church has prospered. Last Sunday we had fifty-nine present at the preaching service. In the summer all the church members brought their letters. In the Sunday school are over fifty members with an average attendance of thirty-six, ten in the men's class. We have painted the church, bought new hymn books, lamps, a small organ and last week we paid the church debt and burned the mortgage. Last fall we appointed a committee to arrange monthly social evenings in the hall and they have been such a success as to really put the social club with its dances out of existence. On Wednesday evenings we have a Bible Study class and are planning mission study for the near future.

With the new year my husband is giving up some of his duties, that of Superintendent to Mr. S. who will make a better one, we think, because he understands children better; that of trustee in order to give place to a new man.

We have a business meeting for all adults the first Sunday of each month after Sunday school and last time I told the people that as my husband was no longer a trustee it would be a good time for everybody to begin to take hold in the care of the building and in feeding the minister! It was a bold stroke. I was willing to keep on sweeping and dusting, also entertaining the minister, if necessary, but people really care more for a thing that costs them something. It ended in a plan for two women to be appointed each month for cleaning and for all to take the minister by turns.

This minister, now a Methodist, said last week that it wasn't often a small church could prosper without denominational backing and he didn't quite understand our success. I could have told him one reason. It is not often that there are two men who really care about the work as do my husband and Mr. S. Two men who pray much, as they do, can do things with God's help.

There is quite a town now about the ship-

A Successful Conference at Long Beach, California

No desire to propagate sectarianism nor to draw denominational lines, but a growing conviction of the actual need for more fully developing an esprit de corps among our Congregational young people prompted the planning of the first Young People's Conference in Southern California July 26 to Aug. 1. The Religious Education Committee of the Conference, the chairman of which is the Conference Director of Religious Education, arranged the program, outlined the courses and made all general plans for the week. The Long Beach Church which had generously invited the young people to Long Beach as their guests, arranged for housing, meals and other matters involved in the entertainment. Because each of the two groups worked in absolute co-operation and planned in advance, no loose ends were apparent to the delegates in attendance. The efficiency, generosity and genuine Christian friendliness of the Long Beach people and their pastor cannot be over praised.

DELEGATES AT YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONFERENCE, LONG BEACH, CAL.

The girls were housed dormitory fashion in the basement of the church, whose commodious equipment made possible comfortable accommodation in this way. The boys camped on the beach and meals were served for the whole company in another section of the church basement. The three coat-hangers on each delegate's bed symbolized the careful consideration which had gone into the provision for their comfort, and a mere man thought of those!

BUSY DAYS

The day's schedule divided itself into three parts—mornings for serious study and discussion; afternoons for recreation; and evenings for a varied program. Each morning at 8.30 the whole Conference gathered in the church auditorium for a brief devotional service, led by the Conference Chairman. This set the keynote for the day, for the very young people who played hilariously in the afternoons and who vied with one another in dining-room repartee responded with a spirit of absolute reverence to the atmosphere of worship. Bible Classes followed in the next hour under the leadership of teachers unusually qualified to develop the thinking of the young people along religious lines. "A Christian in High School," led by Rev. H. D. French, pastor of the Church of the Messiah, Los Angeles; "Studies in the Life of Jesus," led by Miss Helen Babson, Student Secretary of the Y. W. C. A.; and "Discovering God through the Bible," led by Rev. H. F. Burr, Director of Religious Education for the First Church, Los Angeles, were the three courses offered.

The ten to eleven o'clock hour on three mornings brought the young people together for open forum discussions on the themes: "How to Run a Church," "How to Run a Church School," and "How to Arouse Missionary Interest," while those hours on the other two mornings were given to the second and third in the series on Christian Fundamentals, by Rev. H. K. Booth, D. D., pastor of the Long Beach Church. During the third hour of the morning the following Mission Study Classes were offered: "Pilgrim Followers of the Gleam," led by Rev. J. B. Toomay, pastor of the church at Ontario; "The Near East," led by Rev. E. P. Ryland, D. D., pastor of the Mt. Hollywood Church, Los Angeles; and "Serving the Neighborhood," led by Rev. C. N. Hand, of Pomona College.

The first hour after luncheon was dedicated to quiet and study. From 2.30 to 5.30 recreation held sway. A schedule as carefully planned for this as for the more serious times gave the opportunity for the whole group to play together as one joyous company. By the end of the week a parody on "The Soldier's Calendar" developed into: "Monday, register; Tuesday, swimming; Wednesday, baseball (and a track meet was included, even if it didn't go into the rhythm of the song!); Thursday, boat ride (around the bay and harbor); Friday, picnic (as the guests of one of the church members at Alamitos Bay); and Saturday, auto ride." On one of these days a "wienie" roast on the beach for supper was followed by a "stunt party" in the evening.

DEVELOPING LEADERSHIP

The evening program provided an address by Rev. H. D. French, a stereopticon lecture by Dr. G. F. Kenngott, the first of Dr. Booth's series of Christian Fundamentals, a message from the Near East by Rev. Cass Reed, just returned from eight years in Smyrna, and a closing address on "The Claims of the Church" by Dr. J. L. Lash. At all of these evening sessions the young people themselves presided. Though some of them had never faced such an imposing company before, they conducted the service with grace and dignity, and thereby made it more truly their conference. Indeed, every effort was made to utilize their leadership, one of the Long Beach boys serving as organist, and a girl from Mt. Hollywood directing the singing.

In the morning hours, simultaneously with the Bible Classes for the young people, teacher training classes for elementary and secondary workers were provided for adults; likewise, at the second hour their separate open forums paralleled the young people's topics; and mission study classes for them were offered at the third hour. Thus the conference met a need in the wider field of Religious Education as well as distinctively providing for the young people. The bulk of the attendance, however, was comprised of young people from various churches. The total paid registration for the week was 110, most of whom were there for the entire session, and represented about two dozen churches and all four of the Associations of the Conference. In addition, many persons, not free during the day-time, took advantage of the evening meetings.

FRIENDSHIP AND ENTHUSIASM

The young people were grouped into units of 10, under the leadership of adult counselors, and keen was the competition between the various groups to attain the highest daily percentage for attendance at classes, other meetings, observance of quiet hour and deportment in the dormitory. As a matter of fact, practically every class reported a perfect record of attendance and, although the young people were far from the pious type, they participated in all the serious sessions with quite the same enthusiasm which characterized their recreation.

To have seen this group of young people from such diverse environments gather on Monday as an unacquainted group and depart six days later bound into a friendship and loyalty of common purpose is to believe not only in the ideals of such a conference as this, but in the young people themselves. Therein was their attitude, that largest factor which should chiefly determine the occasion's value, revealed.

In succeeding years larger conferences may bring together greater numbers, but never can the spirit of unity and common Christian purpose more wholly pervade a company of youth.

Lake Geneva Conference

The Lake Geneva Missionary Education Conference held July 23–Aug. 2 under the auspices of the Interchurch had a slightly larger enrollment than last year. This was in spite of some uncertainty in the air due to its management by the Interchurch. Next year the Conference will be held a few days later in order to allow the Daily Vacation Bible School teachers to attend. The dates set are July 30 to Aug. 8.

The Servants of the King group was larger than ever before and will probably need to be divided into two sections hereafter. There were fewer men than usual in the Conference, both in the older section and in the Servants group. Perhaps this is another backwash from the war. The program on the whole was good although perhaps not up to the uniformly high standard of former years. Such men as Sam Higginbotham of India, Dean Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago, Dr. Cleland B. McAfee of McCormick Theological Seminary and Dr. Ernest Bourner Allen, pastor of Pilgrim Church, Oak Park, are of course as fine as can be secured but many of the vesper services were not well conducted and the speakers were not quite familiar with Geneva traditions and methods. One also felt the absence of the splendid group of missionaries that in past years have been the very heart and center of the Conference. There were present a few missionaries but not enough recognition was given them nor were there as many in attendance as in past years.

The Congregationalists again had the largest delegation enrolled. Several denominational meetings and social affairs were planned and carried out and a "Headquarters" was maintained where literature was on display and where conferences with leaders might be arranged. Among our leaders were Rev. William English, the new American Board Secretary for the Middle West, Miss Daisy Colman of the W. B. M. I., Miss Olivia Leas of the A. M. A., Rev. Mihran Kalaidjian of the H. M. S., Miss Sallie A. McDermott and Mr. Paul R. Reynolds of the Education Society, and Dr. Ernest Bourner Allen of Pilgrim Church, Oak Park.

The Best Thing at the International Council

By Leyton Richards

Rev. Leyton Richards of Manchester, England, is now pastor of the Downs Congregational Church, Bowdon, where he is successor to Dr. Alexander Mackennal, one of the founders of the International Council. For five years he had a pastorate in Peterhead, up in the very Scotch part of Scotland. One of his stories is of the American who was being shown the sights of Edinburgh. As his host led him down old High Street, he pointed out a dwelling on the left with the explanatory remark, "John Knox's hoose." After duly observing the edifice the American asked, "But say, who was John Knox anyway?" His host aghast at his ignorance replied, "Man, do ye no ken your Bible?" —Editors' Note.

The best thing, alike in its immediate delight and in its prospective promises, was the I. C. F. Initials were in fashion during the war, and they are now pressed into the service of peace; at least it is the faith and hope of the hundred men who met two evenings in Boston for dinner and social intercourse that "I. C. F." shall stand for international and supernational bonds which shall weave a fellowship across the oceans capable of enduring, despite the petty schemes of statesmen and the passions of politicians bent on devisive diplomacy. The idea was first of all to forge a number of personal links in friendship between Congregationalists in America and Congregationalists in the other countries represented at the Council. So we went for mutual introduction—thirty British delegates the guests of thirty Americans: four-minute speeches from a dozen lips revealed our hearts to each other, and the big demonstration in Mechanics Hall was forgotten as time sped amid the joys of fellowship.

It was delightful, but nebulous: we were no more than a series of fortuitous human atoms—united today, separated tomorrow. Could we not give an element of permanence to our fellowship and make it serve a larger purpose? The answer was given two evenings later, when we met again, with members and delegates from the British Dominions, and formally floated the I. C. F.—the International Congregational Fraternity. Articles IV. and V. of the Constitution tell its purpose and method. Article IV.—"Membership of the Fraternity implies loyalty to the world-wide mission of the Church, and the realization of Christian Brotherhood." Article V.—"Among the activities suggested as an expression of the purpose of the I. C. F. shall be the following:

(a) Exchange of letters, periodicals, etc., and if possible a half yearly bulletin, with a view to the interchange of information in regard to Christian issues in the several countries.

(b) International exchange of pulpits.

(c) Interpretative communications by the several National Committees, where such communications are of value in the fostering of international public opinion on Christian lines.

(d) Interchange visits of national representatives for information and intercourse and report.

(e) The effort to secure the appointment of fraternal delegates to the Congregational conventions or annual meetings of the other countries represented.

(f) The encouragement of divinity students of one nation to take one or more years of their course in the theological institutions of another of the nations represented in the I. C. F.

It only remains to add that the Secretary of the American Section is Rev. Herbert A. Jump, Manchester, N. H., and of the British Section, Rev. Leyton Richards, Bowdon, Manchester, England.

First Church, Portland, Oregon

The picture on the cover page is that of the third and present edifice of the First Congregational Church of Portland, Ore. Its first building was erected sixty-nine years ago in what is now "way down town" in the City of Roses. Rev. Horace Lyman was then pastor. In 1852 from the church was formed what has become the First Presbyterian Church of Portland. The withdrawal of so many members so weakened the church that its continuance was threatened and Mr. Lyman resigned. That versatile pioneer and foundation builder, Rev. George H. Atkinson, came to the rescue and the church under his leadership grew in membership and power. In 1855 Rev. P. B. Chamberlain began his pastorate. But again another group withdrew to strengthen the declining First Presbyterian Church. Then the church called to its leadership the man who had previously transformed failure into success.

Rev. George H. Atkinson worked so effectively that the church assumed self-support, regained its place of prestige in the town and built in 1871 its second building costing $20,000. Dr. Atkinson being called to the Missionary Superintendency of Washington and Oregon, Rev. James Eaton, who afterwards rendered such splendid service as American Board Missionary in Mexico, was called to the pastorate. His ministry as those of Rev. J. A. Cruzan and Rev. Frederick R. Marvin, his successors, was brief.

In 1886 Rev. T. E. Clapp began a fruitful ministry of eight years; the last four of which were devoted to making plans, raising money and erecting the present imposing edifice. The financial crisis of 1893 brought the enterprise to a standstill and the resignation of the discouraged Dr. Clapp. Then followed the pastorate of Rev. George R. Wallace (1894—1902) marked by evangelistic zeal, increasing membership, and the meeting of the National Council in 1898, then the pastorate of Rev. E. L. House, under whose inspiring leadership the handicapping mortgage was burned. Dr. House's successor was Rev. Luther Dyott, whose broad culture, many-sided civic service and gifts of friendship are precious memories of the church. After almost nine years of faithful service he departed this life and entered the church triumphant.

Dr. William T. McElveen, widely known as an able and beloved pastor and leader in Boston, Chicago and New York, is the present pastor of the church. The church is truly the "First Church," not only of Portland but of Oregon.

With the Schools and Colleges

New Professor at Oberlin

Friends of Oberlin are congratulating the Graduate School of Theology upon securing Dr. T. W. Graham of Minneapolis as the new Professor of Homiletics. He will succeed Prof. W. J. Hutchins, who has become the President of Berea College, Kentucky, after 13 years of service.

Dr. Graham is a notably successful young minister, well known not only in the "Twin Cities" as pastor of the Andrew Presbyterian Church, but also as an inspiring platform speaker at Y. M. C. A. conventions and student conferences.

He was graduated from the University of Toronto in 1903, and completed his theological course at Chicago, at McCormick Seminaries. He pursued graduate theological studies in 1907-1908 in the United Free Church College in Glasgow. The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon him last June by Macalester College. His war service was a noteworthy one. He not only served at two officers' training camps in this country under the Y. M. C. A. but held a responsible post overseas as officer in charge of the great Palais de Glace, the main recreational center for American soldiers in Paris.

Dr. Graham's success with young men in the army, his growing power as a preacher to college men, his missionary devotion shown by the remarkable succession of young people his church has sent year after year to the foreign field, and his unusual influence with students at the summer conferences indicate exactly the type and quality of talent and personal resources needed for the important post to which he is called at Oberlin, where the traditions of the Chair of Homiletics have been exceptionally high.

President Hough Resigns

Because of frail health, Dr. Lynn Harold Hough has resigned the presidency of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill. He had served less than a year. In his letter to the board of trustees he said, "I have a clear conviction that the duties of the presidency of Northwestern University demand more in the way of physical resource than I can bring to the task." It is now known that Dr. Hough was ill last winter following his return from California and the West, and he resigned at that time the chairmanship of the Greater Northwestern University Campaign Committee. This committee has carried on a strenuous campaign to secure $13,500,000 for necessary improvements and increases in professors' salaries.

Of the amount sought it is reported that only about $1,500,000 has been subscribed. President Hough is a man of great literary and preaching abilities and though he may have administrative talent of high order he ought to be released entirely from any responsibility as an executive and be allowed to give himself completely to the other type of work. He has sailed for England and will occupy for a time the pulpit of Carr's Lane Congregational Chapel, Birmingham. Northwestern University has lately purchased valuable frontage on the Lake Shore Drive at Chicago Avenue and will locate its schools which have occupied buildings in the loop at the new site.

Laying Out the World's Work

By Byron H. Stauffer

We shall always need the foreman, be he employee or employer. I stood watching a hundred factory workers trooping past a time register at evening closing time. Each pushed a button which recorded to the minute his hours of work for that day. This convict-like numbering of men, this lockstep march past the clock, was just beginning to arouse whatever socialistic tendencies I entertained, when my friend, the foreman, after waiting till the last man was beyond hearing, remarked: "I expect a strike tomorrow for shorter hours."

I felt like telling him that I had at least a prima facie sympathy with the men, that I wouldn't work where I had to push a button. But, instead, I listened to his reasons why the hours were short enough and the wages sufficient. When we reached the corner where our paths homeward separated I was still a silent listener and a skeptic as well. "Will you be at the church concert tonight?" I asked in parting. "No, I shall not be able to come," answered the foreman quietly. "I must go back to the factory after supper and lay out tomorrow's work."

The italics of the last five words are not used to indicate any particular emphasis on the part of that quiet-voiced foreman, but to give you some faint idea of the force with which the announcement collided with my previous line of thought. I suddenly lost my horror for the time recorder. Even the numbering system didn't appear quite so bad. This man who, I had noticed, did not need to push a button on leaving, had to go back to work without any extra pay. The men under him could spend the evening with their families.

I make no comparisons, nor speak for employer as against employee. I make no point against labor's demands. I merely hold to your view that foreman going back to the shop to lay out tomorrow's work. The clock did not record that extra time for the enlightenment of the board of directors. Neither did the workers under him give it a thought. Yet on his forethought and initiative depended the welfare of a hundred homes.

The world over we are too apt to forget the man who is laying out tomorrow's work. He may be a foreman or a promotor, a farmer or a captain of big industries. He may be laying out ten years' work for a community. He may have discovered a swifter process for doing work or a new brand of work altogether. He may have the pep to turn a desert into a garden. In cutting out a garment, in writing a book, in designing a building, in planning a needed railway line, in organizing a business, in creating a new commodity, in inventing a device, these foremen are continually laying out the work of the future for millions who could not do it for themselves. The multitude is fit to follow; the few are qualified to lead. The architect will always be needed, whether he plans buildings, industries or empires.

So while we sympathize with all who toil with their hands, while we desire to secure for them all they earn and all the leisure hours they should have, let us not forget that under any social system the Utopian dreamers may devise, the world will always need the foreman who can lay out tomorrow's work.

birds' nests, or anything that could be obtained without hurting any living creature. There was always some doubt about the righteousness of collecting butterflies, and they would have preferred if possible to have kept them alive. They held stated meetings at which essays were read by the members but it required a strong hand on the part of the President to keep those associates interested who did not have an important part in the program, for it was always more interesting to perform than to be a respectful listener on such occasions. It was so easy to descend to a lower plane, and instead of contributing something of scientific interest, to quote the verses about:

Miss Pallas Eudora Von Blurky!
Her knowledge of science was murky,
High German and Greek she could fluently speak,
But she couldn't tell chicken from turkey.

Probably most girls and boys go through the stage of editing a newspaper. The one published by this particular group of children was called "The Enterprise." It had to be printed entirely by hand, with pen and ink, a very slow process, to say the least, and a very inky one, especially for the printers. About as much ink went on to their persons as on to the pages of the newspaper. They planned at first for a rather wide circulation, and went about trying to get subscribers, but the first number of the Enterprise was the last as well, for the pleasure of printing by hand was one that very quickly palled. Enterprises of many kinds were rather short-lived, for there were so many things to be tried, and experimented upon, and then to be left behind for something else. Priscilla and Polly had never heard of Robert Louis Stevenson, but they would have agreed with him in thinking:

The world is so full of a number of things
I'm sure we should all be as happy as kings.

building plant and as the families like to live out here where they can keep hens and a cow, we are bound to grow. It is a small work of course but who can say what some of our children will get from it? Little Billy will go to college one day, some of the others also, and we hope this little Sunday school will have started them in the right way.

If the survey man gets a bit discouraged as he skirts the lower edges of the country, let him stop over at this little fruit-growing town. The Harvard Man has a guest room ready now in his new house—much of the house built with his own hands. Along with other jottings in his notebook let the surveyor include this memorandum: Found—A rare specimen, the leader of a new enterprise who kept himself ready to decrease that somebody else might increase who could do a better job. Industry—perseverance —prayer—modesty. Result, a thriving Union Church and a process of evangelizing Billy under good headway.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

More About Plymouth

The Founding of a Nation, by Frank M. Gregg (Doran). The Pilgrim history is presented in the form of fiction, yet every character in it, with one exception, is historical, and the whole narrative follows closely William Bradford's "History of the Plimoth Plantation." The one fictitious character is Francis Beaumont, who tells the story as an onlooker at first, and later as an accepted member of the colony. The work is admirably done and may make a more accurate impression than if it were a purely historical account.

Cape Cod and the Old Colony, by Albert Perry Brigham (Putnam). More information is given in this volume about the interesting natural features of the Cape than can be found elsewhere. The glacial history of the region, the action of the sea, of winds and storms, shown on the cliffs of Truro, the dunes of Provincetown and the innumerable lakes of the whole region. The author is a geologist but writes for the general reader. The Changing Shore Line, Old Colony Names and Towns, Roads and Waterways, Three Centuries of Population, The Environment of the Sea, are some of the nine chapter titles. Every lover of the Cape, native or visitor, will find the book thoroughly enjoyable and informing. It is abundantly illustrated.

Old Plymouth Trails, by Winthrop Packard (Small, Maynard). Mr. Packard is both a clear-sighted and humorous observer of wild life and a sympathetic watcher of the ways of mankind. He has made a timely volume in these delightful studies of the Pilgrim country—Cape Cod and its neighborhood, stretching the latter term to include Nantucket, and especially the Plymouth backgrounds. There is a pleasant atmosphere of familiarity with Pilgrim history, but most of the interest of the book lies in its intimate acquaintance with the wild ways of the world and the genial companionship in outdoor adventure of the telling. The illustrations are a real addition to the text.

An Answer to John Robinson of Leyden, by A Puritan Friend, edited by Champlin Burrage (Harvard University Press). A manuscript of A. D. 1609, now published for the first time. It has lain in the Bodleian Library for over two hundred years. Aside from its great interest as a controversial document it is of historical importance for several reasons, stated in the Preface, among them being that it shows Robinson's residence to have been in Norwich between 1604–1607, and addresses him as a university man. Students of Pilgrim history will wish to consult this most interesting document. It is No. IX in the Harvard Theological Studies.

Recent Fiction

Invincible Minnie, by Elizabeth Lauxay Holding (Doran). Had a man drawn this character of a woman, he would have been in some danger of being mobbed by a throng of angry women. As the picture is by a woman we can only accept it as an index to the awful possibilities of her sex. The author says that we all know her type and that she is "capable of everything." Minnie comes of a race of parasites. She sees that she can only get what she wants in life through marriage. She is without passion, without honor, without shame. She sacrifices her sister, her lover, her husband, her children to mere desire of monopoly in ownership. A sloven, with charm; a coward, with cunning; incredibly short-sighted, cruel and mean; she is so clearly pictured that we feel that we have really made her acquaintance.

Allegra, by L. Allen Harlan (Scribners). An English story, largely of the theater, with an actress for a heroine to whom her art is so absorbing that it becomes a successful rival of her lovers and makes her unsocial and lonely in the world. One is more likely to fall in love with the much-tried and constant hero, with his ideals of what an English gentleman must be and do, than with the rather selfish and cold-hearted lady.

The Rapids, by Alan Sullivan (Appleton). The story of a man of boundless ambition, vivid imagination, great ability, invincible confidence, and the power of persuading men to back him in his dreams. He transforms a quiet little village into a great manufacturing center. His reward is not in acquiring wealth but in the joy of seeing his dreams come true. It is an unusual story of fine idealism and with many interesting characters, one of them being a missionary bishop, and a pretty romance runs through the pages.

The Stranger, by Arthur Bullard (Macmillan). A typical modern woman, whose motto is "efficiency," and a young man of Western ancestry but a Moslem by training, are the principal characters. Mr. Bullard desires, apparently, to show the superiority of the Mohammedan idea of love and marriage. Most readers will doubt the fairness of his comparisons or the soundness of his conclusions. It is not altogether an agreeable story, nor is it as well written as some of his earlier works of travel.

Our Peter, by George Woden (Dutton). The story of an English youth, from his boyhood until his marriage and the birth of his first children. It is an exceptionally well-written and entertaining account of the joys and sorrows of boyhood, the aspirations and love experiences of adolescence, the development of maturing years and the ups and downs, the joys and pains of courtship and early married life. It presents a fine picture of the habits and modes of life in an English town.

Atlantida, by Pierre Benoit (Duffield). It appears that the very ancient continent of Atlantis, "the cradle and home of the dynasty of Neptune," did not sink beneath the waves long ago, as tradition has it, but emerged instead and exists, in central Africa, a strange, mysterious and magnificent domain. There Antinea, a woman of great beauty—a supervampire—rules. Few men from the outer world ever have seen her. The one who tells the story is of the still smaller number who escape from her alive! The French Academy has awarded the author a prize "for the best novel of the year." It will remind readers of Rider Haggard's "She," but is quite another story.

I've Married Marjorie, by Margaret Widdemer (Harcourt, Brace and Howe). Marjorie was one of those war brides who married the very day before her lover was summoned to sail with his regiment. She was only twenty-one and when the war ended she found that she dreaded his return. The whole story is taken up with the account of the readjustment.

Mollie's Substitute Husband, by Max McCoun (Dodd, Mead). An incredible but entertaining story of the way in which a man, to promote a political reform effort, played the part of a certain senator whom he closely resembled.

A Cry of Youth, by Cynthia Lombardi (Appleton). This is a story of romantic love in still more romantic places. An American teacher in Rome who is young and in difficult circumstances meets with an Italian youth with whom marriage is impossible because of a childish vow which has pledged him to the monastery. They love and live as husband and wife in an ancient castle on a mountain top. There are adventures, the evil eye plays a part. There are mysterious vaults and underground passages. The story is pleasantly written.

Next Besters, by Lulah Ragsdale (Scribners). A light romance which swings between an impoverished Southern estate and the abundance of New York. Two charming daughters, in order to hearten their father, evolve a cheerful philosophy expressed thus: "When you cannot have what you want, take the next best." But they adopt an unfortunate amendment. "When you can't tell the truth, tell a lie." They tell so many and such atrocious lies to conceal the poverty of the estate that they hardly deserve the good fortune which follows repentance.

Short Stories

Czechoslovak Stories, translated by Sarka B. Hrbkova (Duffield). This collection belongs to "The Interpreters' Series." It gives us welcome and enjoyable glimpses into the racial thought and experience of one of the gifted races, long under oppression but conscious of its noble past and high destiny. Each story is prefaced by a brief but sufficient biographical sketch of the author. An unfamiliar life, a fresh and unconventional humor and a little of the Slavic folk-melancholy run through these stories.

Modern Greek Stories, translated by Demetra Vaka (Duffield). Ten short stories by various Greek authors, "leading figures in the literary world of Modern Greece." They are especially interesting for the light they cast on the religious ideas, superstitions and customs of the Greek peasant.

Leerie, by Ruth Sawyer (Harpers). Eight short stories concerning the wonder working of Sheila O'Leary, the best nurse in the great sanitarium. She possesses an amazing skill in dealing with unusual cases, where the cause of illness is difficult to discover and not to be reached by probe or druggist's medicine. The last chapters tell of her war work. A cheerful romance runs through the chapters.

Some Little Books

Little Messages for Shut-in Folk, by Charles W. McCormick (Methodist Book Concern). A choice little devotional volume of texts, comments and prayers.

Great Characters of the New Testament, by Doremus A. Hayes (Methodist Book Concern). Brief biographical studies for class use.

The Sunday School an Evangelistic Opportunity, by F. Watson Hanran (Methodist Book Concern). Suggestions for pastors, teachers, superintendents.

The Lord's Table (Public Speakers' Supply). A hundred speakers contribute each a service of "thoughts and prayers."

Joyful Sorrow, compiled by L. H. B. (Dutton). A collection of well-selected poems for consolation.

CONNECTICUT

Cornwall Old Home Week

The Old Home Week celebration at SECOND, CORNWALL, Aug. 21–22, was of exceptional interest. Instead of the annual picnic at Cream Hill Lake the home people, on Saturday, gave a pageant on the lawn of the chapel and church illustrating the founding of the town in 1740 and the religious history of the church since its organization in 1780. The episodes of the pageant were planned and written, with rare originality and skill, by Rev. Fred Smith, the pastor. The historical presentation began with an impressive scene picturing the withdrawal of the Indians in favor of the white man. Then followed the meeting of the proprietors for the organization of the town; of the church members to receive their charter of incorporation from the State Assembly; and the building of the present edifice in 1826.

The literalistic accuracy of the presentation may be inferred from the fact that in the scene representing the building of the church a great stick of timber from the forest was drawn on to the chapel lawn by five yoke of oxen in the presence of an assembly of three hundred people. Four groups of tableaux illustrated in symbolic manner the influences that have gone into the world from this old town and church. The historic costumes were elaborate and beautiful, and the entire program effectively reproduced the spirit and customs of the Pilgrim days.

On Sunday the church was filled with a congregation of its sons, daughters and grandchildren well representing the country from Montreal, Canada, to Illinois on the west, and Washington on the south.

One of the sons of the church, Dr. Dwight

Men's Bible Class of First Church, Mansfield, Ohio

Not all the members of this flourishing class were present on the day this picture was taken but enough are in the picture to show that the class is a live one and looks ready to tackle the real problems of the day. The pastor of First, Mansfield, is Rev. O. L. Kiplinger. This class is one of the reasons why the church needs a parish house.

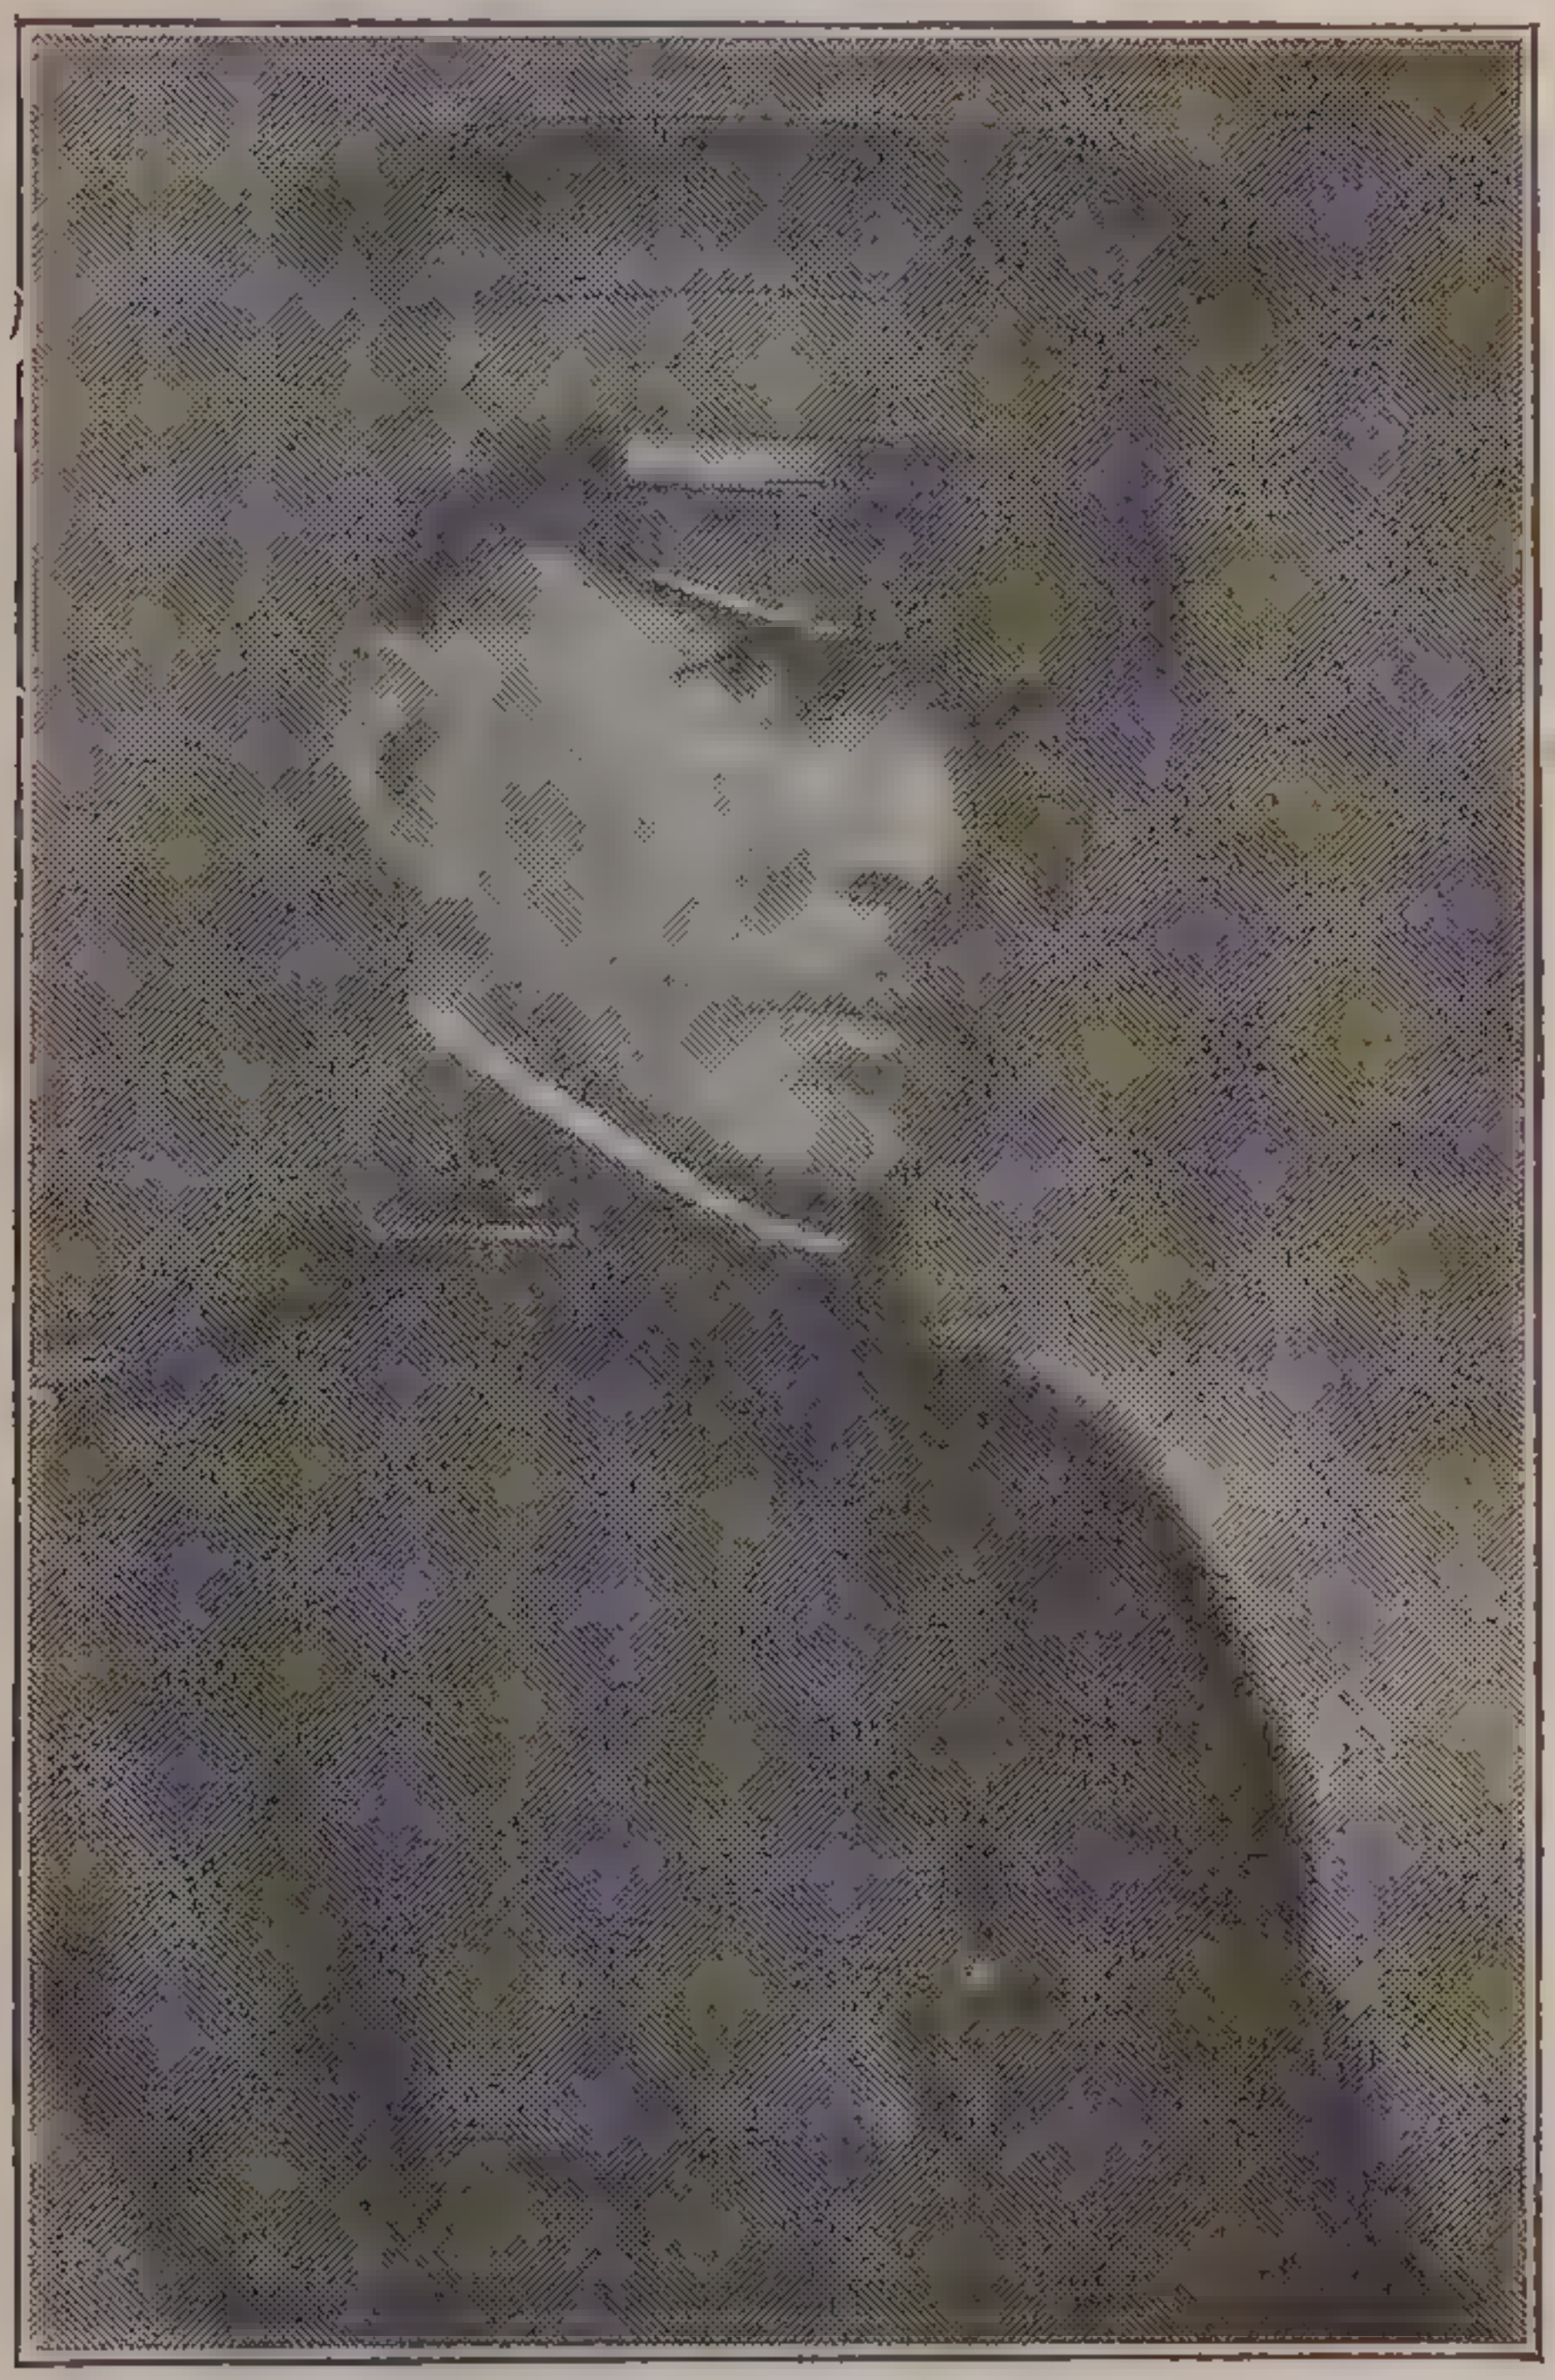
Mallory Pratt of Cleveland, O., preached the sermon on The Spirit of the Pilgrims. Through his efforts a delightful surprise was given the congregation in the gift of one hundred copies of The Church Hymnal donated by Noah Cornwell Rogers, Esq., of New York, and his sisters, Harriet L. and Sarah P. Rogers and Mrs. Daniel O. Rogers of New Britain, Ct., in memory of their father, Daniel M. Rogers, whose early life was associated with the old church. Rev. Charles N. Fitch of New York, a former pastor, assisted in the service.

The Samuel Scoville Association elected as Dr. Pratt's successor as president Professor Van Doren of Columbia University, and appointed a committee of prominent men: John Raphael Rogers of Brooklyn, Samuel Scoville, Jr., of Philadelphia, and Dr. Douglass Gold of Bridgeport, to secure a fund sufficient to redecorate the historic edifice in anticipation of the 100th anniversary of its erection in 1826.

The descendants of the Second Church are exceptionally loyal to its welfare and maintain from year to year a celebration of Old Home Sunday with growing interest and enlarging numbers. D. M. P.

From Factory to Pastorate

Rev. H. D. Gallaudet, who has accepted the call to the pastorate of FIRST, WATERBURY, to succeed Dr. C. A. Dinsmore, has had an interesting and suggestive experience.



REV. HERBERT D. GALLAUDET
In his war uniform

His grandfather, Thomas Hopkins Gallaudet, founded at Hartford, Ct., the first school for the deaf and dumb in America. His father, Edward Miner Gallaudet, was called to Washington, D. C., to take charge of the National Deaf Mute College. There Herbert Gallaudet was born in 1876. He graduated from Yale in 1898 and from Union Theological Seminary in 1902. For a year he was engaged in Y. M. C. A. work at the University of Virginia. He then entered the Home Mission work of the Presbyterian Church with a parish in the mountains of North Carolina ten miles square. Following that he came to Boston as assistant to Rev. John H. Denison at the Central Church, and in 1912 became pastor of the old First Church, or "North Church," of Bridgeport, Ct. He resigned in 1916 at the time of the consolidation of the North and South Congregational churches of that city.

Then comes a wholly new phase of ministerial experience and work. He went out with the Yale Battery for the war on the Mexican Border and was Chaplain of the 10th (Ct.) Field Artillery at Tobyhanna, Pa. His next work was in Waterbury as Superintendent of the social service and educational work of the Scoville Manufacturing Co. He secured leave of absence to attend the Plattsburg Camp and was given a commission as Captain of the 303d Field Artillery with which he served in France. And now he becomes pastor of a leading church in the city where he has worked among men in the shop.

Mr. Gallaudet did not look upon his factory service as turning aside from the gospel ministry but only as a special form of that ministry; and he does not now look upon his return to the pastorate as in any way a turning aside from the social interests to which he has been giving himself. In his letter of acceptance he says, "To me the great present task and privilege of a church of Christ is to so organize its activities and so direct its spiritual energies that the influence of Jesus shall be dominant all through the complex life of our times." That of course is simple enough and evident enough when you think of it but it is too often forgotten and it is well worth while to have it stated as a fundamental principle. Mr. Gallaudet believes that the greatest problems of industry are fundamentally religious problems because they are in the last analysis the problems of men and women. It is not barely a question of wages or conditions but of character, what men are themselves. There is nothing that can make the life of the world what it ought to be but the saving message of the Gospel coming into the lives of men and women and making them individually and personally what they ought to be.

Mr. Gallaudet believes in "The Chance of the Church Today," and his record shows how

Pastors' Conference Given Up

On account of the death of Dr. Herring the invitations for the Pastors' Conference to have been held at Hartford Theological Seminary are withdrawn and the meetings will not be held this fall. It is a matter of deep regret to the committee representing the Pastoral Union and the Hartford Seminary Foundation that this is necessary. They had looked forward to the meetings Sept. 13 and 14 with great expectation. The theme which Dr. Herring had chosen, "The Minister's Message for a World in Ferment," was so timely and vital and he himself was so amply qualified both intellectually and spiritually for the leadership of such a gathering on such a theme that those in charge were confident that the meetings of this year would not only be worthy successors of the meetings held in the three preceding years under the lead of Prof. Harry Emerson Fosdick, Pres. William Douglas Mackenzie and Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, but would have a distinct flavor and spiritual power of their own.

The committee has made every effort to secure a substitute for Dr. Herring but at this late date it has proved practically impossible to provide for adequate leadership.

The Pastoral Union and Hartford Seminary Foundation will plan to renew the series of meetings for spiritual fellowship in September, 1921, and very likely will propose the same theme for discussion. C. S. L.

NEW YORK

The Pilgrim Missionary League

The Pilgrim Missionary League of the State of New York, now in its sixth year, was the outcome of a carefully worked out plan for a closer organization of the young people's work of the Woman's Home Missionary Union of that state. It does not seek to multiply local organizations in the church, but simply links together in one big group all the young people's societies already existing and the new ones as they are formed, thus creating a strong bond of fellowship. Its object, as stated in the constitution, is "to awaken and sustain interest in missions, to train our young people and children in denominational loyalty, and to provide adequate financial support for denominational missionary work;" and it aims "to cultivate a spirit of loyalty to Jesus Christ, an intelligent knowledge of missions, and the habit of systematic benevolence."

The idea appealed at once to the young people of the state, and groups, or chapters, were started in all the associations, either the Young People's Society enrolling itself in the League without in any way losing its own identity or name, or an entirely new organization being formed, whichever seemed best suited to local needs. The League now enrolls about 200 groups, with an average membership of 25 to a group; has a state secretary, Mrs. L. C. Knapp of Homer, N. Y., an association organization in seven of the state associations with an assistant in each, who receives her training and inspiration for the work from the conferences at Silver Bay or Northfield.

The Pilgrim League is elastic in its organization and each group is free to lay out its own program and follow along its own line of work, the only requirement being that each shall pledge its loyal support to the denominational missionary budget, and shall do its part in the Reconstruction Work of the Woman's Home Missionary Union, which at present is the outfitting of the hospitals and dispensaries maintained by the A. M. A. The aim of the Pilgrim League auxiliaries for the year ending April 30, 1919, was $2,200. The receipts from the League were $2,700. The aim for the year ending in April, 1920, was $2,500, and this has been fully met, together with an extra allotment of $610, used to purchase a Ford car for the work of Rev. J. M. Moya of New Mexico. The budget for the League is divided into shares of $10 each, each group assuming a definite number of shares as its quota for the year. For 1921, besides other obligations, the Pilgrim League has undertaken the support of Mr. Johnson, the state superintendent of Sunday schools in Montana, and will also support four mission Sunday schools. Three of these schools have already been provided for, by the Ocean Avenue and Nazarene Sunday schools of Brooklyn and the Sunday school at Richmond Hill. The mission study books to be used for 1920-1921 will be those on "The Church and the Community," put out jointly by the Council of Women for Home Missions and the Interchurch World Movement; for adults, "The Church and the Community," by R. E. Diffendorfer; for young people, "Serving the Neighborhood," by R. A. Felton; and for juniors, "Mr. Friend-o'-Man," by Dr. J. T. Stocking.

Many and varied are the forms taken by the groups affiliated with the Pilgrim League. The working of the League is well illustrated at Plymouth Church, Syracuse, where a large organized Bible Class, under the direction of Mrs. William Spaulding, has become affiliated with the League and where, also, a more strictly missionary organization has recently been formed under the leadership of Mrs. George A. Brock, with a senior department of young women of college age and a junior department of girls under 14. Pilgrim Bible Class has a membership of about 100 young women between 25 and 35 years of age, some married, a good proportion being employed during the day. Business meetings are held once a month, six teachers are supplied each Sunday to the church school, a Schauffler pupil has been supported, and various contributions made to the Big Sisters, the Y. W. C. A., and other local institutions. A unique way of raising money has been found in what is termed "The Traveling Basket." The basket is made up of useful and fancy articles contributed by the members. Each article is plainly marked with the price and a small box provided in which money may be deposited. The basket is then sent on its travels, each recipient taking out one or more articles as they are desired, placing the price in the money box, and replacing the article or articles with a contribution of her own before the basket goes on its way to some one else. During the past year the basket has earned $232.89.

So successful has the Pilgrim League idea been in New York State that the Education Boards have recommended a form of national organization for a Pilgrim Federation, to embrace the young people's societies of the entire country. B. A.

OHIO

From Toledo to Straight College

Rev. Louis J. Luethi, pastor of SECOND, TOLEDO, has resigned after seven years' service to accept the chair in history at Straight College, New Orleans. Mrs. Luethi will also be an instructor in mathematics in the same institution. While in Toledo Rev. Mr. Luethi has served as president of the Toledo Pastors' Union, has held high positions in Congregationalism, and has taken an active interest in religious education. In scholarship he has been second to no pastor of the denomination there and his interest in educational work has led him to accept the position at New Orleans. Second Church, Toledo, has a proud history dating back before the Civil War and now has a loyal group of workers on the East Side, Toledo, which is a district of 45,000 people without another Congregational church.

MERRILL—Forrest Eugene Merrill, at Haverhill, Mass., after a short illness of pneumonia, June 25, 1920. Graduated from Amherst College, class of 1879.

REV. J. M. ROBINSON

Rev. J. M. Robinson died Aug. 17 at the home of his son, Dr. E. L. Robinson in Detroit, Mich. He was born in Cass County, Mich., July 3, 1847. He began his ministry as a Methodist in 1869. He became a Congregationalist in 1884, accepting the pastorate of the Fort St. Church in Detroit. After serving this church about three years he worked in Michigan for some months under the Home Missionary Society. In 1892 he entered the service of the American Missionary Association, acting for the next twenty years as Principal of the Brewer Normal School, Greenwood, S. C. In 1912 his health was such that he had to cease active work. Since that time he has been with his son in Detroit. His wife, who assisted him in the work in the South, survives him.

REV. ELVIRA COLE COBLEIGH

Rev. Elvira Cole Cobleigh died at her home in Walla Walla, Wash., July 21, 1920. She was born in Stark, N. H., Sept. 4, 1844, the daughter of Solomon and Ruth Cole. She graduated from Mt. Holyoke College in 1870 and was united in marriage to Rev. Nelson Farr Cobleigh, Sept. 1, 1870.

Mr. Cobleigh came to Walla Walla, Wash., as pastor of the Congregational Church from his pastorate at McIndoe Falls, Vt., in 1881. After two years he became General Missionary Superintendent of Eastern Washington, Eastern Oregon and Northern Idaho. Mrs. Cobleigh became financial agent for Whitman College in Walla Walla, visiting New England and raising funds which enabled her to build the first girls' dormitory at Whitman College and she was matron of the Ladies' Hall for eight years.

She found time during the summers to assist her husband in evangelistic work and after his death in 1887, she continued her work along these lines when possible, until finally she was regularly ordained and took up the work of a minister of the gospel.

For fifteen years she traveled from 14 to 37 miles a Sunday, preaching three times. She was in the active work of the ministry for 30 years, organizing in that time six Congregational churches and ten Sunday schools, building four churches, besides assisting in evangelistic services each winter.

During all her active life she was able to help young people to obtain an education by having them in her home and assisting them through college.

She gave up her pastorate at 72 years, but was sought after for pastoral services as long as she was able to perform them.

Her funeral was conducted by Rev. Frank McConaughy and was largely attended by friends from all parts of Southeastern Washington.

CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH HUME

Charlotte Elizabeth Hume, who died at Clifton Springs on Aug. 6, 1920, spent a large part of her life in India. As the daughter, wife, sister and mother of missionaries, she gave most of her strength in direct service to the Master.

REV. AND MRS. EDWARD S. HUME

Mrs. Hume was born in Madura, South India, on Sept. 3, 1847, the oldest of the ten children of Rev. and Mrs. John Eddy Chandler, for many years conspicuous figures among the missionaries of the American Board. As a girl she spoke Tamil fluently, and though her work as a missionary was in the Marathi-speaking part of India, she never forgot her childhood's tongue. Mrs. Hume came to this country with her parents during the Civil War. After they returned to India, she mothered the brothers and sisters left behind. Much of her American life was spent in New Haven, both as a student and as a teacher in Grove Hall.

In 1875 she was married to Rev. Edward S. Hume, likewise the child of missionaries to India, and a classmate at Yale of her brother, Rev. John S. Chandler. Immediately after the wedding these two young missionaries went back to the land of their birth, to the Marathi Mission, where Mr. Hume's parents had served for fifteen years (1839-1854).

After a year of language study, Mr. and Mrs. Hume were assigned to the work in Bombay, where the father, Rev. R. W. Hume, had long been stationed and where Rev. and Mrs. Charles Harding had more recently been in charge. Although Bombay was the first station of the American Board, climate and other obstacles had seriously interfered with the continuity of mission work there. Mr. Hume was now in the city of his birth but faced innumerable difficulties as he took up work there with his young bride. The church, founded in 1827, was the oldest in the Marathi Mission and was still active. Educational work, on the other hand, was but little emphasized.

Mr. and Mrs. Hume gave their lives in large measure to developing education in Bombay, without ever neglecting its relation to the work of the church. From the very beginning they set out to have all the children of the church attend the Mission School. Starting with but three or four pupils, the school grew rapidly, till it consisted of boarding departments for boys and girls and a government aided day school, whose curriculum reached from kindergarten stages up to matriculation or college entrance grade.

Mrs. Hume was the great organizer in connection with the school situation. Her marvelous ability in this direction was seen most clearly during 1900, the terrible famine year. Left alone, with her husband on enforced sick leave in America, she marshaled her Indian assistants and received and cared for the hundreds of children brought to her, with the skill of a general. Tenderly she nursed them, and through her love and labor brought many back to a degree of health. All of them called her "Mother." Many knew no other mother.

Mrs. Hume excelled, too, in music and needlework. Her genius was shown in the way she taught the Indian children part singing in English as well as how to copy the most exquisite designs of her own drawing in all kinds of dainty and elaborate fancy work.

When Mr. and Mrs. Hume finally left India in August, 1903, there was widespread grief throughout the Christian community and especially among the famine children to whom she had ministered. The anniversary of their departure was always remembered and was an occasion for real sorrow.

After Mr. Hume's death in 1908, Mrs. Hume continued to live in New Haven until three years ago. Though these years were filled with much pain and suffering, she still attempted to keep up a correspondence with many in India and with all who were interested in that country. Among her letters was a recent one from some of her old pupils in India, full of expressions of love and devotion for their beloved mother missionary.

The end came peacefully and without pain. Those who are left behind can only rejoice that she has met again with the one with whom she shared her life, as well as with those many, many Indian children and friends whom she had led to know Christ.

CLINTON V. S. REMINGTON

Clinton V. S. Remington, a leading citizen of Fall River, Mass., died there Aug. 24 following a surgical operation. He was born in Fall River on Oct. 15, 1839, the son of Hale and Catherine Van Santvoort Remington. He was a pioneer cotton and cloth broker in his teens, continuing actively in this business up to the time of his death.

Apart from his home life, Mr. Remington's deepest interest centered in Central Congregational Church, of which he had been a member for seventy years. He served as deacon, member of the pastor's cabinet, and as teacher and superintendent of the Sunday school. For many years he was the chairman of the financial committee of the church. For some years he was president of the Massachusetts Sunday School Association, and was a delegate to the National Council at Grand Rapids.

Mr. Remington was for several years a member of the city government. A genial, public-spirited, generous, devotedly religious man, he will be greatly mourned in his church and in his native city.

Evangelism is the appeal to the reason for a verdict and to the will for the enforcement of that verdict unto the building up of the Body of Christ. A living Church must always be a converting Church, and never more so than now.—William Horace Day.

AN IMPORTANT BOOKLET FOR CONGREGATIONALISTS

BEFORE completing the plans for the new church in your neighborhood it is of vital importance that you read this booklet.

It contains an explanation of the true purpose of church furnishings. It tells how varied appropriations may be economically expended to secure the best and most harmonious results in the church interior.

If you are planning a new church, or if you are intending to refurnish your present edifice, this booklet will prove valuable to you, to the directors, and to the architect.

We will gladly send you one without cost or obligation.

Culled from Calendars

To Mothers

Habits are formed in the first score of years of life. It is therefore most important that those years be filled with the best. A sense of responsibility, a knowledge of right and wrong, a keen sense of honor, all these must be developed before the child has reached his majority.

The basis of right living always has been and always will be religion. No nation has stood after religion had been discarded. American youth must be well grounded in religious faith if the nation is to endure the stress of the coming years.

The Bible School of the First Congregational Church of Spencer aims to implant the right motives of life based on the religion of Jesus Christ. It seeks to give to the growing child a conception of religion that will develop character and individual responsibility.

But the Bible School cannot succeed in its unselfish mission unless it is supported by the home. The child must be regular in attendance. He must spend some time in preparation of the lesson. He must be taught at home to reverence sacred things. There is no agency on earth that can take the place of the home. The Bible School can be and will be a wonderful help to the home provided the home stands back of the school in its efforts for the welfare and training of the child.

Will you not, then, co-operate with us in the attempt we are making to develop your child by seeing that the child is regular in attendance, does spend some time in study, and is taught to respect above all else the most fundamental part of our civilization, the religion of Jesus Christ?—First, Spencer, Mass.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

There are twenty-five million boys and girls in the United States under twenty years of age.

Between seventy-five and eighty-five per cent. of all these children who ever become Christians will do so before their twentieth birthday. If we are going to reach the majority of them, it must be done before that date.

In one of the largest denominations in the country seventy-six per cent. of all increase in church membership on confession of faith comes through the church school.

After a careful study, it is estimated that the Protestants spend twenty-four hours a year in organized religious instruction, the Jews one hundred and eight, and Catholics four hundred and eight. In other words, those people know better than we, apparently, the importance of the plastic childhood period.

Probably there are twenty-five million people in the United States now outside the Christian Church who at some time or other were in church schools, and whom we allowed to get away from us, partly because we were doing such shoddy work.—First, Evanston, Ill.

Words are the body of truth. A wordless world would be a world without friendship or inspiration, its silences would haunt and numb us. What we think of or hope or dream or hunger for or worship comes to us first in the guise of words. But a word can never be an end in itself, it is the vehicle of truth. A word that has no reality in it is a lie and words must be justly used and fairly dealt with. Extravagant speech is a sin against truth. We need a new respect for words just now; they are not mere breath or passing sound, they are life and truth and thought and God. "Man's word is God in man." Tried by such tests as these, the words that are printed big and black—or red—in the headlines of our newspapers and which are reported from senators and politicians, and sometimes preachers, are not the light of truth, they are the murk of passion and anger, hysteria and folly. They confuse every issue and hinder righteousness. "Study to show thyself a workman who needeth not to be ashamed, handling aright the word of truth."—First, Detroit, Mich.

A Christian pulpit is a place for preaching the Gospel of Christ. To it, people who hunger for the Living God should be able to look, and not go empty away. But this is a time of supreme upheaval in human society. Much of the turmoil is the fruit of passion. But much of it is due to ideas—ideas which are being propagated everywhere. Many of these ideas are conceived in suffering and brought forth in desperation. Some are conceived in bitterness and brought forth in hatred. They are being marshaled into programs which are full of high explosive.

What shall a Christian pulpit do?

Shall it confine itself to preaching to the inner life of people somewhat removed from the bitterness of the struggle? While preaching its world-needed and precious doctrine of good will, shall it be content to deal in unspecific generalities? Or shall it include, as an integral part of the gospel for the age, the frank discussion of public affairs?

Surely, if it does not deal with these things in the concrete, it cannot clear itself of responsibility for the cataclysm which will follow.—North, Berkeley, Cal.

Let us keep up our standards. Let us be loyal to our ideals. There are people all around us who are impatient with high standards. Every day the world does its best to bring down its loftiest ideals. But we Christians are in the world to keep ideals high. We are disciples of the Perfect One, and we have no saving power unless we do more than the multitude around us. The church must be kept beautiful. Its worship must not be allowed to become tame and slovenly. Its work must not be done in a careless or haphazard way. The fires must be kept burning, and there must be suggestions in all her life of the life of the One who is matchless.—Broadway Tabernacle, New York, N. Y.

They are wings of hope and action—the wings of the morning. Nothing is impossible when the day is fully come and we have risen to our tasks; but the darkest hours in any life are those hours before the dawn when we lie and brood and fear and the pallid light of our chambers is populous with specters. God be praised for the clear light of the morning which calls us away from shadows, fear haunted and misleading, to the glowing comradeship of love and duty. —First, Detroit, Mich.

No one man can do everything. You be content to do your work and be sympathetic to other people and tolerant of them. It is astonishing how different people take up with different work, and they get exceedingly critical with other people who do not exactly see as they do: Let them all do their work and love one another. No one man can cover the whole field, but all the workers will cover it.—W. L. Watkinson.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, some time ago, while traveling in a third-class railway carriage in the North of England, sat down hurriedly next to a little girl in shawl and clogs. Happening to glance at her a moment or two afterward, he saw that she was regarding him with no great favor. It dawned upon him that he was sitting on her newspaper. "Here, my dear," said Mr. Birrell, pulling the paper from under him and handing it to her, "I'm sorry." The little girl did not look quite satisfied, but she said nothing till, a few minutes later, the train drew up at the station. "Please, sir," she then inquired meekly, "may I have my fried fish?" NEW ENGLAND'S INFLUENCE IN KANSAS, by Howard A. Bridgman

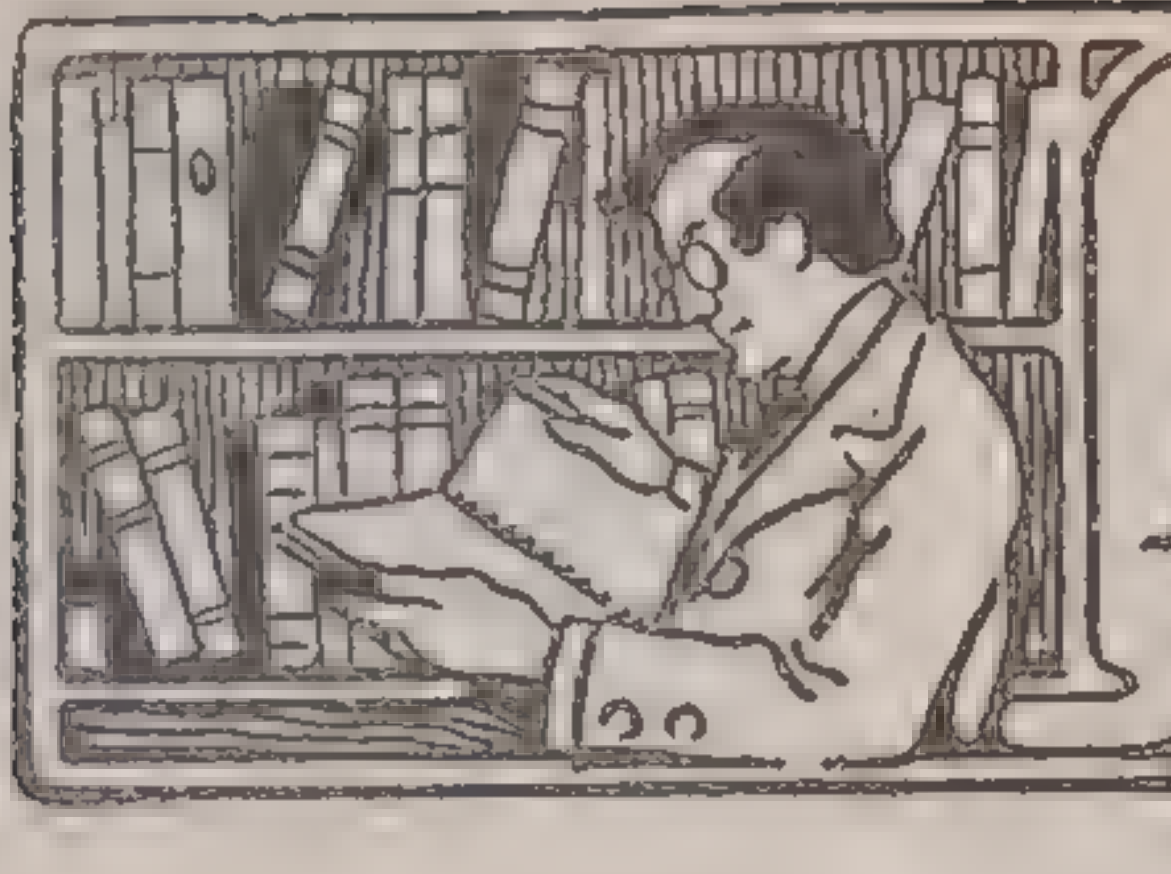
RADICAL DISILLUSIONMENT REGARDING SOVIET RUSSIA, by Arthur E. Holt



AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Another Lincoln Drama

A Man of the People, by Thomas Dixon (Appleton). The great success of Drinkwater's play makes it certain, and also desirable, that there shall be American dramas based on the life of Lincoln. In this play of three acts, a prologue and an epilogue, Thomas Dixon has done a strong piece of work. The prologue deals with the death of Lincoln's mother, and she is portrayed worthily; and the epilogue is a dignified cross-section of the second inaugural, with Lincoln uttering the noblest part of his address on that occasion. The body of the play deals with the magnanimity of Lincoln in September, 1864, after it had become certain that McClellan would be elected unless some signal victory occurred. Of course Thaddeus Stevens is Mr. Dixon's villain, as always; but he has two close seconds in McClellan and in Henry Raymond of the New York Tribune. Stanton is there, crabbed, profane, insolent, but loyal. Mrs. Lincoln is drawn with sympathy and true appreciation of her hard position. It is known that Lincoln expected McClellan to win the election of 1864, and that he wrote in the presence of his Cabinet a pledge to support McClellan in the months between the election and inauguration. Dixon goes but little farther in representing him as willing to withdraw in McClellan's favor if McClellan would denounce the treasonable element in his own party and pledge himself to fight till the war was won. McClellan was already compromised and could not make the pledge. The capture of Atlanta turned the election in Lincoln's favor. It is a strong play; and in its historic setting is correct. It is a true tribute to the magnanimity of Lincoln. W. E. B.

Lord Beaconsfield

The Life of Benjamin Disraeli, by George Earl Buckle (Macmillan). This is a continuation, volumes V. and VI., of the biography begun by W. F. Monypenny and covers the period from 1868 to 1881. Both volumes contain copious extracts from Disraeli's correspondence. It was a great period in his life and in the history of England. In 1868 he became Prime Minister. The first chapter deals with the disestablishment of the Irish Church. In 1870 was the Franco-Prussian War, when the question of the neutrality of Belgium was up and defended by Disraeli. In 1875 England gained control of the Suez Canal. In 1877 Victoria was proclaimed Empress of India. Vol. VI. is largely devoted to Lord Beaconsfield's management of the Eastern question, "the most outstanding feature of his great administration." The two volumes fittingly close the great biography of one of the greatest and best beloved of England's statesmen.

Recent Fiction

Painted Meadows, by Sophie Kerr (Doran). This strong, evenly wrought story, rich in human nature, has its scene in a village "not far south of Mason and Dixon's Line," and the time is the nineties. The quiet, demure heroine is carried away by a sudden and intense love for a dashing youth, newly come to town, and thereby repulses a far better man who loves her steadfastly. As for the husband, "the Pagan god Pan touched him in his cradle," a verdict of the village doctor. "That kind haven't got much brains but they've got highly developed instincts." Much of the story takes up the attitude of his wife toward his limitations, showing how she spoiled him. "All the little bit of backbone Gil White ever had she's taken out of him." There are no loose ends in the book and all the characters are drawn with equal care. They and their conversations are memorable. But the method of working out the conclusion is a matter for controversy.

Many Junes, by Archibald Marshall (Dodd, Mead) The tale of a lonely man. Hugh Lelacheur is introduced as "a tall, thin boy of sixteen with a solemn face and a pair of fine eyes." Despite his aristocratic lineage, Fate cuts him off from home, fortune and friends. Loving the country, he becomes a humble clerk in London. Great fortune and a great love come to him too late. "Many Junes" slip by, then suddenly he wrests happiness from untoward circumstances. The story follows a shadowed path a long way but the book cannot be put by, so compelling is it in its power and simplicity.

A Maker of Saints, by Hamilton Drummond (Dutton). A romance of Italy in the thirteenth century. Dante, exiled from Florence, appears in a few pages. But the chief character in the story is a sculptor, called, because of his wonderful masterpieces in marble, "a Maker of Saints." Born in a peasant home he is in mind and nature the peer of the nobility and falls in love with a daughter of the House of Faldora. The story is exceptionally fine in tone, quality and style, and should rank with the best of historical romance.

Wunpost, by Dane Coolidge (Dutton). The imagination of the author runs wild but he has given a gold-mining story of an unusual type. A daring young prospector who is successful in finding rich mines but not in keeping them, a delightful heroine, and several deeply dyed villains provide the human element of the tale. It is not a probable tale, but it is entertaining.

The Quirt, by B. M. Bower (Little, Brown). A typical ranch story with a big ranch that swallows the little ones, growing fat by methods that do not balk at murder. But a Federal agent is on the trail. A girl, in the midst of a thunder storm, is eye witness of a murdering, and that is the beginning of the end. It is also the beginning of a satisfactory romance.

The Chinese Coat, by Jennette Lee (Scribners). A fanciful story combining the homely, everyday things of domesticity with a quaint air of mysticism. The young wife of a struggling young business man finds, in a department store, a wonderful Chinese coat which she craves. Her husband longs to give it to her though they both know that she has nowhere to wear it and no other clothes in keeping. The situation is absurd and pathetic. Years pass. Prosperity comes and the children grow up. An amusing interlude describes the "bringing up of mother." Finally, husband and wife, recalling the old dream, go on a pilgrimage to China in search of the now priceless coat.

All-Wool Morrison, by Holman Day (Harpers). A lively story in which the returned doughboys play a worthy part in preventing a riot, and Morrison, the Mayor, wins a victory for the people against the grafters and prevents the grabbing of the state's water power by private interests.

The Lonely House, by Mrs. Belloc Lowndes (Doran). A superior type of mystery story. The location is Monaco and the characters English, Italian and French. An English girl, orphaned, visits a relative in a lonely villa in Monaco and finds herself at once plunged into a strange atmosphere and involved in horrible experiences. She is also the object of the devoted attentions of two men, one Italian, the other English. There are glimpses of Monte Carlo and one of the most interesting characters is a French secret service official. The story is exceptionally well told.

The Imperfect Mother, by J. D. Beresford (Macmillan). This is an English story of contrasting temperaments. The contests between a mother, jealous of her exclusive relations with her only son, and her refusal to share affection, first with his boyhood friends and companions in play, then with the girl with whom he is in love, give opportunity for the study of a complex and unhappy character. The boy's father is a nonentity, and the mother's desertion of her home, the author excuses and explains by the contrast of her vivid ambitions and desire of life, with elements of poverty and weakness surrounding her. The result of her transgression is well indicated later on in the story.

In War Time and After

The Uncensored Letters of a Canteen Girl (Holt). A volume of letters home, written between November, 1917, and April, 1919, describing the author's experiences in France, but not mailed because they contained names of places and persons and other material which would not have passed the censor. They are vivacious, interesting and instructive.

The Corsair in the War Zone, by Ralph D. Paine (Houghton Mifflin). The fine ocean-sailing yacht of J. Pierpont Morgan was one of the fleet chosen to patrol the coast of France and to assist in convoying American transports. For nearly two years she did valiant service which is well described in this attractive volume. Mr. Paine knows how to write a good sea story and this true record is more thrilling than any fiction.

The Human Costs of the War, by Homer Folks (Harper). At the close of the war the author was requested to make a survey of the needs of Southern and Southeastern Europe. He herewith describes the situation in Serbia, Belgium, France, Italy and Greece. The four final chapters endeavor to sum up the war's results in these countries in the three vital aspects of childhood, home and health, and to "fit the whole into a picture of War vs. Welfare." It is a tragic, gruesome and appalling review. Nevertheless it should be read by Americans and be placed in every library.

Service of Love in War Time, by Rufus M. Jones (Macmillan). An interesting account of the part borne by Quakers in relief work of various kinds during the war. It also reveals something of the persecution and suffering which many of them had to endure, especially those of draft age, from the inability of others to comprehend their conscientious convictions. The service rendered should call forth admiration and approval.

German Leaders of Yesterday and Today, by Eric Dombrowski (Appleton). Thirty-one biographical sketches by the political editor of the Berliner Tageblatt, vivid in style, humorous and entertaining. Ebert, Ludendorf, Theodor Wolff, Mathias Erzberger, Alfred Von Tirpitz, Wilhelm II., Adolph Hoffmann, Helfferich, Scheiderman, are among the more familiar names. Most of the comments on the leaders of yesterday are quite scandalous.

The Talk of the Sanctum

Why Our Papers Are Late

Just as last week's issue of The Congregationalist and Advance was going to press the press feeders in the big printing plants of Boston walked out. It was an unauthorized strike but it lasted a week and stopped our presses so that the paper was a week late. Then the press feeders were ordered back to work by their union officials. All the union printers are under agreements running way into next year, but demands for more money have become contagious, and the press feeders, already well paid, followed a demand for a large increase by this hasty action, disregarding an offer previously made for a voluntary increase. They had no special complaint against us. The small group that has made the trouble simply joined in the action taken by union press feeders throughout the city. All of our printers agree that they are fairly and generously treated, and we greatly appreciate their excellent work, their fidelity and good will. We see no occasion for further labor trouble and hope that our paper will soon be back to its regular schedule.

Under such circumstances other publishers have usually skipped an issue. We do not intend thus to disappoint our subscribers or our advertisers, but find it necessary to make a smaller paper for this issue in order to gain time that has been lost. Next week we hope to give full measure again and to be almost if not quite on time.

Poems that Cheer

What a world of comfort and cheer there is in some of our favorite poems. Many of them are poems of long ago; some of them have appeared but recently. Would it not be a delightful service if we should pass on poems that have helped us most to the thousands of other readers of The Congregationalist and Advance who need just the help that inspiring poems give? We shall be glad to publish these favorites if you will send them to us. Please give the author's name in each case if possible, and give your own name and address too. It will add to the interest of others if they know that a particular poem of inspiration or comfort has helped you.

Address, Favorite Poem Dept., The Editors, The Congregationalist and Advance, 14 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

In the Circulation Department—

They continue to come! We refer to the sunshine messages and words of encouragement from you. How far an expression of appreciation goes toward spurring us on to our best efforts! Of course we try to make each new number better than the last, but here are some readers who were so pleased with certain issues they just had to write and tell us so:

A New York subscriber says, "I want to congratulate you upon the admirable quality of The Congregationalist and Advance, especially in the reports of the International Council."

And a voice from Ohio reaches out to us across the miles, "You are publishing a fine paper. The numbers on the Tercentenary Celebration are splendid indeed."

A message from the Pacific Coast is worth passing on to you: "Am greatly pleased with the Education Number. We greatly need a live church paper which helps us in solving some of our difficult community problems connected with our church work."

Finally, just a line from a Connecticut subscriber, who added in sending his renewal, "For one year's subscription to The Congregationalist which never before was conducted as helpfully as now."

Sept. 6, 1920.

Dear Friends and Fellow Workers:

I have reason to know that I am addressing a large number who through reading this page have become friends and fellow workers in maintaining Piedmont College. I have just returned from a three weeks' vacation, the first in seven years, and am now facing the new college year, to begin day after tomorrow. Many of you have been regular Donors to the College for years; some have recently begun; some have been thinking of beginning; while others have this matter brought before them for the first time.

I wonder how many of you can realize what it means to face a year of college work with large plans and budget voted by the Trustees; with opportunities, such as fall to the lot of few; and with no resources but faith in God and friends. Whoever tries it without a genuine faith in both God and friends will soon find himself with anxious days and sleepless nights, resulting soon in a nervous breakdown.

Will you realize with me what I am facing this year, with the cost of everything mounting higher and higher, with a budget nearly double anything we have had before, and with an Institution that has fairly leaped into full college rank and demands? The summer work in replacing, in part, our burned dormitory, in the necessary repairs and in new equipment, has drained dry our Treasury and made us anticipate future donations.

I come to you with this, our common work before us and our common responsibility for it as servants of the same Master, and ask that you will do your utmost, as I will try to do mine, in successfully carrying on this College during the coming year. Three thousand of you have helped in the past; how many will repeat or enlarge your donations? How many will help for the first time?

If you could know the crushing anxiety of these hours, I know you would help lift the burden. Could you imagine how much a $1,000 check would lift, many of you would send one, while many more would make up thousands by combining many smaller ones.

ANYTHING LESS THAN A RESPONSE OF $10,000 TO THIS APPEAL WILL LEAVE THE BURDEN UNBEARABLE.

Will all Piedmont's friends write me a letter at once, enclosing something—anything from a postage stamp to a $50,000 check?

Yours with mingled faith and anxiety,

FRANK E. JENKINS,
President Piedmont College,
Demorest, Ga.

The Steel Report Once More

A vigorous propaganda is being carried on by certain elements which seem to be connected with the manufacturing interests of the country to discredit the recent report of the Interchurch Commission on the steel strike. A magazine called Industry, published semi-monthly in Washington, is devoting successive issues to this attack, which includes not only the Interchurch Movement, but the Federal Council.

We are not prepared to defend all the findings of the Interchurch Commission with relation to the steel strike, or indorse every utterance on the labor question of every official of the Federal Council. On the other hand, it strikes us that Industry is inclined to throw dust in the eyes of good people and divert them from the main question, which is whether or not conditions, broadly speaking, in the steel industry are right and fair. But instead of taking sixteen pages to depreciate the men who made the investigations and to give the impression that they were all semi-Bolshevists and undesirable citizens, Industry would better utilize that same space in disproving the findings themselves.

Such leaders as Bishop Francis of the Methodist Church and the late Dr. H. C. Herring of the Congregational National Council were willing to append their names to the report. These findings which were printed in part in The Congregationalist Aug. 12 are cold, bare statements of what the investigators believe to be true.

The main question before the churches and the country is, Are these assertions to be credited? We withhold our own final judgment until this report has been analyzed by Prof. Graham Taylor of the Chicago Theological Seminary, whom we have asked to review it for this paper.

The election of Obregon in Mexico was expected, but is welcome. Among all the generals—and Mexico is still so much under the influence of militarism that a general is the probable candidate always—Obregon is most in sympathy with the idea of cultivating good relations with other nations and especially with the United States. We hope he will be able to put down revolt and consolidate all the peaceful and progressive forces so that Mexico may prosper and no grounds of complaint be offered by either of the neighboring nations to the other.

What They Are Bringing Back

Mid-September finds most of the people who have been making holiday back in their accustomed places, at the desk, in the home, in the school—and let us hope, in the church also. Pleasing is the sight of these returning travelers as they step out of their trains and steamers, laden with the fruit of their sojournings here and there. Usually something has been found in the beautiful places in God's world where tired folk find refreshment that becomes a temporary or permanent addition to their personal assets. It may be some of the products of the field, the garden, or the woods; it may be a new pet, tenderly fondled and cherished by the younger members of the family; it often is a coat of tan on the cheeks, or a more erect carriage, or a rested look in the eyes, or a desirable addition to one's avoirdupois, or more muscle in arm or leg.

Happy the traveler who brings back a new friendship, a real relish for the old job or a new one, closer insight into some personal problem, a stout heart for what the morrow may bring.

All these are God's good gifts out of the golden summer time. But one can bring back nothing better than a contented mind, the disposition to take the world and one's own part of the world as he finds it without murmuring over its limitations, in the confidence that this is just where God would have us, for the time being at least, work out, with his help, our own salvation. This is our chance for the making of character, for the service of our fellowmen. Contentment with this particular opportunity, acceptance of life in the way it comes to us, does not mean negation of all just ambitions, or the crucifixion of noble aspirations. It does mean that in an extremely restless age, and at a peculiarly excitable time in national and international life we range ourselves not with those who would add to the popular discontent, but with those who try to keep steady and calm and fair and good tempered in the midst of perplexities and strifes.

If we can bring back such a mind as this, which certainly bears some slight resemblance to the mind of Christ, we are in for a good autumn and a good winter. For the ground of our inward hope and cheer is in God himself, to whom this restless world belongs, and who gives to us the inestimable privilege of living in it and of laboring for it.

That was a pleasant interchange of courtesies between Plymouth, England, and Plymouth, Massachusetts, while the former was celebrating the departure of the settlers who made the latter famous. There was plenty of good will for the Pilgrims in England three hundred years ago, but it was muzzled and restrained. Now it is cordial and general, as the relation of a mother and her children always ought to be.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of Philosophy and Money

There came to me a Rich Man, who spake unto me, saying, What is a Philosopher?

And I said, As is his name, so is he; one that loveth Wisdom.

And he said, Art thou a Philosopher?

And I said, Humblest am I among the most humble of her servants; yet am I a lover of Wisdom.

And he said, I am no Philosopher, but I am a Rich Man. What dost thou consider a Rich Man to be?

And I answered, As one whom God hath blessed so richly with abundance of Soup whereon he filleth himself so that he hath no room nor appetite for the Ice Cream, so is many a Rich Man; but also there are Others. Of which sort art thou?

And he said, If thou art a Philosopher, thou shouldest know. But art not thou thyself a lover of Money? Yea, doth not every Philosopher love Money more than any Rich Man loveth Philosophy?

And I said, That question hath been asked of old. And there was a Rich Man in Olden Time who thus asked a Philosopher wiser than I. And that Philosopher answered, The reason that Philosophers care more for Money than Rich Men care for Wisdom is that Philosophers know what they Lack, and Rich Men know not.

And he said, The Philosopher who said that was a Wise Old Boy.

And I said, O thou Rich Man, thou art not altogether hopeless. Even like unto the Big Monsters of the Deep that yet are Mammals and not Fish, so hast thou something beside Gills; yea thou hast Lungs that are fitted for More Oxygen than thou canst extract from the Salt Water of Business; and now and then must thou Come Up to Breathe.

And I said unto him,

Hearken thou to me. The Philosopher is not saved by his Philosophy, and it is Right Possible for him to be at one and the same time a Philosopher and a Fool; neither is there any way under Heaven whereby either may be saved if he use not the gift of God for the welfare of others.

And he said, Thou art indeed a Wise Old Boy.

Now that the vacations are over, perhaps we can learn how to make our Sundays real times of refreshment for the spirit and rest for the body. But for that we must make them as unlike ordinary days as our duty will allow.

The navy may well be proud of the record of Lieutenant-Commander Charles M. Cooke and his crew in the submarine S-5, sunk off the Delaware Capes and rescued with difficulty after thirty-seven hours on the bottom of the sea. The skill, patience and courage shown are encouraging for our belief in the possibilities of human nature.

The Call of the Cape

By Frederick Brooks Noyes

Those who have lived on the "arterial road" of Cape Cod, during the past three months, will testify that the summer of 1920 has been an unusual one. This is partly due to the desire of tourists to make up time lost during the war, but more especially to the series of Tercentenary celebrations.

Chauffeurs dream of this "arterial road" and declare that it is the best in America. It is coated with some silencing compound of asphalt and rubber. My piazza commands this popular boulevard. As I note the number plates on the well-appointed motors, I discover that people from every state in the Union, and also from Canada are touring the Cape. As a line of cars recedes on this shock-absorbing highway there is a sound like a swish of wings. Surely the spirit of the Continent has come to Cape Cod in 1920. After all, this is but the beginning of the Pilgrim road which ends in the sunset trail. These elegant people inside these fine automobiles are the gold-seekers, oil-seekers, coal-seekers, steel-seekers, wheat-seekers, returning with all speed, over the route upon which their ancestors so slowly moved. As Esther Willard Bates sets forth in her pageant, "The road the Pilgrims trod now winds about the earth."

All shore resorts have a trick of swelling and shrinking with changes in the weather and Cape Cod, which is a pretty small place on wet days, has never seemed bigger than during the clear days of August, 1920.

Four Towns Celebrate

Four towns have commemorated the landing of the Pilgrims. Chatham, Wellfleet, Truro and Provincetown, and the essential features of the Pilgrim type and spirit have been preserved and transmitted to the next generation in the realistic pageantry of these observances.

The outstanding fact of all these Cape celebrations is just this pulling together of the next generations. We can never be too thankful that legions of young men and young women have followed these events, from town to town. The crowds have been composed of the same youthful summer colonists that are seen in the moving picture theaters and dance pavilions. It is significant that this extended watering place has been enlivened in 1920 by something besides jazz and wild farce. The Tercentenary has made an appeal to high imagination. Unfavorable as the atmosphere of today is to the imaginative, something invaluable has been done here to create an atmosphere that would shape the enthusiasm of the young. In other years the only refuge of entertainment for seaside cottagers has been the sensational screen and films. The program this August has been to motor to Provincetown to watch the pirates parade the narrow streets, or to Truro, to see Miles Standish and Samoset, Governor Bradford and Squanto emerge from the pine forest near "Cornhill."

Chatham opened the Tercentenary. The observance was in the Congregational church and in Freeman's Grove. The speakers here were Town historian Smith, Brewer Eddy, John Walker, Principal Boyden of Bridgewater, neighboring clergy and town officials. Much was made of the town's great marine prosperity in earlier days, and also of the preaching of Samuel Treat to the Nanset Indians, which was as effective as that of John Eliot at Natick. A good story was told of a Chatham pastor who went to a Connecticut parish. Continually reminding his new people of the virtues of his former Chatham parishioners, he was rebuked in a prayer meeting, by an old lady, who said she never expected to get to heaven, but hoped she would "get as far as Chatham."

After one day of listening to historical allusions, many spent the second day, not in listening, but in looking, motoring to Stage Harbor to see where Champlain landed in 1609 and built his oven of stones, to bake bread, in the intervals he was ashore, during his explorations of the coast. Monomoy beach, and Pleasant Bay though at extreme ends of Chatham, were both visited. The latter point was of singular interest to all lovers of Pilgrim history, for here is the grave of Squanto.

Wellfleet's Week

Wellfleet's old home week followed the next week after Chatham's. Approaching the town in the car of a man from the Northwest, we were reminded by our host, that all the types of scenery in America were epitomized on Cape Cod. "I had expected to find only a sandspit but the marshes of Barnstable and cornfields of Eastham suggest to me my own prairie county and the sand dunes of Wellfleet and Truro are much like the buttes of Montana. I was never so surprised as when my car struck the grades on the lower Cape."

Here again as in Chatham the Pilgrims were preceded by a doughty navigator. John Smith sailed into Wellfleet Harbor in 1614. He named the country "New England." The incident in Pilgrim history here was the journey from Provincetown by boat, of Miles Standish and others, to Billingsgate Harbor, and the attack of the savages.

The celebration at Wellfleet was in no sense a repetition of that at Chatham. Each Cape town has a unique hold on history through its geography. Capt. Frederick Snow, a deacon of the Congregational church, described the hooks or arms of sand along the coast as traps for fish, and the longer one stays on the Cape, the more one appreciates the deeper meaning of this material fact. Hon. Everett Nye, the town historian, made another nice psychological touch, when he called attention to the dignified, conciliatory and yet most courageous policy, adopted by Wellfleet during the Revolutionary War. Suffering from her helpless and defenseless position, she yet resolved in full town meeting in 1776 to support Congress in declaration of independence "with our lives and fortunes."

Two most human episodes in church history were thrown upon the screen of our memory at Wellfleet. Dr. Thomas Derrick of Corning, N. Y., a former pastor, described a bitter controversy over placing a stove in the church. On the first Sunday that the store was installed, many who had opposed its installation fainted, overcome by the imaginary heat, for there was no fire in the stove.

The other episode gives us a proper sense of many ministerial tragedies. The president of the day, Hon. Arthur H. Rogers, took your correspondent to an overgrown cemetery in the heart of a pine forest. Here in the Chequesset Neck Burial Ground is the grave of Rev. Josiah Oaks, mentioned by all late writers on Cape Cod. The clergyman's father, who was "a doctor of physick in Harvard College," is buried near. But the brief inscription on the pastor's monument will haunt me more than a life-size statue.

> "The memory of the just,
> HOWEVER TREATED, is blessed."

Dr. Derrick also compared the two centuries of ecclesiastical records, to show the contrast in the tenure of the clergy. "From 1720 to 1820, there were three pastorates, from 1820 to 1920 there were thirty-three pastorates. They used to keep their ministers, now they keep them moving."

Drifting about Wellfleet streets I found a venerable deep-sea captain who gave me the names applied to the men from different towns of the Cape as they enlisted in the crews of the fishing fleets. The Harwich boys were called "hair-leggers," the Truro boys "hog-backers," Eastham boys "yellow bellies," Chatham boys "wrinkle-divers," but the Wellfleet boys "Bible faces," for Wellfleeters never fished on Sundays. On one Sabbath day, when the Wellfleet vessels were "put to sleep," a vessel hailing from another port was making a great catch of mackerel, but it was later known that the firm failed, to whom the fish were consigned, and the men who broke the Sabbath got no money. It is interesting to know that the banana king who founded the United Fruit Company was a native of Wellfleet.

Truro's Impressive Pageant

On the third week in August, we went down the Cape, dreaming more of the present than of the past, to the pageant at Truro where we were disillusioned. There is no mighty monument to the Pilgrims here, as in Provincetown. And yet this little town staged a pageant so impressively, that the whole span of sky seemed a triumphal arch, and the two thousand visitors seated on the slopes of a natural amphitheater seemed a frieze on a memorial to the Forefathers. This pageant was produced by residents and summer guests, under the direction of L. Arvilla Howe of New York. Here was real Indian life on Cape Cod. Samoset and Squanto were really there, even though some did not feel the presence of the Pilgrims. The Indians took possssion of their wigwam after a summer's absence. They passed the pipe of peace around the circle, in which they were grouped. They danced and they prayed, they sent out scouts as they observed the Pilgrim footprints, their nearness to nature, and their attitude toward life and death was all portrayed in fascinating pantomime. The scene of Governor Carver's funeral was nobly acted by both white men and red men, and revealed the soul of the Indian, as well as that of the Englishman.

Many of the scenes were, of course, transferred to Plymouth, but the situations that most appealed to the audience were those that were perpetuating events that actually happened, on the spot where they were now staged, three centuries ago. The finding of the European ship's kettle, the discovery of the first New England spring of water, and pre-eminently the unearthing of an Indian basket filled with corn. Between the scenes, snow came, night fell, dawn came and the corn grew. These rhythmic interludes were well done. Dressed in white, gray, rose and yellow, barefoot girls, representing symbolically the spirit of this wilderness life, came out of the scrub pines, danced and went off. They conveyed the idea that the Pilgrims felt the unseen. The cast of more than two hundred characters contained many whose ancestors were Mayflower passengers. One heard oftentimes the remark in the audience on the slope, "I have two ancestors there on the stage, but they don't recognize me."

It was a grand experience to watch the elemental movement of the real water of Provincetown Harbor and the real woods of North Truro, as a setting to all this human action, representing the early life of the nation.

The most spiritual touch to this Tercentenary Pageant was given at the very end, when the Pilgrims had marched away to the music of a cornetist, who was a real interpreter.

Gathering on the western slope of North Truro the sun sinking over the Pilgrim Monument across the bay at Provincetown, the Pilgrim Fathers and Pilgrim Mothers led every one in a closing hymn. Some one in the audience had counted the actors, and exclaimed, "Just the number left, after that first winter, there I see the beginning of the United States."

AND FINALLY PROVINCETOWN

At the end of all things is Provincetown, and the momentum of the Tercentenary summer culminated here. The oneness of the ocean has however put Provincetown at the beginning of all things, and as the Pilgrim celebrations drew to a close, we entered into high politics. In the bay were four warships representing America and two of her great allies, and the speaking at the monument was of a high international order. It was certainly worthy of the great associations of Roosevelt and Taft whose words consecrated this spot at the laying of the cornerstone in 1907 and the dedication of the tall shaft in 1910.

"TRENT AFFAIR"

The French naval attaché spoke feelingly of our boys "who lie in Flanders field where poppies grow." The British commander, forgetting the Trent affair in this very harbor, pointing to the battleships in the harbor, visible to all in the crowd on High Pole Hill, also conjured up the great memories of the late war. He said that chance had brought together three ships in Provincetown Harbor that played a part together in the grand fleet of Admiral Beatty. He pictured with evident emotion the British fleet facing the third winter of the war. "I shall never forget the moment I first saw, in those northern mists, the Stars and Stripes shining brightly against dark clouds. As those two American ships, out there today, the Florida and Delaware first stole into view, I knew, for I had before my eyes for the first time, the fact that your great nation had joined us."

Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby voiced the deep interest of the President in Pilgrim ideals. After he had been "whisked away," as he himself described it, onto the destroyer in the harbor, Mrs. Miner, the President-General of the Daughters of the Revolution, emphasized the importance of Secretary Colby's proclamation of equal suffrage, three hundred years after the Pilgrim Mothers landed as "mere chattels." She only wished that the law could be made retroactive, so that the Pilgrim Susannas could speak for themselves.

The scenes around the monument were certainly not all on the program. One of the speakers for the Sulgrave Institute laid down a heavy mass of manuscript on the granite fence which served as a desk. He was quoting from memory from Webster's speech made at Plymouth, a century ago, when the winds of heaven scattered his speech, that he had placed before him, some pages probably going out to sea.

President Finlay of New York University poured water he had brought from the River Jordan into the baptismal font of the Provincetown Congregational church, held by its pastor, Rev. John L. Sewall. To broaden the vision, the President of the Day called upon a band composed of Filipinos to play the national airs of America, Great Britain and France.

Altogether, the Pilgrim celebration at the tip end of Cape Cod was cosmopolitan. Over the entrance to the Congregational church were the flags of all of our allies in the Great War. In the parade was a band of pirates, so well costumed by the Beechcombers Club of artists, that it left little unsaid in its world-wide appeal to human brotherhood. The speaker most cheered was he who declared that though he was not a descendant of the Pilgrims, he had married a descendant and now was an ancestor of descendants.

EVENING PICTURES

Motoring home, up the Cape in the evening, the monument on High Pole Hill loomed up over five hundred feet above the sea level. Its architecture dwarfs everything on the coast. The powerful searchlights of the battleships in the bay were thrown upon it, the greatest campanile in the New World, standing out against a black, misty, starless night. The words of the young ambassador from the Netherlands, spoken a few hours before, as his abundant hair was streaming in the wind, called to us again. "How happy must the sun be, after his journey across the ocean, to see this monument which tells the present-day immigrants that they should sign-up, just as the compact-signers did three hundred years ago."

This was not to be the last picture however. The searchlights no longer played upon the tons of stone, but upon a craft putting out of the harbor. The steamer Mary Chilton was returning to Plymouth with eight hundred residents of that town, all descendants of those who first crossed these same waters. "Going over the top" of High Head in Truro, we slowed down our Cadillac motor, that we might watch the white speck in the bay, in which were Plymoutheans congratulating themselves that their ancestors did not stay in Provincetown, but that they prepared the way for the great Tercentenary celebration in Plymouth on Forefathers' Day, 1920.

Dr. Hitchcock's Long Service

Mr. English Succeeds Him

After thirty years' service as American Board Secretary for the Interior District, Rev. A. N. Hitchcock has resigned. During his administration the receipts of his office have increased from $93,000 to almost $500,000 annually. An analysis of the increases in giving to the American Board in this district is encouraging. During the five years ending 1889 the average yearly gifts per capita for the Board in the district were 67c.; in the five years ending 1899, 64c.; for the five years ending 1909, 84c.; and for the five years ending 1919, $1.20.

REV. A. N. HITCHCOCK

Dr. Hitchcock has untiringly performed almost every kind of missionary service in these thirty years; he has visited local and state conferences over a wide territory, recruited in the colleges and the churches and presented the cause of foreign missions in gatherings of every sort and has carried on through such meetings and by means of the printed page a high-grade and effective propaganda. He has been particularly successful in getting strong churches to adopt missionaries and his message has interested our most thoughtful and substantial people in the cause of the American Board.

He has been resourceful in developing leadership by means of his co-operating committee and he has thus enlisted in the work of the Board for sacrificial service many of our most talented men. His work has always been based on sound judgment formed from a complete knowledge of the facts and he has gone forward through these thirty years with vision, with enthusiasm and with a persistence that really brought things to pass. The constituency of the Interior will be happy to know that he is to remain in the Chicago office to assist his successor with the detailed knowledge of the situation that has come from his long experience.

Rev. W. F. English, Jr., who succeeds him, represents the combination of qualities that promise marked success at the task. He was born in Sivas, Turkey, where his parents were missionaries of the American Board; he is a graduate of Dartmouth College and of Hartford Seminary. He held brief pastorates in Connecticut and Maine and then served the Kirk Street Church, Lowell, Mass. Here he was active in bringing about the merger of his own with another church and then resigned to leave the field clear for a new man.

REV. W. F. ENGLISH, JR.

During the last year Mr. English did a notable work for the Near East Relief in the Massachusetts district where he raised hundreds of thousands of dollars under unfavorable conditions. He is a fine representative of the new generation of young men, with modern training and businesslike bearing, and he also represents the same spirit of devotion and of deep interest in missions that has made the Board's history so great for a hundred years.

The Interior District includes about 2,000 churches and with two men these can be given a more intimate contact with the mission field and a better knowledge of the work of the Board than has heretofore been possible. Mr. English entered upon his new work Sept. 1.

WITH THE CHILDREN

Bobby Unties the Bundle

By Ruth N. Drake

Bobby Madden had a lovely walk to school. He walked half way around the Silver Lake, then through the Enchanted Woods to the Road to Happiness which led to the Coral Lady's School. This sounds like fairy land, doesn't it? It isn't fairy land at all though; we are simply talking about Bobbie Madden's trip to school and we, like Bobby, prefer to call Hickman's lake, the Silver Lake, and Redman Road, the Road to Happiness, and Peter Morrison's wooded lot, the Enchanted Woods. The Coral Lady's School is really the little white Redman schoolhouse taught by a lovely lady named Miss Coral.

On this particular Spring morning, Bobby took the longest way around the Silver Lake and loitered along the Road to Happiness. The Enchanted Woods were so full of birds and squirrels that he just couldn't hurry through them. On the Road to Happiness Bobby met old Dr. Gage in his Ford runabout driving toward the village. He was apparently as pleased with the morning as was Bobby.

"Fine morning, Bobby. Want a lift to the schoolhouse?"

Bobby answered "yes," by climbing up in the seat with the old doctor.

"Isn't Spring bully, Dr. Gage?" demanded Bobby. "It's too bad we have to go to school these days, don't you think?"

"Yes, yes, it is wonderful," said the doctor. "We can't forget that the good Lord loves us when he sends his love in such big bundles as this."

When Bobby looked puzzled at these wise sayings, the old man looked at him reproachfully.

"Why, sonny, don't you know that God sends his love in every little green leaf that is coming out this morning, and in every little blade of grass, and in every little ray of sunshine? Why, those birds you heard in the woods were bursting their throats singing of God's love."

"And the flowers?" eagerly added Bobby.

"Sure, they are the purest symbols of his love."

"And the rain, too? God probably sends his love in the rain too, doesn't he?" Bobby was excited now. He was making a great discovery.

"Yes, yes, that's right, Sonny, you're learning the game finely. Just remember that Spring is for us, for us to enjoy, because God loves us so. Well here we are at the schoolhouse. Good-by, don't get a whipping today. Ha, ha. Good-by, Bobby. Good-by."

Nice warm Spring days are bad days for school, and especially in a country school where every window offers a splendid view of the green outdoors. The Coral Lady—you remember that she is Miss Coral—realized that this was no day for good lessons; all she had to do was to look around the room to find that out. Bobby was gazing out of the window, his chin on his geography, thinking about Spring and God's gifts of Love. A row of girls were weaving grass chains from a supply of marsh grass stuffed in the innermost recess of their desks, while a number of boys were whittling whistles from bark behind a fortification of books.

"How many would like to hear a letter from Miss White?" asked Miss Coral of her thirty restless pupils.

Grass chains were dropped, knives were snapped closed and hands went up all over the room. Bobby let his geography fall with a slam as he shouted, "I do."

Miss White was a former teacher of Redman School, and, although Miss Coral was loved by every one of her thirty pupils, Miss White still held a big place in the hearts of her old school children.

"Dear Miss Coral," ran the letter that Miss Coral read to the girls and boys of Redman School. "These Spring days make me long to be in Redman again, out in the open country, away from the noise and smoke and heat of the city. But I love my little pupils from the tenements. I have forty of the dearest children—all foreign. How my heart aches for them when I think that most of them have never seen green fields nor any of the beauties of Spring. Spring just means warmer weather for them. If I had fifty dollars to spend the way I pleased I'd give them all a day's outing to Redman."

"Doesn't God love them, too?" broke in Bobby before the letter was half finished. "Dr. Gage said God sends his love to us in the trees and the flowers. Why doesn't he send some love to Miss White's children?"

"God does love them," Miss Coral answered. "He loves all children, white or black, yellow or brown, and he sent the trees and flowers to make them happy, too. But men have destroyed those trees and flowers to make great cities, and these children's fathers and mothers have to work for such low wages that they have to live in the cheapest dwellings in the dark, dirty places in the city. If Miss White only had her fifty dollars, these little children of the slums could find their gifts of love right here in Redman."

Bobby walked home that night slower than he had in the morning. He took the longest way around the lake and all the way his little brain was working fast. But the next morning he ran all the way to school, and when he found that Miss Coral had not yet arrived he walked toward the village to meet her. When he did see her coming toward him he ran to meet her and stammered out his PLAN all at once. Bobby's plan was this: The Redman School was to raise $50 to bring Miss White's children out to get their share of God's love.

And do you know, those children did raise fifty dollars in just a little while. All of them saved their nickels and dimes, and they gave an Ice Cream Social in the school yard at which they announced the Cause, and then the business men of Redman got interested. How their

Dear Comrades:

I am just going to give one more week for the right answer to my question, asked July 29: When is the best time to kill a mosquito? I suppose New Englanders are the real dyed-in-the-wool "guessers." Surely some of our Comrades living in that part of our country should make a venture.

It is hardly fair to shut down (or up) on a subject when a good letter still remains unpublished. I have reference to the subject of odd names. Comrade Clarice Luther, of Oxford, Mass., has certainly shown that she is "very much interested in collecting uncommon names."

"To begin with, quite a mixture can be obtained from Wood, Stone, Gravel, Glass, Sands and Steele. Then probably you have heard of Melvin Trotter, the great evangelistic worker. With his name go Walker and Pace. Other combinations like Day and Knight, Summer and Winter, Jolly, Goode, Gay and Joy; Plain, Wood, Hill and Moore; Byrd, Bullfinch and Crane; Foote, Arms and Longnecker are strange.

"Of course there are a number that cannot be found anywhere (?) such as: Sandmann, Spooner, Fitts, Darling, Copp, Flagg, Gallup, (although Gallup ought to be classed with Trotter, etc.) Tuck, Partridge, Pike, Shortsleeves, Quackenboss, Sauerback, Butterfield, Drinkwater, Drinkwine, *Under*wood and *Over*ton, Undergraves, Zips, Penney and Nichols, Lovejoy and Lovett. Some people living in a white house near us are Mr. and Mrs. Snow.

"I knew of a partnership of two men, Hertz and Offen, who were dentists.

"Then there is also the expression which the would-be poet said when he saw his house burning, 'Dickens! Howett Burns.'

"There are also greater men whose names are uncommon. Longfellow is one of these. Neal Dow should have an 'n' added to his last name. He was certainly religious enough."

Another contribution has come in for the Lunch Fund. This one is from a Comrade in Framingham, Mass. I am almost sure we shall get over $25.

Her letter says something that I rather thought I would say when I got my courage up. It is much better for her to say it first. "I have been interested in the Comrades' Corner every week but have not had time to declare myself as one of them. I have tried to enter some of the contests but until now haven't been determined enough to find time for it."

(Those italics are some I asked the printer to indicate). That is the trouble with most of us, good Comrades. There are three steps to every worth-while thing. They are:

WORK HARD
WISH HARD

Many of us don't get beyond the first stair, and there we sit. Let's all join hands and go up another stair this fall, in school work, in home life, in Sunday school, and everywhere. And while we are on the move, let's go up the other step, too.

But I have moved a long way from this letter. "After this may I be called a Comrade? If you have no others from Framingham, I guess I will have to do it justice by sending some postcards of the place later on." I judge she means that she will send "later on some post-cards of the place." Otherwise I may have to wait a very long time. Yes, we gladly welcome Comrade Marjorie Brown.

And by the way I should very much enjoy getting picture post-cards of interesting places in your towns, Comrades, or where you have been this summer. Perhaps you will add a few words of your own about the places. Send them along.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Christian Internationalism: In our relation to Latin America

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 19-25

BY REV. ENOCH F. BELL

Scripture Lesson. John 15:12-15.

Christian Internationalism calls for a new grip for the fraternity of nations. Let the index finger stand for mutual understanding; the middle finger for mutual sympathy; the third and fourth fingers for expectancy and co-operation; and the thumb—that which gives character to the grip—for the heart of the Gospel.

Give the Latin American this right hand of fellowship. Don't think of them as enemies but as prospective friends. Mexico, to be sure, still fears intervention for purposes of exploitation; Columbia too cannot forget the Panama "steal"; the A. B. C.'s (Argentina, Brazil and Chile) still resist in their dignity and strength the presumptions of our Monroe Doctrine. The eighty millions generally do not take kindly to our Yankeeisms. Yet they are potential friends, not enemies. They deserve the fraternity grip. Alike in republican organization and national aspiration, if not in racial characteristics, we are "Americans" all.

1. Let us then, on our part, study to know the Latin American thoroughly—his literature, his life, his heart.

2. Let us sympathize with the republics to the south in their effort to outgrow their heritage of slavery to ignorance, superstition and moral inertia.

3. Let us look for large things from those peoples who combine the genius of the Incas with the idealism of the Latin.

4. Let us co-operate in every way possible. We are interdependent. They need more than our machinery and our capital; we need more than access to their vast natural resources. We need their warmth of soul; and they, the moral invigoration of the Pilgrim's faith. So while we give them our trade, may we also send our truth. Offer special scholarships to their sons and daughters. Send them our best teachers and lecturers—men and women whose lives demonstrate righteousness and love.

5. Above all strengthen our evangelical missionary agents and agencies of Latin America. Lord Bryce's comment is worthy of our careful thought. It follows a close study of the mind and life of Latin America. He says that her "grave misfortune is an absence of a religious foundation for thought and conduct."

The masses, though nominally Christian, are still steeped in appalling religious ignorance, superstition and mediæval formalism. The Church has a tremendous task in "spiritualization." And as for the thinking classes, they are breaking away from the Church so rapidly as to warrant extraordinary effort along the simple Pilgrim lines which have never failed to lead men of thought into such a "rational faith" in God as to give tremendous ethical force to everyday living. Latin America needs the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ as she needs nothing else.

STEPPING UPWARD IN HUMILITY

Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time; casting all your care upon him, because he careth for you.—1 Pet. 5:6.

Jesus did not come to show us how little we are, and to mock us by the contrast of our weakness with his power. He humbles us, but it is only because humility is a condition of greatness. God shows us how weak we are, but it is only that his strength may bring us to the loftier summits.—W. L. Watkinson.

Humility graces all grace and all gifts; it glorifies God, and teaches others so to do. It is conservatrix virtutum, "the preserver of graces." Sometimes it seems to wrong them by hiding them; but indeed, it is their safety. Hezekiah by a vain showing of his jewels and treasures, forfeited them all.—Robert Leighton.

Though lowly here our lot may be,
  High work have we to do—
In faith and trust to follow him
  Whose lot was lowly too.

Thus may we make the lowliest lot
  With rays of glory bright;
Thus may we turn a crown of thorns
  Into a crown of light.
—William Gaskell.

Pride is the mother of soul-ruin; self-confidence is next door to self-destruction. . . . Boast not, though thou be never so strong. . . . Leave thy boasting until the battle is done. Do not begin to glory till thou hast trodden all thine enemies beneath thy feet. —C. S. Spurgeon.

Do not be unnaturally humble. The thought of your own mind perchance is the thought of God. To refuse to follow that may be to disown God. . . . Be sure that often when you say, "It is only my own poor thought, and I am alone," the real connecting thought is this, "Alone, but the Father is with me," therefore I can live by that lonely conviction.—F. W. Robertson.

The very safety of eminent gifts and preeminent graces lies in their association with deep humility. Great men need to be good men.—Thomas Guthrie.

O Lord, give us more charity, more self-denial, more likeness to thee. Teach us to sacrifice our comforts to others, and our likings for the sake of doing good. Make us kindly in thought, gentle in word, generous in deed. Teach us that it is better to give than to receive; better to forget ourselves than to put ourselves forward; better to minister than to be ministered unto. And unto thee, the God of Love, be glory and praise forever. Amen.—Henry Alford.

Tales that Stir the Blood

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 26-Oct. 3

BY MABEL E. EMERSON

Topic: Inspiring Stories from the Foreign Mission Field. Ps. 66:1-8; Acts 14:23-28.

Modern Apostles

We do not need to go back to the pioneers and the accounts of their work to get inspiration. The reports that come from our mission fields today read like new chapters in the Acts, as indeed they are. In 1900, Paotingfu in North China was practically destroyed by the Boxers. Three of our American Board missionaries, Horace Pitkin, Mary Morrill and Annie Gould, and many Chinese Christians were killed. The work seemed wiped out and many people at home thought that missionary effort in China was useless. But new missionaries consecrated their lives to the cause, and today in Paotingfu there are more than 1,500 church members, twice the number of five years ago. The laying down of those missionary lives in 1900 is bringing results a hundredfold.

Life Out of Death

Other results of the sacrifice in 1900 are seen. The day that the missionaries were beheaded troops surrounded the mission compound. Among the soldiers who guarded the gate was a young Chinese. When Mary Morrill came to the gate to plead for the safety of the Chinese women and children in the compound, he was struck by what she said: "Kill me if you must, but spare the others." Young Feng could not forget those words. Years later he became a Christian and he traces his conversion to the influence of Mary Morrill upon his life. Today he is a general in the Northern Army of China, an "out and out" Christian, whose influence has resulted in the winning to Christ of hundreds of officers and men in his army.

"Forgive Your Enemies"

From Turkey the war years have brought us wonderful stories of the heroism of our missionaries. We expected all that. But just recently there has come an inspiring illustration of the Christlike spirit of forgiveness on the part of Armenians. At Smyrna there has recently been held a conference of the young men and young women students. It was a kind of Northfield Conference in Turkey. In the closing sessions many of the young people expressed the desire to go out to work among the Turks and win them to Christ. That from young Christians who have branded on their minds the memory of the terrible deportations of 1915, the slaughter of thousands upon thousands of their people, the starvation and degradation of thousands more! Can we match it?

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Class Conference Hour

Review for Sept. 26.

The general theme which we shall consider this week is the use of the Bible in the culture of our religious life. The letters that have come to our table during the past six months have been concerned very largely with this vital matter. There never was greater interest in the character of the Bible and its right use than there is now, in spite of some apparent signs that interest in the Bible is declining.

A college student writes:

> I never have seen until recently that the men and women about whom I have read so many times since I was first sent to Sunday school were real men and that they did real work like that which we do now.

This is one of the great discoveries that we need to make if the Bible is to be of any actual value in our daily life. Keep this fact to the front of your thinking as you read the Bible and seek to make it the rule of your life. These men and women are not characters in fiction. They lived and worked, loved and died as we do now. They lived in other times and their language and customs were different. They never rode in a railway train or received a telegram or turned on an electric light by pressing a button. But they faced the same deep problems of the spirit that engage us now. Their mothers loved their children and lived for their welfare as women do now. It was just as hard to be an honest man when Abraham traded in Palestine as it is difficult to be honest in Boston or Chicago. When we appreciate this we get a new sense of the value of the Bible which grows out of its reality. This is one of the reasons why we ought to use our imagination more in Bible study. Picture the scenes; make the men live; make the problems which they struggled with concrete and like our own.

We were talking about the difficulties involved in getting a vital hold on the Bible and a young man said that he found it impossible to become interested in a lot of the Old Testament and even in the letters of Paul. He thought that he derived more real help from reading what some of the best writers said about the Bible in explanation of it than what the Bible said itself. If we were perfectly honest with ourselves, I wonder how many of us would be forced to admit that he spoke our mind on the matter? And if this is so, is there any need of changing this? Do we need to read the Bible itself, if the meaning of it may be had more quickly from explanations of it? As a matter of practical experience we believe that the way to get hold of the Bible is to read it in large quantities. Do not stop to clear up all the points or to understand all the references. I owe a great deal to a teacher who told me to read Shakespeare in quantities and not to stumble over obsolete words or little obscurities. He said that the way in which to come to love Shakespeare was to read quantities of Shakespeare. This is the way in which to gain a love for Jeremiah or the Psalms or the letters of Paul. Read and read and read! The division of the Bible into chapters and verses, and the habit of giving a verse or two as the subject for daily readings may involve the loss of the sense of unity and mass in the Bible which is absolutely vital to the knowledge of it.

Here is an inquiry that is so pertinent that we take it up in the class:

> I do not see how we can reasonably defend the statement that the Bible is our highest rule of faith and life. Jesus never saw a factory; he had no experience with the government of a great city; he came from a village and could not have understood the complex world today. How can his ethical insight give us the principles by which we are to control our civilization?

That is a fair question. Is the ethics of Jesus the expression of a provincial mind in a simple age, whose fundamental principles have been either outgrown or are not adequate to the world where we must live and work?

Of course Jesus never had any practical experience with the factory system. He never experienced the problems that arise in the government of a great city like New York or of a vast nation like the United States. But in spite of this the ethics of Jesus is comprehensive and practical enough so that it still can serve the modern world. The meaning of fidelity and the value of truthfulness is the same whether goods are being made in the front room of a house under the apprentice system or in one of the great mills in Gary. It is the externals that have changed so greatly; the internals have remained constant. So the Sermon on the Mount is one of those timeless standards that constantly surprise us by the way in which they prove their perfect adaptation to the needs of a changing world. If there is failure to realize the ethics of Jesus in the modern world it does not lie in the standards themselves but in the failure of those who follow Jesus to make the adjustment between the principles that he set forth and the circumstances under which they are to be realized now.

Summing up the three points of the conference: the Bible characters must be made real by the use of the imagination; the way to know the Bible better is to read it in larger and larger quantities; the standards of Jesus are valid even for our enlarging and changing world.

funds increased! And on the last day of May forty happy children arrived on an early morning train from the city, and thirty equally as happy children met them at the station and took them down the Road to Happiness to the Enchanted Woods beside the Silver Lake where an all-day picnic was held.

Miss White's pupils must have thought Peter Morrison's wooded lot was truly an Enchanted Forest, for where before had they seen so many wild flowers and such queer little wild animals? The sweet, damp, cool smell of the woods was like a fragrant perfume after the close smoky smells of the city streets. Miss White's pupils had to pinch themselves to see if they were awake when they stepped into Judge Greenwood's big white motorboat for a ride on the Silver Lake.

Late that afternoon, old Dr. Gage drove up to the station to meet the five-forty city-bound train, to see the "circus" as he named it.

"My, how those children have enjoyed this day. They are the same dark-eyed lads and lassies that came this morning, but I declare, they look different! Their eyes sparkle with something—I don't know what—"

Bobby Madden was tugging at the Doctor's sleeve.

"With some of the love God sent them, isn't it, Dr. Gage? I guess we untied some of those big bundles of love and let them have a peek, didn't we?"

Urge Recruiting for Christian Ministry

The following resolution was recently adopted by the Worcester Central Association of Congregational Churches:

Whereas reports from our churches indicate an alarming shortage of ministers, and an equally inadequate number of candidates for the ministry; and whereas, in the face of the present forward plans, so inspiring in their outlook, and so hopefully begun, pastoral leadership is essential to success; therefore be it resolved by this Association that the pastors of our churches be requested to give this grave situation their earnest attention, to the end that there may be brought to the membership of the churches, to the Sunday schools, young people's societies, and to the homes of our people, a clear understanding of these urgent needs, and that every possible effort may be made to stimulate the recruiting of the profession; and be it further resolved that a copy of these resolutions be sent to The Congregationalist for publication, with the recommendation that similar action on the part of the several associations and conferences of the Congregational churches would be useful in building up the favorable public opinion which is needed to accomplish results.

These resolutions were presented by Dr. W. B. Aspinwall, Principal of the State Normal School in Worcester, who has been for the past year "Advisor to the Board of Pastoral Supply." The resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Association.

OHIO

New Minister for Plymouth, Columbus

Sunday, Aug. 29, is a date which marks a milestone in the forward movement of Plymouth, Columbus. On that day, Rev. E. A. Ralph, after a ten-year pastorate in Green Bay, Wis., came to enter upon work as pastor of Plymouth. A large representation of the church families was present to greet the new pastor. In the audience were a few visitors from other churches. Rev. Mr. Neal who is to be headmaster of the newly organized School of Religion at the University near by, gave a brief and inspiring address at the business meeting immediately following the brief service of song by the congregation and sermon by the pastor. Dr. Rothrock, state superintendent, was present anl spoke of the part the State Conference would have in the program of Plymouth as the university church for the Congregationalists of the state. This program was the subject of the forty-five-minute discussion which followed.

By this program Mr. Ralph becomes student pastor for the Congregationalists of Ohio represented by the young men and women who come to the university to secure their education. His salary will be $3,500 per year, of which the State Conference will provide $1,000. Plymouth pledges her pastor for a sufficient amount of his time the use of her plant and the activities of her membership in behalf of these young men and women who come from Congregational homes over the state and nation. The church has a fine equipment brought to completion under the leadership of the former pastor, Rev. W. A. Warren, now of Painesville, O.

Mr. Ralph impresses his hearers as a minister keenly alert to present demands of the church and as energetic to meet the requirements made of him as leader. This new step forward insures fresh service from Plymouth during another decade of useful Christian pilgrimage.

Three State Leaders Pass Away

Within a few weeks death has removed three prominent leaders of Congregationalism in the State of Washington—Prof. W. D. Lyman and Rev. Elvira C. Cobleigh of Walla Walla and Thomas H. Brewer of Spokane. Professor Lyman, teacher of history at Whitman College since 1889, had become professor emeritus only a week before his death. He was widely known as lecturer, author and specialist on waterway transportation problems. "The Columbia River, Its History, Its Myths, Its Scenery, Its Commerce," was his best-known book. He was widely sought as a speaker and a recognized authority on the Pacific Northwest. He was in his sixty-eighth year.

Mrs. Cobleigh was a pioneer pastor and missionary and one of two or three women so far ordained in the state. During the 30 years of her active ministry she had organized six churches, a number of Sunday schools, had led in the building of four church structures, and had aided each year in evangelistic services. As financial agent of Whitman College she visited New England and raised funds for its first girls' dormitory. For eight years she served as matron of the ladies' hall. She retired from active service four years ago at the age of 72. Mrs. Cobleigh was graduated from Mt. Holyoke College in the class of 1870.

Mr. Brewer lived at Spokane and was a leading member of Westminster Church. He was a trustee of the Washington Conference and had served as moderator. His loss will be keenly felt in our leadership in the state.

BARTLETT, W. A., who resigned last spring from the pastorate of Pine St. Church, Lewiston, Me., has accepted the executive secretaryship of the Massachusetts Committee for Near East Relief. He succeeds Rev. W. F. English, Jr., who has become Interior District Secretary of the American Board.

HAGEMAN, J. C., Detroit, Mich., who recently accepted a call to Sylvania, O., has reconsidered the call and has decided to decline it.

HOLDER, W. S., pastor of Harlem, New York, N. Y., has been granted a three months' leave of absence by his church to enable him to visit his childhood home in Georgetown, British Guiana, South America. He has not visited Georgetown for twenty years and is taking great pleasure in renewing old friendships and revisiting old scenes. Before Mr. Holder sailed in July his church increased his salary $300 and gave him a purse containing $100.

WOODWELL, G. M., and MRS. WOODWELL, South Bristol, Me., were given a farewell reception by the church Aug. 26. At the reception, the last mortgage on the parsonage property was burned and a generous purse of money was presented to Mr. and Mrs. Woodwell. Mr. Woodwell has accepted a call to Lyme, N. H.

This company produces Mica by quarry methods and works it into sheets and finely ground products. It owns its own water power, factories and quarries.

Electricity has made Mica a necessity. It is the only insulation that will resist acid, fire, etc. Other uses are in roofing paper, lubricants, wall-paper and automobile tires.

Steady customers include Fisk Rubber, Woolworth, American Toy, Warren Soap, U. S. Rubber, Geo. Borgfeldt.

Earnings from this established business should run at least 10% for the next year.

Speculative possibilities are large in addition to 10% earnings because the sheet Mica found in the quarries is worth from 50 cents to $25 per pound.

REV. GEORGE E. GILBERT

Rev. George E. Gilbert, aged nearly 81 years, died July 17 at his home in Fond du Lac, Wis. He was ordained in 1893 and held pastorates in Wyoming, Fox Lake, Rosendale and Eldorado. Since leaving the pastorate in 1911 he did much faithful service in various lines. He was always optimistic, earnest and steadfastly faithful.

MRS. SPENCER C. HASKIN

Mrs. Spencer C. Haskin, wife of the pastor of East Congregational Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., died suddenly of apoplexy Aug. 19 at Whitefish Lake, where the family had gone for a brief summer outing.

Mr. Haskin came from St. Louis, Mo., to East Church in 1916, when not only the church organization but the church property was sadly run down. Assisted by Mrs. Haskin, who was a tireless worker in all church activities, he soon had the congregation on its feet. Mrs. Haskin had a prominent place in the church and missionary work of the city.

Mrs. Haskin was 55 years of age and was born in Illinois. She was a graduate of Gates College, Nebraska, and was married 28 years ago.

Many an unpleasant thing needs to be done in a pleasant way. Teachers, and parents, and people in business life who are responsible for the work of others must from time to time speak in criticism or point out how an improvement can be made in the way of doing things. Such a word of criticism, or correction, or of suggested improvement can have the effect of being either a shove down or a lift up. It can come to the one addressed as a slap in the face, or as a hearty grip of the hand. The word can be spoken with a disarming smile of reassurance, or a hard and discouraging look of condemnation. And the heartening, lifting, smiling word of admonition or suggestion brings a hundred per cent. better response than the other sort; it gets the very results that we are after, while the word that antagonizes is liable to defeat the whole thing. Love is a paying proposition; unlove is a dead loss.—The Sunday School Times.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

Dr. Reed and the Pilgrim Fund

The Executive Committee of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund Commission were most fortunate when, in the emergency created by the withdrawal of Dr. H. F. Swartz to become the Secretary of the Congregational World Movement, it succeeded in persuading Dr. Lewis T. Reed, of Brooklyn, to accept the office of Executive Secretary, his church reluctantly acquiescing and only on the understanding that at the expiration of six months he should return to the pastorate unless it were his clear conviction that he should remain in the work of the Fund.

Rev. Lewis T. Reed, D. D.

It was announced early in the summer that the extraordinary devotion and urgency of his people had induced Dr. Reed to resume his labors with them this fall. At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the Commission he presented, accordingly, his resignation expressing his great joy in the service he had been permitted to render in the office, his deep conviction of the wonderful field open to the Annuity Fund and its opportunity to serve the ministry in a fashion and degree unique in Congregational history.

He further stated that while the detailed revision of the subscription list, which had been going forward for months, was not quite completed, the report under date of June 25 showed a total of $6,453,744, from approximately 100,000 subscribers, with additional new subscriptions being added week by week. This is exclusive of subscriptions directly to the Annuity Fund in earlier years of $171,515. The total payments July 31 were $2,267,353. On June 1 the Corporation for the National Council made a first payment of income to the Annuity Fund of $26,000, a further and much larger payment being anticipated Dec. 1. The figures indicate the beginning of the results from the noble gifts of the churches and the clear indication of the immense benefits to be derived therefrom by the ministry in years to come.

The debt to Dr. Reed's administration is more than can be fully realized by any but those intimately associated with the work. Following the remarkable success of the campaign in the fall of 1919 the subscriptions flowed into the office in a volume far beyond the capacity of the working force and the quarters then occupied. The city was diligently canvassed for weeks in hope of securing proper offices but nothing adequate, within the range of expenditure deemed to be reasonable for the work, could be found until by the gracious service of Mr. B. H. Fancher, the Treasurer, and also Treasurer of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., it was possible to lease from the latter organization a floor of a building which had been used in war service. A portion was subsequently sublet, the remainder giving the much-needed facilities for the orderly prosecution of the collecting of the Fund and the large correspondence with the ministers entering the Annuity Fund while a part was taken by the Board of Ministerial Relief which acts in conjunction with the other boards.

During this transition period, with its inevitable confusion and the necessity of organization, Dr. Reed, with consummate tact and fine administrative ability, laid hold of the intricate problems involved and brought about, with the assistance of the Financial Secretary, Mr. Philip H. Senior, a departmental organization of the force and the effective working out of the accumulated correspondence, while the processes of collection proceeded vigorously.

In accepting the resignation of Dr. Reed, the Executive Committee adopted the following minute:

> In accepting the resignation of the Executive Secretary, Rev. Lewis T. Reed, D. D., the Executive Committee of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund Commission desires to express to him their appreciation of his exceedingly important and efficient service.
> Assuming charge of the office when the drive for the Pilgrim Memorial Fund was in its concluding period, and the subscriptions were coming daily in overwhelming volume, while the office force was unorganized and their quarters far outgrown and utterly inadequate, he, with the capable co-operation of the Financial Secretary has brought the administration of the Fund through a critical period until today the force is competent for its task, well organized, adequately housed, and efficiently mastering the situation in handling more than 100,000 subscriptions, aggregating nearly $6,500,000.
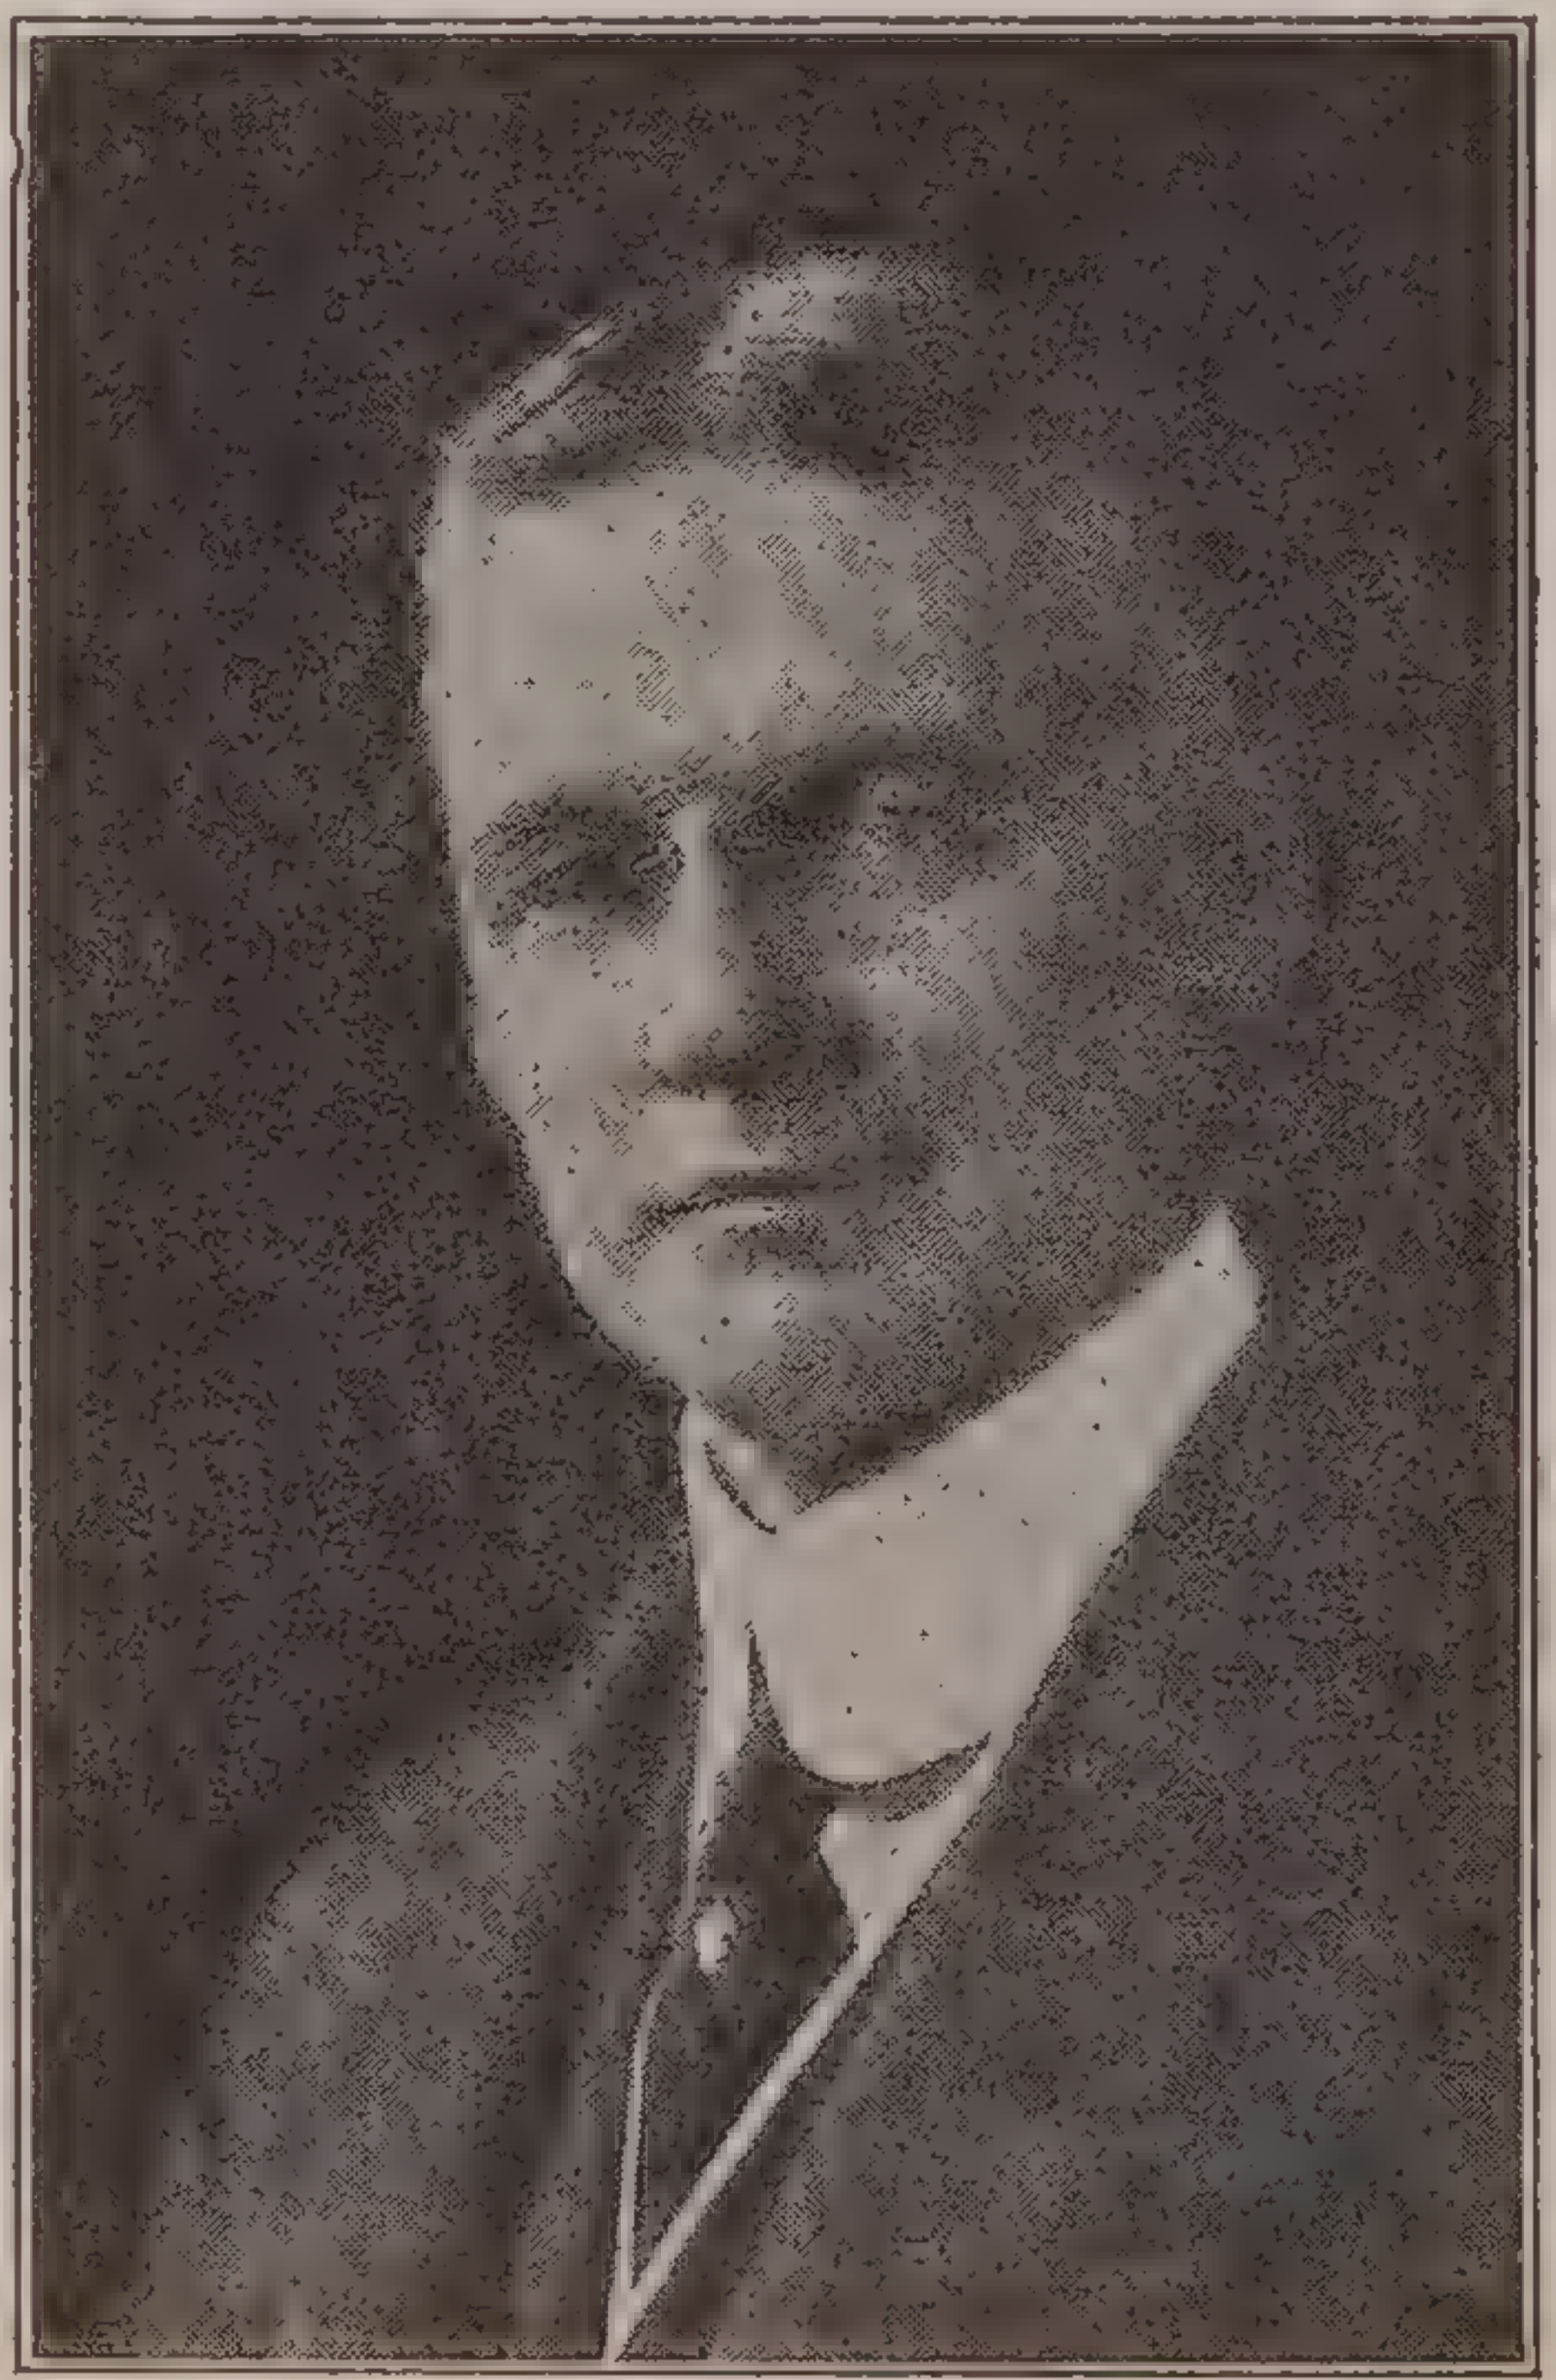
> His courage and enthusiasm for the cause; his tact, devotion and executive force are beyond all praise, and he leaves the work to return to his beloved people in Flatbush with the warm affection and high regard of all with whom he has labored.

Dr. Mills to Become Secretary

Dr. Charles S. Mills has been elected Executive Secretary of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund and Secretary of the Annuity Fund, succeeding Dr. Lewis T. Reed. The two offices having been held by the same man for the last two or three years.



Rev. Charles S. Mills, D. D.

In the past fifteen years Dr. Mills has been repeatedly under pressure to accept one or another of the administrative positions in the denomination and heretofore he has declined to consider anything because he has believed that for him the pastorate was the supreme field of activity, but this latest appeal opens so great an opportunity of service and involves such a deep sense of personal obligation and responsibility because of his part as chairman of the Commission that has directed the gathering of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, and his leadership in working out the plan for the distribution of its income, that those most intimately connected with it believe the work to be done is far greater than that of any pastorate. Although Dr. Mills has twice declined to consider the secretaryship in the earlier stages of the work, believing that he could do more for it as a pastor, he has come to agree with the judgment that this strategic moment, with the Fund assured, as its sponsors are about to put their carefully wrought plan into operation, constitutes a call from which he cannot turn away.

The plans and policies put into action in the next two or three years are bound to affect profoundly the standards of the churches and the welfare of the ministry for generations to come. It is hoped also not only to protect the minister in his later years, but to influence powerfully the recruiting of the ministry and, through schools and colleges, reach many promising young men.

Dr. Mills expects to begin work at the office of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund in New York about the first of October.

It Will Pay You to Read

The Way of the Farmer in Japan, by Robertson Scott, in Asia, for October.

A lively and interesting study of agriculture in Japan where laborious land culture is the rule and every available inch of soil is cultivated. The first of a series of beautifully illustrated articles which will be well worth following.

Wanted: An American Foreign Policy, by Herbert Adams Gibbons (Century, August). Mr. Gibbons discusses the difficulties of the peacemaking at Paris and points out why America was in an impossible position throughout the negotiations; and insists upon the speedy awakening of American public opinion in favor of a peace which is worth making and preserving.

Our Porto Rico, by Harry A. Franck (Century, August). A vivid and careful picture of our chief island and its people, one of the crowded lands of the world which is and is not American in the sense that we are.

One of the heroes who fell in France had on his person an old English manuscript with the following:

Let me tell you how I made His acquaintance:

I had heard much of Him, but took no heed.

He sent daily gifts and presents, but I never thanked Him.

He often seemed to want my friendship, but I remained cold.

I was homeless and wretched and starving, and in peril every hour, and He offered me shelter and comfort and food and safety. But I was ungrateful still.

At last He crossed my path, and with tears in His eyes He besought me, saying, "Come, and abide with me."

Let me tell you how He treats me now:

He supplies all my needs.
He gives me more than I dare ask.
He anticipates my every need.
He begs me to ask for more.
He never reminds of my past ingratitude.
He never rebukes me for my past follies.

Let me tell you further what I think of Him:

He is as good as He is great.

His love is as ardent as it is true.

He is as lavish of His promises as He is faithful in keeping them.

He is as jealous of my love as He is deserving of it.

I am in all things His debtor, but He bids me call Him Friend.

"A friend who sticketh closer than a brother."

The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Paper

Arthur E. Holt, who writes An English Radical on Soviet Russia, is the Social Service Secretary of the Congregational Churches and therefore in close touch with all the great social problems of the day.

Rodney W. Roundy, one of the secretaries of the Home Mission Council, formerly a secretary of the American Missionary Association, is especially qualified to deal with the question of The New Negro in the New South.

Chester C. McCown, Ph.D., who contributes A Rediscovery of the Mayflower, is professor of New Testament Literature in Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, Cal. Professor McCown has been appointed Thayer Fellow in the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem for 1920—1921 and is in England on his way to Palestine.

George Perry Morris, who reports on affairs At the National Capital, was at one time a member of The Congregationalist staff and is now in journalistic work in Washington.

Rev. E. Victor Bigelow is pastor of the South Church, Andover, Mass.

Next Week

The Church Conferences in Switzerland. A graphic and comprehensive picture of several remarkable international gatherings. By Our Special Correspondent.

To Be Issued in Book Form

This week Dr. Bridgman resumes his series of articles on New England in the Life of the World and devotes himself to a setting forth of the various lines of approach on the part of New Englanders to Kansas, from the time they began going thither in considerable numbers during the turbulent years just before the Civil War. The next article in this series will take up the relation of New England to the Dakotas. All the articles that have thus far appeared in the series will appear in somewhat expanded form, together with articles still to be published relating to foreign lands, in a volume to be entitled, "New England in the Life of the World," and to bear the imprint of the Pilgrim Press. The book will be of timely interest and value owing to current and pending celebrations of the Pilgrim Tercentenary.

In the Circulation Department—

We wish to take this opportunity to express our appreciation of your patience in the forced delay of The Congregationalist and Advance during the past two weeks.

Our printers are now making up for lost time and we trust that this issue may reach you on schedule.

Such expressions as the following are gratifying to receive, and help tremendously in smoothing the rough places: "Please accept my sympathy in these days of your trial. If my paper is several weeks late it will not disturb me. With best wishes, I remain." Alabama subscriber.

"Thank you for your message of explanation about the printers' strike. The Sept. 9 number of The Congregationalist and Advance reached me yesterday. It has never been delayed more than twice, I think, and only for a day or two. As I generally read almost every word and have not quite finished the Sept. 2 number (although I have read much in the last number) I am thankful whenever I receive the precious news, for there is much in every number worth reading many times." New Jersey subscriber.

We cannot resist the temptation to pass on to you the following letter which has just come to us from a Wisconsin Pastor—

> "Please send a sample copy of The Congregationalist and Advance to each of the following persons, all of whom are members of our Church here, and who might be interested in subscribing for the paper: (list of names)—I find The Congregationalist so much of a help to me that I would be very glad to see the paper coming regularly to these other homes. All our people need 'the courageous view of today and the hopeful view of tomorrow'—a kind of week-by-week mountain-top view to which each issue of our church paper brings the members of its family."

Who can estimate the tremendous results for increased intelligence and spiritual growth in our Churches if all our Congregational ministers from the Atlantic to the Pacific would follow the example of this man? The opportunity is yours. We shall appreciate your co-operation.

The Congregationalist and Advance.

The Congregationalist and Advance

A World Transformed

WE sometimes dream that there might come a miracle which would transform the world. Good might be suddenly triumphant. Evil would be seen for what it is, the tempter and betrayer and destroyer of man, the rust on the shield of beauty, the corruption that eats at the heart of our social order. The reign of good will would be acknowledged everywhere and the home of man would be set in order for the presence and the power of God.

We have that dream in our vigorous hours and never more, perhaps, than when, with vigor renewed from rest, we turn to the work of our day or year. It is a waking dream, a dream of activity and accomplishment, before all a dream of God's asserting his authority over the hearts and lives of men. Why not? The author of the Apocalypse dreamed it when he saw the heavenly city into which there shall in no wise enter anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie. Suppose we should wake some fine September morning to find a world of which that is true! Suppose we should find it already verified and triumphant in our own hearts!

Augustine dreamed that dream as he saw Rome trampled under the heels of the barbarian. It has been the consolation and the inviting beacon of good men in generation after generation. And when they did not look for it in the future they sought to find it in some period or state of society in the past. Man will never give up the hope of a world made right. And when he comes to think what that must mean, he knows in his secret heart that this must mean a world made righteous. Suppose it could be true of our national life. Suppose all who took part in the government of nation, state and town were wise and generous and provident and self-devoted—what a joy and privilege it would be to have some part in their election.

Pastors and people, taking up again their plans for church work in the active months ahead of us, must face the discouragement not, indeed, of their failures, but growing out of the memory of only partial success. We have not hitherto accomplished the miracle of a world transformed in righteousness. We shall not attain it this year either. God will not bring it in upon us suddenly. But God will help us bring it in, first in our own lives and then, at last, after the generations have had their chance and schooling, for all the world. This vision of a world transformed is our inheritance. We must do what we can, and thank God for such success as we can see. For many of our successes in obedience are out of sight.

But the one success of which we have absolute assurance is that of the coming of the City of God in our own hearts. God will always come to those who seek for him. And the purpose of his coming is not our ease, or even, in any selfish sense, our righteousness. We are redeemed and transformed that we may build with God upon his city of a human brotherhood where his good will shall be reflected perfectly in the good will of man to man. Not swiftly, not perhaps with observation, but certainly, we shall see the City of God made the abiding place of men.

EDITORIAL

The Church Vote

To whom will the church vote go, to Mr. Harding or to Mr. Cox? Presumably either would be glad to get it. In numbers it represents one in three or four of the voters. In quality it ranks high. Whether or not it is desirable to line up this vote exclusively for any one candidate may be an open question.

Occasionally in a local election, but far more rarely in a state or national election, issues shape themselves so that church members are pretty unanimous in their support of a certain candidate or party. In this campaign only the most extreme partisan or the unreflecting voter is disposed to say that from the moral point of view the case is as yet entirely closed in favor of either candidate. Many sincere churchmen and churchwomen are still perplexed as to their duty next November. They feel that at this time in the world's history a vote in this greatest nation on the earth should count for the best welfare of the nation and the progress of mankind. They want to see their duty so clearly that they can go to the polls with considerable enthusiasm and in case their man wins, can throw up their hats with the hurrahing crowds on the morning of the third of November.

We want to see churchmen look at their civic and political duties from this standpoint and think issues out to such a conclusion that they will be able to vote conscientiously and hopefully, so that their vote joined with that of other Christian people throughout the land shall have a decided influence upon the man and the party entrusted with the destiny of this nation for four years to come.

It is not our business to decide for any individual member of the church what is his or her specific duty in a matter of such grave importance, but we think that every one of them should consider seriously what from the moral and Christian point of view is desirable.

> We ought to have in and through our national government:
> A competent and economical administration of our domestic affairs.
> Deliverance from anything that savors of autocracy, narrow partisanship, personal pique or domination by a group of selfish and sordid business interests.
> The maintenance and enforcement of national prohibition.
> The security of the individual in normal times in the traditional American rights of freedom of speech and of public assemblage.
> The immediate association of our nation with other nations of the world in earnest, continuous, definite, progressive efforts to check as far as possible existing wars, to forefend causes of warfare and to bring about as speedily as possible such international organization as shall tend to make peace universal and enduring.

We think that all of these desirable ends should be carefully considered by every Christian voter. Whether one of them predominates above all the others, or if it does, whether that predominating issue can best be served by the success of this or that candidacy is a matter of individual judgment. But in the points we have cited lie, if anywhere, the moralities of this considerably confused campaign.

Many church people have already settled how they will vote. We are ready to believe that their decision represents not only their political affiliations, but the consent of their consciences and the driving impulse of whatever moral energy they possess. But for the benefit of those who have not decided how they shall vote, we have listed what seem to us the important considerations, and venture in addition to suggest that those who are still undecided do not shrink from the intellectual effort involved in thinking out their final positions, do not fail to inform themselves on "inside situations" as far as they may be able so to do, keep themselves free from intolerance and the unteachable spirit, and above all seek for that guidance which cometh down from above. Nothing less than this is the duty of the patriot and Christian.

Far be it from us to sit complacently in the midst of the placid atmosphere that always hovers about an editorial sanctum and tell the churches what is their duty in this glorious autumn of 1920, but we make bold to suggest a few things that might be done provided there were a willing spirit, and of course every one knows that our churches are well supplied with the willing spirit.

Proper attention to the Pilgrim Tercentenary. Nation-wide celebrations are coming soon, culminating in the great commemoration at Plymouth, Dec. 21. Between then and now why not have a series of sermons on some phase of the subject, why not have in many local churches a pageant like that represented in the picture on our cover last week, or the pageant entitled A Pageant of Pilgrims, by Esther Willard Bates, just issued by the Pilgrim Press, or some other dramatic representation that shall interest and enlist the young people of the parish, or write to Dr. Mary Alice Emerson who conducts a department of Religious Drama and Pageantry in The Congregationalist? She may be addressed at Boston University, Boston, Mass. Plan, too, for a great Forefathers' Day celebration, in which shall participate all the churches of the town, particularly those to which Congregationalism is most closely akin—the Baptists, Unitarians and Universalists. It might be well also to include patriotic and civic organizations.

A church study of the town. The Survey idea is one of those associated with the Interchurch Movement that has stood the fire of criticism. And with reason. It starts on the assumption that when Christians want to do something they should know the territory where their campaign is to be conducted, what forces are already at work therein, what special objectives should be set up. It would do almost any church good to have brought to its attention Sunday morning or at a mid-week meeting the facts relating to the number of churches, character and value of the religious services, the places of amusement, the location and the caliber of the schools, the nominal church affiliations of every home, the nature of the work of organizations like the Grange, the Odd Fellows and the Women's Club. The quest for the facts would give the young and middle-aged people something worth while to do and their findings might furnish the basis of a larger program for the church that makes the inquiry.

Some home Forums. A minister of our acquaintance is projecting this idea in his parish. Fifteen or twenty men and women will meet from time to time this autumn in different parlors to talk over in the light of the principles of Christ some of our great, pressing social and industrial problems.

Larger interest in the Church School. Requisition, if need be by conscription, the best men and women to teach. Utilize approved modern methods without casting to the wind approved measures. Circulate that fine new paper, The Church School, among the officers and the teachers.

Organize circles or a circle of prayer. If the old prayer meeting is dead, get two or three persons to come together unostentatiously and spontaneously for regular and specific prayer, perhaps in a home rather than under the church roof. Never mind about any machinery. Do not wait for the minister to initiate it. If you believe that it pays to pray alone, test out also with others the mighty forces of prayers. A half dozen praying Christians may revitalize the entire church.

It is a good thing to be able to stand on our own feet and not be dependent on the fortunes of the family. Here were the Hapsburgs, aristocratic and well-provided people, with an apparent cinch on security in the form of an Emperor-King. And now they are forced, some eighty of them, to earn a living, their incomes have been stopped and they suffer great losses through the rates of exchange. Several archduchesses, a dispatch from Switzerland says, are becoming governesses and others maids. There is material here for the sensational or ironical novelists. And no doubt there would be situations as parlor maids open in some American houses at good wages for Archduchess This or That. We are sorry for them, but we think they will earn an honester and happier living in their new trades than as eaters of taxes and dependents on their ancient family heads.

The Bishops on Questions of the Day

We have not yet seen the full text of the encyclical letter which the Lambeth Conference of Bishops affiliated with the Anglican Church has issued as its judgment and advice on questions of immediate interest to the churches over which the bishops preside, but summaries have reached us. The Conference declares that marriage should be indissoluble, adding that "the state's obvious interest in the children should lead it to preserve the strictness of the marriage law." In regard to extending the work of women in the churches it declares for an open mind in recognition of the fact "that God has given to some women special gifts of spiritual insight and powers of prophetic teaching."

We felt bound to respect the customs of the Church, not as an iron law but as results and records of the Spirit's guidance. In such customs there was much which was obviously dictated by reasonable regard to contemporary social conventions. As these differ from age to age, and country to country, the use which the Church makes of the service of women will also differ. It is the peculiar gifts and the special excellence of women which the Church will most wish to use. Its wisdom will be shown, not in disregarding but in taking advantage of the differences between women and men. These considerations seem to have guided the primitive Church to create the Order of Deaconesses. We have recorded our approval of the revival of this order, and we have attempted to indicate the duties and functions which in our judgment belong to it.

The encyclical condemns spiritualism, which, with Christian Science and Theosophy, "tried by the doctrine of the Incarnation and the Cross are clearly shown to involve serious error." It says that "adherents of these movements are drawn into practices which injure their spiritual life and endanger their loyalty to Christ and the fellowship of his Church." But on the other hand these cults are "symptoms and results of the movement against materialistic views of life. We cannot but sympathize with those who seek refuge from the pressure of materialism. It is the part of the Church to afford such a refuge, and if it fails to do so there is something wrong with its own life."

Judged by the summaries which have reached us this encyclical letter seems to breathe the same spirit of desire to have the Church bear witness in its ministry to the whole range of man's needs and of broad-mindedness in relation to the means and varieties of service which was so manifest in the appeal for union.

In daylight-saving days the enterprising commuter often trots up the office stairs eleven minutes before he started from home.

Prohibition and Its Enemies

The average citizen feels well satisfied with the present situation in regard to Prohibition. Regardless of what his views were originally, there are few well-meaning men today who do not recognize the good that has been accomplished and the great moral victory that was won when the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted. But few who are not in some way directly interested realize the danger of the present situation.

The friends of the liquor traffic will accept neither the verdict of the people nor that of the Supreme Court. There was too much money in the traffic, and too many people whose appetite is stronger than their respect for law and decency. And this combination of greed and lawlessness is bound to make us trouble.

One of the prominent officials of the Liquor Dealers' Association has recently said: "The fight is to be taken into politics, and I should hate to be any congressman who would dare to run on a dry platform in Massachusetts." In other words, there is an active, aggressive group of men who are determined to break down the enforcement of the Prohibition law, and they are opposed only by the great body of right-minded citizens, who are mainly unorganized and oblivious to the danger which confronts them.

There has been organized in Massachusetts, for example, a Personal Liberty League, which has in its membership the names of some men of whom the public expected better things; and branches of this organization have been established in many of the New England states. There are similar organizations throughout the country. The avowed purpose of this organization and the probable line of attack by all the liquor interests will be legislation to legalize the sale of light wines and beers. Yet all experience teaches us that if a bar-room can be licensed to sell light wine and beer, it will sell whatever the appetite of its customers demands. More serious still will be the return of the old brewery-owned saloons with all their vice and corruption and with all their powerful influence in politics, which have just been overcome by national Prohibition. In other words light wines and beers would surely make a farce of national Prohibition, which is just what the "wets" are trying to do.

Except for the alcoholic content there are just as refreshing and satisfactory drinks to be obtained now as any that will be created if the law is changed. It is simply the alcohol, with its momentary exhilaration and following intoxication that the supporters of the drink traffic seek. And the question is at the moment urgent because the fight is on and there are localities where as yet the enforcement of the law engages all the powers of its officers.

The situation today is favorable for the enforcement of law and the preservation of good morals. We can only keep it so by seeing to it that the men we elect to our state legislatures and our national Congress are men who will stand no trifling with the laws which have been passed for the stamping out of this degrading traffic and the preservation of the homes and the manhood of our country.

When the British Commissioner for Palestine, Sir Herbert Samuel, for the first time attended the synagogue in Jerusalem, the lesson from the Law was Deut. 3:23–7:11, taken from the exhortations and counsels of Moses to the people, and including the significant verse: Now therefore hearken, O Israel, unto the statutes and unto the judgments which I teach you, for to do them, that ye may live, and go in and possess the land which the Lord, the God of your fathers giveth you. The words must have seemed as much a warning as a promise to the thoughtful in the congregation when they remembered that, out of more than two thousand years since the words of Moses were spoken, the Jews had been found worthy to own the land for only about three hundred.

The Duty of Citizens

This is the time when it is necessary once more to remind good citizens that the choice of representatives and the running of the government is their business. The reproach of politics is not so much the dominance of self-seekers as the abstention of those who are under the illusion that they are good, but who withhold their efforts from the primaries and the elections. A story printed long ago in the Chicago Record illustrates the point: "'Great Cæsar!' ejaculated the respectable citizen, as he passed the groggery from which noisy yells were issuing, 'what can they be doing in that horrible den?' 'Oh,' said the policeman, carelessly, 'they're just nominatin' the man you are to have for alderman.'" The days of the groggery, we hope, are gone, but there are other places of meeting for those whom good citizens sinfully and shamefully allow to determine their government for them.

The Christian Century recently published an article by Mr. E. J. Davis which illustrates the extent to which this dry rot of neglect hurts our democracy. He showed a startling indifference on the part of church members to the issues of municipal government. No candidate for mayor of Chicago or for state's attorney, he says, has ever received as many votes in the primary as there are masculine members of the evangelical churches of the city. He tells of a local option petition which fifteen out of sixteen members of a Chicago Bible Class could not sign because they were not registered voters. No wonder a man like Mayor Thompson controls the city politics if that is the measure of interest among church members. He tells of a candidate who was at the time under indictment for alleged bribery in Evanston who was renominated by a total vote of 937 while 24,036 did not vote. A state's attorney who had tried to enforce laws which churchmen had succeeded in getting passed was defeated for renomination by 1,089 votes while 226,783 registered voters did not vote.

Wherever such things are true they show a culpable neglect and indifference on the part of the professed followers of Christ. Evil is always on the watch. Selfishness knows its own mind and acts accordingly. The duty of participation in the choice of our representatives who make and execute our laws, and of watching that they do their duty, is just as much a part of the Christian's work as church-going and watching against personal temptations.

It is a part of morality, failure in which makes us partners in the failures and sins of the government. It is silly and wicked to complain of the faults of those in authority in whose choice and election we have refused to share.

The spirit which incited a riot at the service of the sacrament in the Orthodox (Russian) Cathedral in New York the other day in the interest of a theory of government in Russia is a spirit which we hope may never become naturalized in America.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Roadrunner

I and Keturah we went unto a far land, even unto California, and we sojourned there certain days. And our friends in that place were kind unto us, neither did we set foot upon the ground if they could prevent it; for they took us in their gas-driven Chariots, and showed unto us a Good Time.

And as we rode along a great Highway, we beheld a Bird, that is tall and graceful, that runneth along the road or beside it, and that seldom flieth. And they called that Bird the Roadrunner.

And they told me this story about that Bird, and I know not if it be true or false; save that I think no one in California would speak falsely about anything, save it might be to indulge in a Very Mild Exaggeration concerning the Climate. And this is the story which they told unto me:

The Roadrunner hath an inveterate enemy in the Rattlesnake; and he avoideth not the Snake by flying, as do other birds, but he runneth along the ground, where the Snake doth sometimes get him. Now a Rattlesnake enjoyeth a good sound sleep upon the sunny top of a Rock, or in some other warm place. And when a Roadrunner seeth a Rattlesnake asleep, he hasteneth and calleth all the other Roadrunners. And they come, and every one beareth in his beak a pad which he plucketh from the Cactus that groweth where the Snakes and the Roadrunners most do congregate. And they draw nigh quietly, and lay their Cactus Ringwise round the Serpent. Then do they go away and get Some More Cactus. And when they have laid that, then do they go away again, and Get Some More, and Then Some. And the Serpent sleepeth and heareth them not.

And when they have him Walled In, then do they waken him. And he rouseth himself from his slumbers, and behold, there is a Roadrunner nigh unto him. And he coileth himself and striketh at the Roadrunner, but pricketh himself upon the Cactus. Then doth a Roadrunner approach him from the other side, and he doeth likewise. And it cometh to pass in time that the Serpent becometh Crazy, and striketh at random, and every time he woundeth himself in a new place. And when the Roadrunners see that he hath gone Clean Nutty, then do they leap over him, and draw nigh unto him, and even pick at him with their bills; and when he striketh back, behold he landeth every time against the Cactus Thorns. Thus doth he Sting Himself To Death, and the Roadrunners hold a Merry Wake above him.

Now I have seen men who were Hemmed In after this fashion, so that what a certain poet hath called the Fell Clutch of Circumstance doth hold them in its grip, and Tantalize them so that they Sting Themselves to Death in their Frantick Efforts to break through. And mine heart grieveth for them.

And unto every one of them would I speak, saying, Oh, my brother, I know not how to break a way for thee through the Thorny Hedge that doth encompass thee; but this I know, it is not Good Sense nor yet Religion that thou shouldest Impale Thyself upon the Thorns. Whatever thou doest, go not Daffy over it, for then shalt thou work thine own destruction. Consider first of all, that there is one direction where the path is not closed, and that is Up. Calm thine own spirit, and look unto God; so shalt thou face with whatever good sense thou hast, and it is not much, and whatever grace a Mighty God can give unto thee, and that may be Considerable, the situation which thou art Up Against. And fret not thyself because of the Roadrunners. Keep thou still, and let them do the Worrying. And if thou lose not the little Sense thou hast, and employ the abundant grace which God shall give unto thee, there will yet appear somewhere a little Crevice among the Cactus; and albeit thou be Pricked in getting out, still it will not kill thee. And thou shalt yet outlive the Roadrunners.

Wherefore, possess thy soul in patience; trust in thy God, and when thou findest a Hole in the Cactus, though it prick thee, Go To It, and Go Through.

A great observer and teacher has gone from the ranks of England's scientific leaders with the death of Sir Norman Lockyer, at the good age of 89. To a correspondent of the New York Times an Irish leader said: "Irishmen don't know what they want, and won't be happy till they get it." It strikes us that a good many of our own countrymen are in just that attitude of mind and would do well to find out just what it is they want, whether it is lawful and profitable for others as well as for themselves and how they are going to go after it.

We are just now in the difficult period of prohibition enforcement. It will take some time to convince the lawbreakers that they run the risk of severe penalties. And those who voted for prohibition with their tongues in their cheeks and the idea that the law would never be enforced are finding out that the lack of real convictions may often lead to a real conviction and punishment.

How rapidly we are growing to be a nation of big and congested population is proved by the census reports which show that one out of every ten of us lives in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia, our cities with over a million inhabitants; and that more than a quarter of us live in sixty-eight towns having each more than 100,000 people. That means that we must improve conditions in the country to keep people there and in the cities because so many of them are already there.

Senator Calder of New York made an effective point in an address in Boston when he contrasted the slump in building dwelling houses with the activity in putting up garages. In the four years past, as Mr. Herbert A. Wilson, Building Commissioner of Boston, showed, more garages than dwellings were built, in 1919, 120 dwellings and 606 garages. All our cities are in need of dwellings; from 3,000 to 5,000, for example, in Boston. Some of us evidently may soon have to live in tents, or garages, or even move into the country.

The Coffee Club

Here is a social experiment which is no longer an experiment. It is a success. If the saloon was a workingman's social club and met a real social need here is a substitute which works. If it can succeed in California why not in Kentucky and Kalamazoo?

The Coffee Club has a history of twenty-two years in California with only one failure. It is an association whose purpose is to provide social centers free from degrading influences where light refreshments are served at a nominal cost and social life with amusements is provided free. The idea was to provide all the social attractions of the saloon without a bar, to run the business as a service rather than for a profit. A few public-spirited citizens thought it could be done. They set about doing it and succeeded.

In 1906, Mr. Ernest Fox, then living in San Diego, called together a group of Christian Endeavorers, told them what he had seen in London and proposed that they put the Coffee Club plan into operation there. It was done. The enterprise was successful for ten years and gained a property, when a new board of directors changed the plan, added a bakery and failed.

In 1907, Mr. Fox went to Stockton, organized an association there which opened its first club room Feb. 13, 1907, free for all, whether members or not. From the first the club has been popular, has had the generous support of public opinion and the press.

Dr. D. M. Gandier, the late lamented leader of the Anti-Saloon forces of the coast, was a frequent visitor. Of it he said: "The Coffee Club caters to the social side of man's nature and does it without any taint of charity and yet without such expense as shuts anyone out.

The features of the club are:

1. One member one vote.
2. Annual membership dues, $1 (additional capital raised by public subscription).
3. Net profits used to extend the work.
4. No intoxicating liquors and no-gambling allowed.
5. No tobacco to be handled by the Association. Smoking not allowed in rooms where lunch is served or reading rooms.

These clubs are now in successful operation in Stockton, Sane Jose, Lodi, Modesto, Santa Rosa and San Luis Obispo. A second club was opened in Stockton, Sept. 22, 1919. These two clubs are visited by about 1,500 men daily. In San Jose the attendance is about the same. The San Jose Club made a specialty of serving beans. During the first few months they served 300 to 500 pounds a month. Five years later they were serving over a ton of beans a month in five-cent plates. In spite of the high cost of living the Stockton Club offers a bill of fare in which are twenty items at five cents each. This they do and make money.

A Federated Coffee Clubs Association is now being formed "to promote, organize, maintain, establish or develop social centers free from degrading influences," after the pattern of these clubs now in successful operation.

Mr. Ernest Fox, the originator of the movement in San Diego twenty-four years ago, is still its esteemed head, being the Social Superintendent of the clubs in Stockton. He has done a notable service for his city and for California. He has demonstrated what may be done in any city by a few earnest social-minded citizens and what ought to be done in every town where there are workingmen enough to support a lunch room of this sort. The winning feature of the Coffee Club is in the fact that it is a self-respecting, self-supporting institution.

This is printed on the back of the San Jose bill of fare:

DID YOU KNOW

THAT—The San Jose Coffee Club is not a privately owned concern?

THAT—It is a co-operative membership association?

THAT—No one takes a cent of profit from it?

THAT—It is operated on a margin under three per cent., whereas a restaurant nets from 20 to 25 per cent.?

THAT—This difference is the benefit accruing to patrons, directly in fair prices and best quality, indirectly in service (upkeep of reading and rest rooms, lavatories, free phone, magazines and dailies, and library)?

THAT—The cost of upkeep of social service departments approximates $3,000 annually?

THAT—Social service was and is the real motive of the club's founders and of the present Board of Directors and membership?

THAT—A board of nine directors control its affairs and serve without pay?

THAT—It holds a charter from the state, which obliges it to conduct its business under the present plan?

THAT—In no event will our price schedule exceed our actual needs to cover cost of operation and depreciation?

At the National Capital

By George Perry Morris

From the denominational standpoint the outstanding event in Washington this month is the opening of the pastorate of Rev. Jason Noble Pierce at the First Church. He finds the city in a period of reconstruction of its educational system by Dr. Frank Ballou, the new superintendent; the city government with its first woman commissioner or mayoress, Miss Mabel Boardman of Red Cross fame; and much ferment visible in the great army of federal employes as to their status, pay, and rights of free speech.

The housing problem for them and for their families is quite simple, I believe; but not so for the increasing population of the city, and this despite the 30,000 reduction in the number of war workers. Not a few of them are trying to come back, so alluring did the city become. They have been home and the contrast is disheartening. Moreover, the city steadily gains in the number of its permanent residents, persons who are fleeing from other cities with a more commercialized form of existence and with greater crudities of manners and standards of living.

As elsewhere, local institutions of learning are crowded as never before; and equipment and endowment do not keep pace with the demands of hungry youth. More and more the federal employes are utilizing their spare time and improving their opportunities, so that the city really is a great night-school center. Lastly, youths and maidens of local families that formerly went away to college cannot afford to now. H. C. L. is fostering loyalty to local schools and colleges.

Religiously considered, the city is rather Laodicean. Church attendance is higher than in most Northern cities, and extension of "plant" keeps fair pace with the city's growth. But the average of preaching power and intellectual leadership is not what it should be in the national capital, with its swarms of tourists who might be impressed and with its increasing number of residents who want their pastors to interpret the modern world.

By the deaths of Rev. Dr. Randolph McKim of the Church of the Epiphany, and Dr. Samuel A. Greene of the Calvary Baptist Church, the "Old Guard" is hard hit. These churches are strategic in position and important in rank. Choice of able and forceful men for these vacant posts may raise the city's clerical average. Dr. McKim was a Southern gentleman of the old school, pronouncedly "Low Church," and an able and persistent polemicist against the High Church party and the Roman Catholic Church. His work in this latter field always recalled to me the specialization in which Leonard Bacon, the second, indulged for the benefit of readers of the Independent and The Congregationalist. Dr. Green had filled his post for forty years and had become a "saint" who combined with godliness unusual administrative ability. He preached the "Old Gospel," had crowded services, and was a father-confessor to hundreds of Protestants who trusted his goodness.

The projectors of the superb Cathedral have shrewdly had one of the clergy touring the leading social centers and watering-places of the country this year and getting subscriptions to carry on the work. In theory it is a clever bit of tactics. Persons who are off on a vacation usually are in an expansive, generous mood. With more modest desires and plans the Unitarians are beginning to erect on Sixteenth Street a handsome edifice to take the place of the one down town where New Englanders of eminence of the past generation sat content.

Invasion of business has sent them forth into the Northwest region; and it would be strategy if the authorities of the Congregational fold would enable the Mt. Pleasant Congregation to shift its site a bit and get over on the same street that the Unitarians are choosing. The Pilgrim and Puritan faith should have in this region a temple worthy of that faith's place in forming the national ideals. Congregationalists from all sections of the country, many of them in places of much importance, are settling in this region of the city. There is no question as to the congregation existing potentially. The crux of the problem is to get national aid for a national, denominational asset.

Between now and Jan. 1, not less than twenty national and international conferences of importance will be held here. This is a phase of the city's new life that is exceedingly significant. More "causes" head up here than used to. More of the great "groups" into which society is dividing, now maintain permanent headquarters. Congress has competitors in an increasing number of permanent or temporary commissions with high-grade personnel. The authority of the Arts Commission waxes each year and the esthetic wealth of the city will gain much this late autumn by formal opening of the Lincoln Memorial, by the opening of the Freer Art Gallery and of the war collections of the Smithsonian and National Museum. Besides which the last Congress provided for the first formal steps in creating a National Art Gallery with William H. Holmes in charge. The point of which array of facts is, that the city is gaining as a national intellectual center.

Climatically considered it has been a wonderful summer, favorable to the enforced presence of the President, who, by the way, has made a remarkable recovery and is quite like himself again physically. Of the clarity of his brain through all his troubles and of the enduring quality of his will there never has been any doubt. His subordinates in the diplomatic game are being encouraged to get back to Washington and give him facts not best committed to either cable or letter. He is working his altogether inadequate staff hard; but then he sets the example. Men who talk with him about the foreign policy say that he has one and that he can state it clearly and defend it ably; and his message to the Italian minister anent Russia, whether you agree with

New England and Kansas

Ninth Article in the Series "New England in the Life of the World"

By Howard A. Bridgman

Scene 1: Boston, Mass., the old station of the Boston & Albany Railroad on Lincoln Street. Time, July 17, 1854. Immense crowds are thronging the barnlike structure and extending out along the line of the train track. They are saying good-bye to twenty-nine resolute men bound for Kansas. As the train moves out of the shed, loud cheers and cordial farewells ring from the throats of thousands.

The scene shifts to Worcester, where the emigrants spend the first night of their long journey westward. There, too, a popular ovation is accorded them, and further pledges of remembrance and assistance are given. The next evening they are at Albany, where a similar reception awaited the travelers. At Rochester the group is presented with a large Bible by the president of the Monroe County Bible Society. At Buffalo they board the steamer and not many days later they are in St. Louis and Kansas City, whence they are led up the Kaw River through the Shawnee Reservation to a location that subsequently became the city of Lawrence.

Scene 2: New Haven, Ct. Time, the spring of 1856. A series of public meetings is being held at which the plan of organizing a company of free state men to go to the territory of Kansas and help make that state free was agitated. Many of the attendants had already been indoctrinated with abolitionist ideas by reading the New York Tribune and "Uncle Tom's Cabin," by propaganda in the press, on the lecture platform and by Henry Ward Beecher's stirring sermons, as well as by the example Massachusetts had already set in forming emigrant companies. The time had come in Connecticut for crystallizing a rapidly developing sentiment into action.

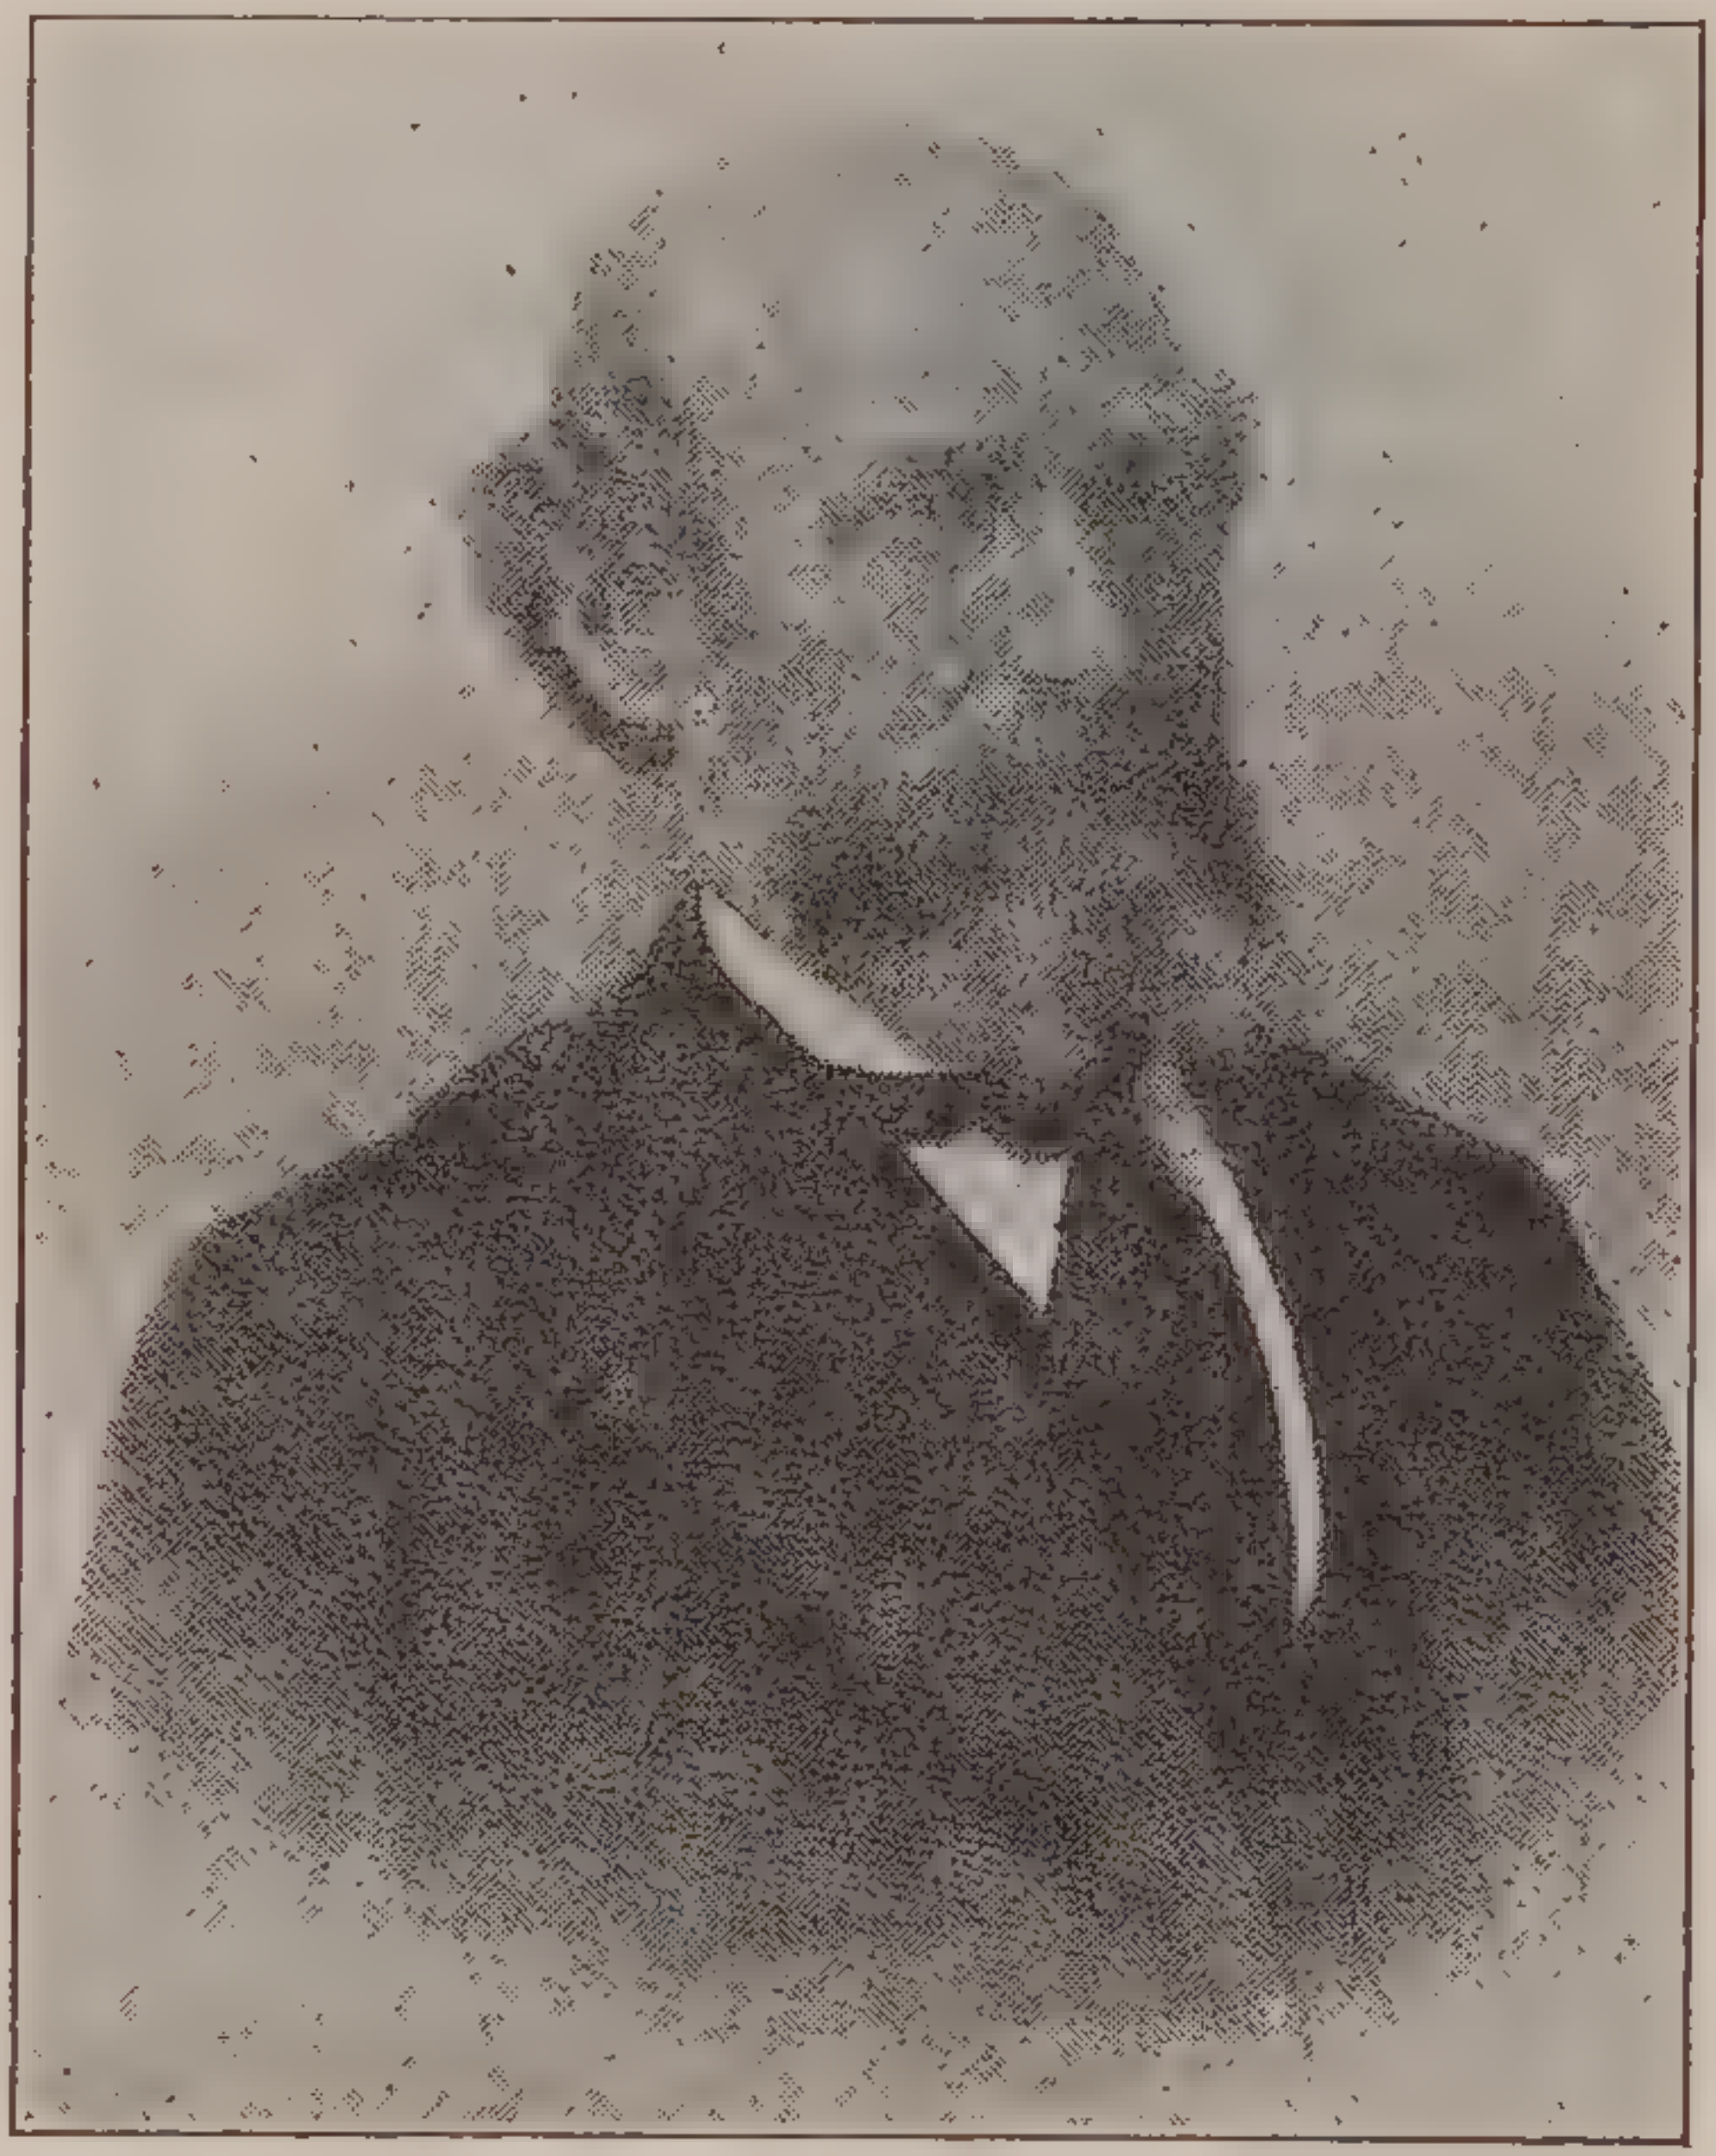
A Rifle and a Bible

As enthusiasm mounted higher and higher, it was resolved at the suggestion of Professor Silliman of Yale College, seconded by Henry Ward Beecher, to raise enough money to put a Sharpe rifle into the hands of every person about to emigrate to Kansas, and a Bible into his pocket. On March 31, 1856, the streets of New Haven were lined with thousands of applauding spectators as a band of men seventy strong set forth on their perilous journey to the battle ground of freedom. The company was a varied one; it included tradesmen, teachers of music, tutors in Yale College, politicians, farmers and ministers. As Dr. Richard Cordley said of them some years later, "They were making material for the historian and scenes for the painter, but it has been noticed that the historian and the painter never happen to be around on such occasions as these."

The New Haven emigrants went by boat to New York and then by ferry to Jersey City. There they took the train for Indianapolis and St. Louis, arriving in the latter city April 3 and going thence by the steamer Clara up the Missouri to Kansas City. Several days were spent there in purchasing oxen and needed supplies for the journey by wagon, hack and on foot into the turbulent land of promise.

They had been preceded a week or two by a scouting party of five young men, who as early as April of the same year had stood upon a sightly hilltop in Kansas looking down upon the broad and beautiful valley of the Kaw, with its rampart of low hills encircling it on every side. This seemed the promised land to the Kansas emigrants from Connecticut. The large river and two smaller streams made it a well-watered section and there at Wabaunsee they awaited the coming of their fellow colonists.

What were the impulses and the program behind this exodus of Massachusetts and Connecticut men to Kansas? It began in those tumultuous years just before the Civil War. It was animated by the purpose to aid in the rescue of that vast territory from the sin and curse of slavery. The region stretching westward from the Missouri, and embracing about 126,000 square miles, had become the storm center of the burning issues between the North and the South. Political events were leading up to the passing of the Kansas-Nebraska bill May 30, 1854, which completely altered the status induced by the Missouri Compromise, 1820, and left the nascent commonwealths themselves the right and duty to decide whether they would tolerate or banish slavery. At this juncture bold and far-seeing men in New England devised a new plan for forestalling the intentions of Southern slaveholders. The Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company was organized, its charter being signed by the governor April 26, 1854, more than a month before the passing of the Kansas-Nebraska bill by a vote of 37 to 14 in the Senate and 113 to 100 in the House.



Charles Robinson
First Governor of Kansas, whose sagacity and poise of mind made him the trusted leader of the anti-slavery forces at a time when the fate of the state hung in the balance.

This undertaking represented the first organized physical resistance to the power of slavery that this country had ever seen. To be sure, for decades before this time New Englanders of pronounced anti-slavery sentiments had been moving for the destruction of that barbarous institution of slavery. And many from New England had gone in groups and as individuals westward, but they had no concerted plan of action. The basis of the new society was quite distinct from any previous endeavor. It was frankly commercial, though the highest of motives also influenced both the founders of the movement and many of those who actively participated in it. But it aimed to smite slavery by a flank movement. It would fill Kansas as speedily as possible with settlers in sufficient numbers to outvote the pro-slavery immigrants who might come in from Missouri or other Southern states. It was to be a battle not of bullets but of ballots. Yet in order to safeguard the future of the departing New Englanders the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, afterward merged in 1854 into the New England Emigrant Aid Company, took pains from the start to point out the agricultural opportunities in Kansas and to set forth other material advantages that were bound to come if New Englanders of the right stamp took hold of the development of the Territory.

It was not a method that appealed to the left wing of New England abolitionists. John Brown and Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson and other extreme radicals scorned and denounced it as mercenary, time-serving, compromising, insincere and totally impotent, selfish and ineffectual, but a balanced historical view would give to the originators of the movement great credit for turning backward the tide of slavery influence which might otherwise have inundated Kansas.

The Guiding Personalities

Let us glance at the personnel of the founders of this Emigrant Aid Company. In Massachusetts Eli Thayer was the human dynamo who brought the Kansas crusade to pass. He was a genuine Yankee in his appreciation of thrift and industry and in inventiveness of mind. A highly respected citizen of Worcester, Mass., and a man of broad culture and intellectual force, he represented his community both in the state legislature and in the national House of Representatives. To Eli Thayer more than to any other one man belongs the honor of not only having seen the vision but of being practical enough to realize it in great measure. Mr. Thayer's admirably written book, entitled "The Kansas Crusade," is the best volume on the objects and achievements of the Emigrant Aid Company.

Closely associated with him was another Bostonian, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, then in the early and most virile years of his long, laborious and fruitful life. He lent to the cause his literary gifts and his capacity for imparting enthusiasm to others. He was severely criticized by many New England people in Kansas for his cautious and conservative utterances. He wrote a book setting forth the attractions of Kansas and Nebraska, going into considerable detail with regard to its topography and natural resources, the routes thither and other details relating to transportation and settlement. Some thirty-five years later Dr. Hale said, "I am more proud of my part in the settlement of Kansas, although it was only that of a subordinate, than I am of any public service I have ever rendered."

A third figure in the Massachusetts circle of believers in this method of making Kansas free was Dr. Charles Robinson, a physician in Fitchburg, a man of grave and dignified appearance, strong and versatile enough to weld together the various New England groups and in due time acquiring such influence that on Jan. 15, 1856, he was elected governor of the state under the Topeka Constitution, which was never recognized by the Federal Government. Though his house was burned and he himself imprisoned, he never bore arms. His life was often threatened. Cool, judicious, courageous, he held to his chosen policy of making Kansas free, if at all, by bona fide settlement, until that policy was triumphant. Incidentally it should be noticed that Robinson was a total abstainer at a time when many excellent people drank moderately.

Governor Robinson's wife, Mrs. Sarah T. L. Robinson, born in Belchertown, Mass., coöperated effectively with him and the other Kansas leaders. Her book, entitled "Kansas, Its Exterior and Interior Life," which ran through ten editions, is a valuable transcript of the events of these early and most stirring years.

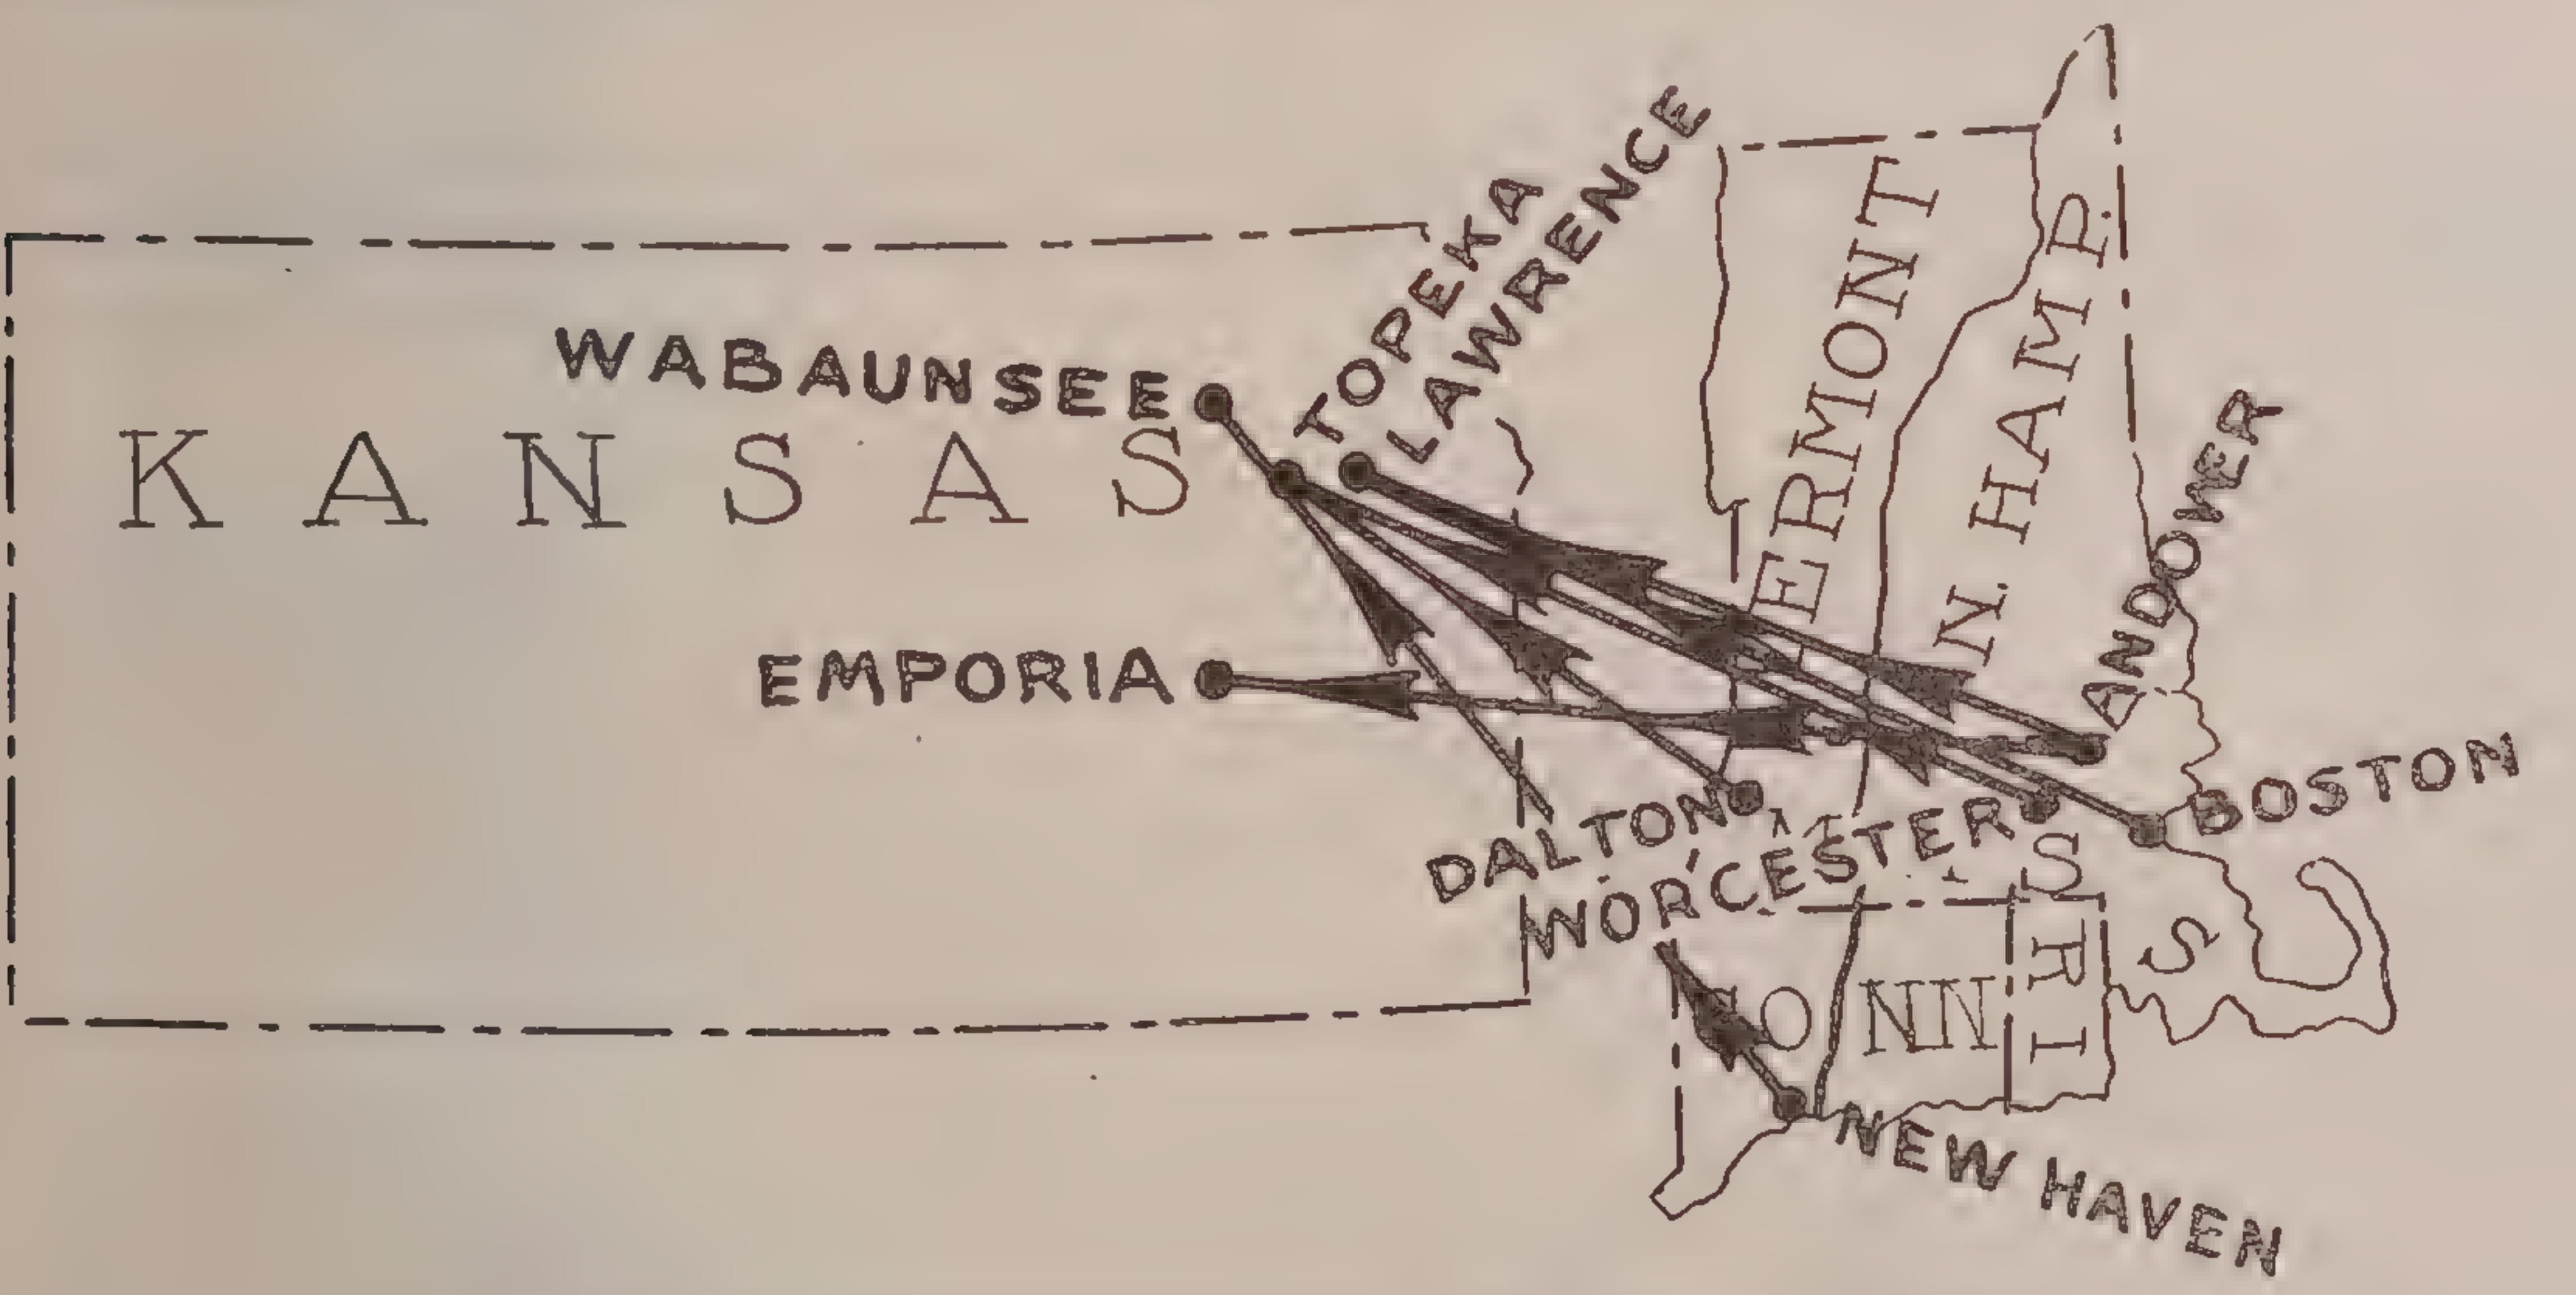
Other New Englanders who were willing to make the first venture and to express their faith in works to the extent of liberally subscribing for the stock included such sterling men as J. M. S. Williams, who subscribed the first $10,000, Alexander H. Bullock, Richard Hildreth, Otis Clapp, Amos Lawrence, Charles Francis Adams, Dr. Samuel Abbott, Jr., Eli Thayer and John Lowell of Boston or the vicinity, John P. Williston of Northampton, Nathan Durfee of Fall River and John Carter Brown of Providence, who was the first President of the New England Emigrant Aid Company.

The leader of the Connecticut colony was Hon. Charles B. Lines, a man of firm will, determined spirit, a temperance war-horse and a devoted Christian. He was just the one to lead his companions through the hardships and perils incidental to the journey and to the establishment of a center of free slavery sentiment in what is now the town of Wabaunsee.

Henry Ward Beecher's part in the energizing of this Connecticut colony was also noteworthy. His interest in this special colony arose from the fact that New Haven was his father's birthplace and the home of other ancestors. He was personally present in the North Church, New Haven, called "the Old Fort," on March 22, 1856, when Mr. Lines' company was being recruited, and then and there pledged twenty-five rifles as a gift from his own congregation in Brooklyn. Six days later he wrote a long letter to Mr. Lines, wishing the emigrants Godspeed and announcing the desire of a friend and parishioner to present to the company twenty-five copies of the Bible, thus matching every rifle with a copy of the Holy Scripture.

New England's Response

The rapidity with which companies of emigrants were recruited in Connecticut, Eastern Massachusetts, Southern New Hampshire and Maine is surprising. The second Boston Company leaving the city in August was three times as large as the first. In hundreds of communities Kansas Leagues and Kansas clergymen of the standing of Leonard Bacon, Lyman Beecher, Edward Beecher anl T. Starr King united in a public appeal in behalf of the Emigrant Aid Company. Hundreds of solicitors supplemented the influence of urgent letters from the front urging other New Englanders to "come along." The Boston office of the Emigrant Aid Company became a clearing house of valuable information.



Sample Migrations from New England to Kansas

Boston sent to Lawrence and adjoining towns a number of parties under the auspices of the New England Emigrant Aid Company. New Haven colonized Wabaunsee and vicinity. Members of the Andover Band settled in Emporia and Lawrence. Washburn College at Topeka owes much to Ichabod Washburn of Worcester and Zenas Crane of Dalton.

In all about 3,000 emigrants were registered, and Mr. Thayer estimates that this number was doubled by accessions received on the way to Kansas. At first only men were enrolled. They joined with the understanding that they would not undertake to summon their families West for a year or two. They paid their own carfares, but profited by the facilities provided. By the end of 1854 the population of Kansas had been increased 8,000, more than half of whom went thither directly or indirectly through the influence of the Emigrant Aid Company. So many other immigrants poured in from the Middle States that by the end of 1856 the free state men were altogether in the majority, outnumbering the pro-slavery voters in a decided proportion. In all about $140,000 were expended by the Society.

Meantime the earliest groups sent out by the company were encountering not only the usual vicissitudes and dangers incident to frontier life but the opposition and wrath of those whose plans they had set out to foil. Border ruffianism had then reached its most acute stages of development. Pistols and bowie knives, tar and feathers, were its chosen implements. The Missouri River was at times blockaded against the colonists.

The New Haven group arrived fairly well armed, but the settlers, assisted by the Emigrant Aid Company, relied on peaceful methods almost exclusively. They brought with them steam engines, printing presses and machinery and sawmills and gristmills. They built hotels and boarding houses, established newspapers, schools and churches. The Emigrant Aid Company never bought a firelock, though undoubtedly individual members both of the parties and of the corporation did not ignore altogether the advantage of having a rifle at hand in a region seething with strife and destitute of the usual instrumentalities of defense on which law-abiding communities rely.

It is not well to claim for New England all the credit for making and keeping Kansas free and prosperous. In the development of railroads, commerce and industry, New England capitalists and engineers have had a large part, but Kansas owes much to the Middle West, from which were recruited many of its most sterling and useful citizens. Kansas was not the child of New England but of the entire North. Not all the expectations of those who participated directly or indirectly in the activities of the Emigrant Aid Company were met. Its financial transactions in Kansas itself were not always ably handled, but such a statesman as William M. Evarts said that he regarded his investment in the Kansas venture and the New England Emigrant Aid Company as the best he ever made, and Dr. Hale observed, "Our dividends came long ago in Kansas free, a nation free, in the emancipation of four million black men and the virtual abolition of slavery the world over."

The Kansas Band

Equally vital was the touch of New England upon the educational and religious life of Kansas. It was felt perceptibly in the earliest period when Andover Seminary, mother of other bands, organized in 1856 a Kansas band consisting of four members of the middle class, Sylvester Dana Storrs, Grosvenor C. I. Morse, Roswell D. Parker and Richard Cordley. Each was promised a salary of $600 "to proclaim the gospel in Kansas." Storrs, a graduate of Dartmouth College and a man of uncommon versatility and energy, was the guiding spirit. He was first on the ground, arriving at Quindaro in the autumn of 1857, organizing there at once a church and helping to complete a house of worship which had already been begun by the enterprising and religiously minded colonists. He also founded a church in the village of Wyandotte, now the First Church of Kansas City, and another at Olathe. He also helped to put the church at Atchison on its feet and then served effectively for twelve years as superintendent of missions, increasing the number of Congregational churches in the state during that period from 82 to 189.

Morse, born in Acworth, N. H., April 19, 1827, and a graduate of Dartmouth, was the second man to reach Kansas, casting in his lot with the young colony at Emporia. He aided in establishing the State Normal School and was instrumental in securing from the legislature appropriations for its support. Parker, the third member of the Band, made his beginning at Leavenworth and then did royal service during the war at Wyandotte. Cordley, the best known one of the four, became the outstanding figure in Kansas Congregationalism, being the beloved and honored pastor of Plymouth Church, Lawrence, for thirty-eight years, and the most respected and influential leader among churches of the Pilgrim type throughout the state.

Associated with these four names should be that of Lewis Bodwell, born in New Haven, Ct., Sept. 8, 1827, who reached Kansas a year before the members of the Band and apprised them well in advance of the conditions they would face. He was twice pastor of the Topeka Church and served several years as superintendent of missions, and was one of the founders of the Washburn College.

Plymouth Church, Lawrence, grew to be a kind of cathedral center for Kansas Congregationalism. One of its charter members, O. A. Hanscom, had been a member of Mt. Vernon Church, Boston. When the organization of Plymouth was being effected, he produced a copy of the Mt. Vernon manual on which the rules and covenant for the new enterprise were based. The records on that day were written on the crown of his beaver hat by Samuel C. Pomeroy, born in Southampton, Mass., in 1816. He was one of the agents of the Emigrant Aid Company and afterwards United States Senator. New Englanders from various localities were plentiful in and around Lawrence. A group of families from Groton were only five miles to the south. A leader among them was Deacon Charles Dickson, a graduate of Yale College, whose wife was a niece of Samuel J. Mills. Not far away was a group from New Haven, Ct. Prominent in the early activities of Plymouth was a family named Monteith from McIndoe Falls, Vt., members of which had an active part in the management of the Underground Railway. The editor of the State Journal was Josiah Trask, son of Dr. Trask of Fitchburg, Mass., the well-known crusader

THE AFTERGLOW

[At Pigeon Cove, Mass.]

By ROLFE COBLEIGH

I stood on a wind-swept hilltop
And bade farewell to the day.
It had come to a blazing sunset
In the west over Ipswich Bay.

Beyond the rippling waters
Reflecting the colors bright
The majestic sun sank slowly
Until it had passed from sight.

A verdant bank of uplands
Along the horizon line
Grew dark in the deep'ning twilight
When the sun had ceased to shine.

Old Ipswich Bay was changing
To a duller, grayer blue.
To north and east and southward
The waters were grayer too.

Twilight enwrapped the landscape,
And with it the wind grew chill.
A score who had watched the sunset
Left me alone on the hill.

The fire-edged clouds no longer
Blazed bright in the western sky;
Their light diffused and softened;
Their colors began to die.

Still the sky was robed in beauty,
Subdued and blending slow—
And then—in a radiant rush of light—
Came the flood of the afterglow!

It swept to far-flung reaches
Of cloud-enmantled space;
And from its thrilling glory
Heaven seemed to come apace!

Delicate rose tints and golden
Hues unknown to the day
Suffused the sky before me,
Casting their spell on the Bay.

And all around to seaward
An iridescence spread,
Adding its charm to the wonder
With which my soul was fed.

Oh, 'twas a scene for an artist!
But no brush could paint such light.
Oh, 'twas a scene for a poet!
But no words describe that sight.

I lingered long on the hilltop,
'Till the moon from the east grew bright,
And one by one the shining stars
Studded the vaults of night.

The dark'ning sea bore a rippling path
Of light from moon to shore.
The lighthouse beacons flashed salute—
And the afterglow was o'er.

My memory holds a precious prize,
To abide wherever I go—
The heavenly vision of that night—
It was God in the afterglow!

against tobacco. Judge Jesse Cooper of Wyandotte, a native of Vermont, was another strong force in the early days. Justice David J. Brewer of the United States Supreme Court, whose mother, of the famous Field family, was born near Boston, served Kansas, where he resided so long, not less effectively than he did the nation.

IN THE FIELD OF EDUCATION

The earliest Kansas records show, as was to be expected, deep interest in education. The first private school in the territory was opened in Lawrence by James F. Legate of Massachusetts. Washburn College at Topeka, now one of the leading educational institutions of the state and of the trans-Mississippi region, came into being largely through the efforts of New England men. On its faculty, its board of trustees and among its benefactors throughout the years, have been many men and women of New England antecedents. It owes its name to Ichabod Washburn of Worcester, Mass., who in the early days gave $25,000. Another New England layman who gave the observatory and funds aggregating over $100,000 was Zenas Crane of Dalton, Mass., who concealed his name until his death. Today Washburn shows eleven substantial structures upon its 160 acres, beautiful for situation, a plant representing one and a half millions of dollars. Its catalog indicat[illegible]rollment of over eight hundred students. The State University at Lawrence, the State Agricultural College at Manhattan and the State Normal at Emporia all have a similar background of initiative. The seal of the State University bears the name of Amos A. Lawrence, the Boston philanthropist, who contributed the first ten thousand dollars for the institution. The Agricultural College looks to Roswell D. Parker as one of its important early friends and Grosvenor C. Morse of Emporia was the true father of the State Normal. Fairmount College at Wichita has many links with New England. The Haskell Indian School of Lawrence is so named because of the part Congressman Dudley C. P. Haskell, born in Vermont, had in bringing it into being. He and his brother had much to do also with the founding of the State University.

The days when "bleeding" Kansas aroused the pity of New England, when bazaars and public meetings were held by the hundred with a view to furnishing relief, when migration westward was organized on an unprecedented scale, and on an entirely new basis, seem now far distant. Fading rapidly into the past, also, are recollections of those days in the 50's and early 60's when bitter sectional enmities found expression in intemperate and vituperative speech, in curses and maledictions, and in lawless outbreaks. That such days as these have gone never to return, that peace and plenty, intelligence and virtue are found throughout the borders of the fair state of Kansas, is a matter for rejoicing on the part of the entire, and now unified, nation, and not, least of all, on the part of New England, which modestly thinks it "had a hand in it all."

For Teachers in the Opening Days of School:

O Lord, remember all who have responsibility for others and especially those who teach the children in the first days of the new school year. Give them wisdom, patience, courage and that affection which opens the eyes upon opportunity. And make their work effective and rewarding, both now and in the years to come.—R.

An English Radical on Soviet Russia

A Former Communist's Disillusionment

By Arthur E. Holt

Bertrand Russell of England has written a series of articles for the Nation which has sent a shock through the American radical papers and brought them all "up standing." Most of them deny the shock and say that they have always believed what Russell now writes about the Communist Movement in Russia. Russell is a British scholar, a mathematician and a philosopher, and incidentally, an English radical who spent considerable of his time in prison during the recent war. He is consequently a good deal of a "bell-wether" among the radicals. He has considered himself a Communist and no one charges him with being a conservative. Consequently what he has to say about Russia has sent a thrill through the radical circles in America which the writings of few other men have ever effected since all who have so far criticized Russia have been accused of a conservative bias.

The New Republic says it is what it has always believed about Russia. They further describe the articles of Mr. Russell in these words:

"They reveal Russia as a country governed by a war dictatorship consisting of two factions—one tending toward Bonapartism, the other tending toward a radical amendment of the original Communist theory. The articles show further that the Bonapartist faction thrives on war, and they prophesy that the evolutionist element would thrive on peace. They point out that the government of Russia is not democratic, and that there is privilege, corruption, bureaucracy and militarism. They show also the immense danger to the world which would come from the imitation of Bolshevism by the Socialist and Labor parties of other countries. They argue that the Third International thrives on intervention, war, blockade and censorship. The articles themselves illustrate the immense effect of permitting a convinced and sincere radical to disillusionize himself by seeing Russia through his own eyes."

Even the Seattle Union Record chimes in that its own opinion is also that of Mr. Russell. This rush of the American radicals to affirm their doubts about Russia now that Mr. Russell has led off is extremely interesting.

MR. RUSSELL'S INDICTMENT

But it may be interesting to study for a few moments the indictment which Mr Russell brings against Communism in Russia. Mr. Russell started on his trip through Russia on the 11th of May with the British Labor Delegation. His experiences with the leaders of the Russian Revolution and with the people gave him a pretty intimate view of conditions at the present. On the basis of this study, he makes a good many observations, the chief ones of which we will try to tabulate.

He notes first "the profound difference between the theories of actual Bolsheviki and the version of those theories current among advanced Socialists in this country (that is, England). Friends of Russia here think of the dictatorship of the proletariat as merely a new form of representative government in which only working men and women have votes and the constituencies are partly occupational, not geographical. They think that 'proletariat' meant 'proletariat,' but 'dictatorship' does not mean 'dictatorship.' This is the opposite of the truth. When a Russian Communist speaks of dictatorship he means the word literally, but when he speaks of the proletariat, he uses the word in a Pickwickian sense—the Communist who sincerely believes the party creed is convinced that private property is the root of all evil. He is so certain of this that he shrinks from no measures however harsh which seem necessary for constructing and preserving the Communist state."

In commenting on this, Mr. Russell says, "These views are the familiar consequences of fanatical belief. To an English mind they reinforce the conviction upon which English life has been based ever since 1688 that kindliness and tolerance are worth all the creeds in the world."

AUTOCRATIC MILITARISM

The second indictment which the writer brings against Bolshevism is that it is, "internally aristocratic and externally militant. The Communists have all the good and bad traits of an aristocracy which is young and vital. They are practically the sole possessors of power and they enjoy innumerable advantages in consequence. Most of them though far from luxurious have better food than other people. In a thousand ways the Communists have a life which is happier than the rest of the community." Mr. Russell tells us that in a population of 120,000,000 there are only about 600,000 Communists. This gives us some idea of the comparative few who enjoy special privileges in the new state set up in the name of larger opportunities for the common man.

The most vigorous indictment which is brought against the new régime is that in seeking to promote social equality by war it inevitably promotes exactly the opposite. We give the indictment in Mr. Russell's words: "The Third International is an organization which exists to promote the class war and to hasten the advent of revolution everywhere. My objection is not that Capitalism is less bad than the Bolsheviki believe, but that Socialism is less good. At any rate in the form which can be brought about by war. The evils of war, especially of Civil War, are certain and very great. The gains to be achieved by victory are problematical. In the course of a desperate struggle, the heritage of civilization is likely to be lost, while hatred, suspicion and cruelty become normal in the relations of human beings. In order to succeed in war, a concentration of power is necessary and from concentration of power the very same evils flow as from the Capitalist concentration of wealth. For these reasons chiefly, I cannot support any movement which aims at world revolution.

Again Mr. Russell finds fault with the Russian experiment on the basis that it is not a real experiment in the Soviet system. As he says, "The Soviet system is moribund. No conceivable system of free election would give majorities to the Communists in either town or country. Various methods are therefore adopted for giving the victory to government candidates. In the first place the voting is by show of hands so that all who vote against the government are marked men. In the second place, no candidate who is not a Communist can have any printing done, the printing works being all in the hands of the state. In the third place, he cannot address any meeting because all the halls belong to the state." The government of Russia has thus become an intensified bureaucracy.

When Mr. Russell analyzes this bureaucracy he finds it made up of three important classes. The first and most important element are the old revolutionists who have stood the brunt of the fight for a more liberal Russia. They furnish the enthusiasm and the driving power of the bureaucracy. The second class is that group of office-holders which has come over from the old régime which includes the whole army of policemen, spies and secret agents whose chief function it is to sell their services to the ruling political order. The third faction is made up of successful men of affairs who always believe in adjusting themselves to conditions as they are and who cannot be relied upon to have any motive except the practical motive of "business first" in any situation. They are employed by this present order as they were employed by the old order.

Of Lenin Mr. Russell says, "He is dictatorial, calm, incapable of fear, extraordinarily devoid of self-seeking, an embodied theory. I think if I had met him without knowing who he was I should not have guessed that he was a great man. He struck me as too opinionated and narrowly orthodox. His strength comes, I imagine, from his honesty, courage and unwavering faith—religious faith in the Marxian gospel which takes the place of the Christian martyr's hope of paradise except that it is less egotistical. He has as little love of liberty as the Christians who suffered under Diocletian and retaliated when they acquired power. Perhaps love of liberty is incompatible with a whole-hearted belief in a panacea for all human ills. If so, I cannot but rejoice in the skeptical temper of the Western world. I went to Russia believing myself a Communist but contact with those who have no doubts has intensified a thousandfold my own doubts, not only of Communism, but of every creed so firmly held that for its sake men are willing to inflict widespread misery."

A Tercentenary Hymn

(Tune: Onward Christian Soldiers)

Followers of the Pilgrims,
Heirs of faith and fame,
Ours the great endeavor
Ours the glorious name;
For our brave adventure
Loyal hearts and strong:
Christ our Lord and Leader,
Christ our Joy and Song.

Chorus

Let the word be, Forward!
Let your hearts be strong.
Christ our Lord and Leader
And our triumph-song.

As the Fathers carried
Freedom o'er the sea,
Ever in our vision
Let new freedoms be.
As the Fathers ventured,
Venture we, to win
Brothers for the kingdom,
Bring new justice in.

Chorus

From their liberal sowing
Harvest fields have grown.
Age on age shall bless them,
Reap where they have sown.
All men shall be brothers,
Wars and fears shall cease,
Christ be guide and leader
While the years increase.

Chorus

We shall still remember,
We shall still aspire,
Kindled to his purpose,
Burning with his fire.
Helper of the Fathers,
Lead their children on,
Till our work is ended,
Till thy goal is won.

Chorus

The New Negro in the New South

Encouragement in Present Conditions

By Rev. Rodney W. Roundy

Looking once on the seal of a Southern state which represented a Negro sleeping on a bale of cotton, Wendell Phillips remarked, "What will the people do when the Negro wakes up?" The Negro has awakened. Many are wide awake, thinking and acting for themselves as never before. Dr. George E. Haynes, Director of Negro Economics in the United States Department of Labor, has said: "The Negro wishes to be an American citizen with full American opportunities. This fundamental desire has been driven deep down into the hearts of all Negroes—even the workingman on the street. The Negro people have been misunderstood as clamoring for some special privileges for themselves, when they simply want things applied to them as they are applied to others."

This motive as well as the allurement of higher wages is still bringing Negroes North. The better element of the South is alive to the driving impulses of the new Negro and in terms of simple justice is seeking in many parts of the South to meet the reasonable demands of a new life. Principal Moton of Tuskegee says that "There never were so many white people in the South who are not merely desirous that the Negro should be fairly and justly dealt with, but who are determined that he shall have a fair chance."

LYNCHING

Lynching must stop! The New South makes this plank the first necessity of simple justice. On the surface of things the story of the last year and a half is not promising. Exclusive of deaths in riots there were seventy-seven lynchings in 1919. Seventy of these were in the South, fifty-two in the Southern South. It is a horrible record.

An increasing number of thinking, energetic, law-abiding Southerners realize that such lawless outbreaks are uncivilized disgraces and national menaces. The continuance of mob violence against Negroes means the harboring of a spirit which may break loose anywhere—in a Boston riot, a murderous up-rising against Italians in West Frankfort, Ill., the delectation of German movie audiences by picturing the details of an American lynching scene and the taunt of Mexicans about the lack of safety of American citizens in America itself.

SOUTHERN GOVERNORS

In the name of law and order, Southern governors are using strong, effective methods in the suppression of violence. The political triumph of Governor Roberts of Tennessee two years ago was a victory comparable with that of Governor Coolidge in Massachusetts last fall. There are those who say that a lynching cannot now take place in Tennessee. Certainly there has been none in 1920 and only one in 1919. New laws with teeth in them, an effective state police force and a governor constantly on the job have wrought wonders. Governor Roberts publicly proclaims as fundamental American principles the rights of all men, colored as well as white, to the protection of life, of property and of the choice of places in which life is to be spent. His broad-mindedness is evidenced by his interest in all phases of Negro welfare and by his appointment to the State Commission of Child Welfare of Pres. F. A. McKenzie, the efficient head of Fisk University.

The use of machine guns by Governor Morrow at Lexington, Ky., to disperse the mob and similar action more recently by Governor Bickett at Graham, N. C., have inspired new hopes and new faith among Negroes. Governor Brough of Arkansas has appointed an inter-racial state commission to get at the fundamental remedies for such outbreaks as the one at Elaine. Were the Governor of Texas on his job in the same way, eight out of the twenty-four lynchings so far in 1920 would not be the black mark against the name of his state. Vigorous action of governors, mayors, sheriffs and policemen backed by a wholesome popular sentiment means at no distant date the lessening, even the suppression of mob violence. May God and man together speed the day!

THE NEW DAY

Even though Harlem in New York City is the largest and most congested colored district in America, if not in the world, the South still remains the chief habitat of the Negroes in the nation. An increasing number of Southern white men and women are thinking seriously about improvement in race relations. If the Negro is kept down, suppressed into the ranks of poverty, forced into hopeless servitude in multiplying numbers, the weight of the social burdens will increase geometrically. But the Negro is rising in education, in ownership of property, in self-respect, in all worthy avenues of achievement. Of necessity this means co-operation of the Booker Washington kind, in which the races are as separate in many respects as are the fingers of the hand; together in fundamental and energizing things as are the fingers in the clenched fist.

GRADUATING CLASS, BALLARD NORMAL SCHOOL, MACON, GA.

INTER-RACIAL COMMITTEES

The community idea for inter-racial understanding through the joint leadership of white and colored people in each community has spread into many Southern cities and towns, and has resulted in many practical reforms. The War Work Council of the Young Men's Christian Association has given men and money for the fostering of this program. Chambers of Commerce in Nashville, Memphis and Chattanooga, Tenn., in Norfolk, Va., in Atlanta, Ga., and in many other cities have put inter-racial plans into operation or actively co-operated.

Recent accomplishments in the State of Louisiana are typical. At the spring session of the legislature a bill was passed creating a normal school for Negroes in the northern part of the state. Another bill carrying appropriations of $30,000 for 1920 and $50,000 for 1921 provides for the construction of an institution for the deaf, dumb and blind Negroes of the state. The annual appropriation for Southern University, the Negro State School at Baton Rouge, was raised from $65,000 to $265,000 for the years 1920 and 1921. In June at Alexandria, Io., a state-wide organization for improving conditions among Negroes was definitely brought into existence and its plan of work, backed by leading white and colored men and women of the state, is to be carried on through twelve distinct committees.

New Orleans has a Colored Civic League duly chartered Dec. 19, 1919. The New Orleans Association of Commerce has a committee of three who are ex-officio members of the Board of Directors of the Colored Civic League. This arrangement means effective co-operation through responsible bodies whereby welfare agencies can be promoted, justice in courts and industrial conditions assured, schools built and maintained, recreation provided, the poor cared for, friction removed, to the great benefit of the city's 100,000 Negroes and all its large white population.

The Inter-racial Committees of local communities provide plans and methods of law and order, justice in the courts, better housing, care for the sick, provisions for sanitation and recreation, better schools, school buildings, and teachers, economic justice, improvement in street cars, aid for and interest in the farmers and the promotion of varied interests of Negro welfare. The Christian agencies, colored and white, are particularly enlisted. It was a great step forward when white Southern men and women met with leading colored men and women to confer and plan together. Certainly here is one result coming out of the war of far-reaching promise for good. There are many Northern centers where Negroes are multiplying which may well take notice of this method.

PROGRESS IN PUBLIC EDUCATION

Recent years have recorded real progress in public education for Negroes in the Southern states. In some states the advance has been remarkable. Southern Superintendents of Education are most thoroughly alive to the South's shortcoming in public schools for Negroes and to the necessity for improvement. Dr. Buttrick of the General Education Board speaks of the change in this respect during the past twenty years as revolutionary. In two decades the enrollment of Negroes in public schools has advanced thirty-five percent. There are 400,000 more Negro children in public schools than there were in 1900. The length of school terms has been changed from three months to five months—there is still chance for improvement. The valuation of school property has jumped from a 91 per cent. increase in Georgia in a decade to 204 per cent. in South Carolina. In the same time each Southern state reveals a half or three-quarters of a million dollars advance in school property values. This means the construction in the aggregate of a vast number of new school buildings.

Negro teachers are receiving much larger salaries. State records range from 64½ per cent. total increase to 159 per cent. New normal schools are being built and old ones conducted on more thorough principles of modern education. During each summer a network of summer schools and institutes for Negro teachers cover the Southland. Trained instead of untrained teachers are being employed. Public funds along with aid from the Jeanes and Slater funds has meant the establishment of over one hundred county schools. These are schools of secondary grading and are fruitful in training teachers for work in elementary grades.

Mission Schools

In terms of missionary education what does this mean? It means that those schools for Negroes most strategically located must persist. They cannot continue on a basis of former equipment and former methods. They have won one battle for better American life in their contention that the Negro is a worthy subject of education. They must now have the strong leadership and support which will still keep them in the vanguard.

No race can rise without leaders, without Christian leaders. Missionary schools and colleges are the ones which will aid in producing many of the finer spirits and the greater souls. The demand for trained teachers and ministers is far from being supplied. To help meet this need the Southern Methodist Church has in contemplation the founding of a training school for teachers and ministers in a strategic center of the Southland. Many more trained physicians are needed. More Negro lives would be saved each year, especially children's lives, with proper application of sanitary and hygienic laws than are now lost to the Northland by the large annual emigration. Negro social workers in multiplied numbers should be supplied. Christian schools of social service furnish the only proper place for such training.

The Pulpit and Press of the South

The pulpit of the South is taking a new attitude on the race question. Instead of silence there is a voice. This is especially true of leading preachers like Drs. Ashby Jones and Plato Durham of Atlanta, Dr. McCaslin of Montgomery, Dr. John S. Jenkins of Augusta. Dr. Dillard cannot say as he did a year ago in New York City that "the white preachers of the South avoid the problem." Many still do, but the tide is turning. A new spirit of understanding, helpfulness and justice is truly in evidence.

A similar story of good things should be chronicled of the Southern press. Papers like the Atlanta Constitution, the Memphis Commercial Appeal, the New Orleans Times-Picayune and the San Antonio Express have justly had reputations of interest and fairness. The last year their statements on better things for Negro life have been more frequent and effective than ever, while many other papers of lesser circulations but of importance locally have gone far in moulding public opinion into new channels of co-operation.

A Rediscovery of the Mayflower

Listening Under the Framework of the Famous Ship

By Dr. Chester C. McCown

This afternoon I have been sitting in the cabin of the Mayflower. To be sure, it was upside down. But none the less we were looking at the very timbers that had carried the Pilgrims on their long journey across the hostile sea. As Dr. Rendell Harris unfolded his story of the search for the evidence that has led to his sensational discovery, we felt convinced that we were sitting under the great central beam that had to be repaired on the voyage by the aid of a great screw the Pilgrims had brought from Leiden to save the ship from foundering in mid-ocean. I can only give a hasty summary of the brief sketch of the evidence which Dr. Harris presented this afternoon. About the first of September it will appear in book form, and its weak points as well as the strong will be patent to all. I am rather concerned to picture the historic occasion of the first public announcement of the discovery.

Informal Occasion Made Impressive

In a drenching shower we rode from London to Seer Green Halt. But the fates altered their inauspicious mood. The rain ceased just before we alighted and we walked under clearing skies through the winding lane, running with water and lined with dripping green hedges and magnificent trees to Old Jordan's Hostel, now belonging to the Society of Friends. We were in Buckinghamshire, where the Lollards flourished, where the people came to know the Bible in their own English tongue through the "broadsides" of Wycliffe's Bible. It was in soil thus prepared that Puritanism flourished, and later, a generation after the Mayflower, the region become a great center of Quaker faith. We passed the little meeting-house beside which lie William Penn, his two wives, and five children. Walking up the lane we came to the hostel quadrangle, formed by the old farmhouse, an old barn now turned into a dormitory and refectory for the conferences which meet here, and, on the southwest side, the barn we had come to see, now used as a conference audience room.

Rendell Harris made the very informal occasion dignified and impressive. Standing on the rough platform that fills one end of the barn, his combination of venerable gray beard and hair, soft collar with long points that fell over the lapels of his tweed overcoat, sprightly humor and incisive speech made him an unforgetable figure. He is not at all dogmatic in his statement of the case; he recognizes certain weak links in the chain of evidence. But the cumulative effect of many details is almost, if not quite, decisive.

Briefly stated the case is this: Some two years ago, when Dr. Harris was attending a funeral of a dear friend in the cemetery near by, some one chanced to remark that that old barn was made of timber from the Mayflower. After a short time he began to investigate, thinking that this local tradition was at least worth looking into. First of all, there can be no doubt that the barn is made of ship's timbers, as are many others in this part of England. The curve of many of the beams, the mortises and holes for trenails where none are called for, the evidence of the action of water on some parts, are conclusive evidence. Several professional shipbuilders have examined it, and they agree on this point. One estimated the ship to have been a schooner, ninety to one hundred feet long and of about one hundred and fifty tons, not far from the size of the Mayflower.

Second, the evidence seems to prove that the farmhouse and barn were built between 1618 and 1625. The bricks of the barn's foundation are of a size which was illegal after 1625. In the kitchen of the house back of the fireplace is a large metal coat-of-arms of King James I., bearing the date 1618.

Third, in the Admiralty records there is an appeal from three of the four owners of the Mayflower, dated May 26, 1623, asking for an appraisement of the ship, which is "in ruinis" —the document is in Latin—in order that they might receive their proportion of its value. The names of the four appraisers are given, but not of the fourth owner. The evidence is conclusive that the original Mayflower was then already taken to pieces, and that the Mayflower which came to New England later on was another ship. Her records have been discovered.

Most Difficult to Solve

The fourth point is the most difficult, the task of connecting the Mayflower with this barn at Old Jordan's. Two of the owners have been discovered in the parish register. Another, the captain, lived at Harwich. Dr. Harris believes the fourth, whose name is not mentioned, was Richard Gardner, one of the original band, who returned shortly to England and died. This property at that time belonged to the Gardner family. It was this man, or his heir, who bought out the other owners of the Mayflower, and in a time when timber was scarce in England, used the seasoned beams of the ship to build a barn which has stood for three hundred years.

While waiting for the fuller statement of the evidence, one feels he must, provisionally at least, accept the veteran scholar's conclusion and award him the palm for another discovery as interesting as any he has made.

Examining Evidence at First Hand

After listening to Dr. Harris' statement and questioning him with regard to certain details of it—a process which revealed the fact that he had back of his statements much evidence he had not been able to touch upon—the company broke up into groups to visit and examine at first hand the material evidence on the spot. We looked at the piece of metal on one of the uprights in the barn and a similar piece on a door-jamb in the farmhouse, in both cases utterly irrelevant to the present uses of the wood. According to Dr. Harris, these were pieces of the keel of the Mayflower, and the presence of one piece in the house and the other in the barn helps to prove that house and barn were constructed at the same time. We examined the metal bar that had been used to repair the split central beam, which he believes to have been the handle of the "screw" press which the Pilgrims had brought with them from Leiden. In the back of the barn on a beam are carved the letters, now very dim, H A R, which are believed to stand for Harwich, the port of registry of the Mayflower. On the back of a door in the house are three braces decorated with flowers with long curved stems and thought to resemble the hawthorn blossom, which is the "Mayflower" in England. They may have been ornaments of the cabin of the little vessel. We got down on hands and knees, lit matches and examined the blackened plate on which were embossed the arms of James I. and the date 1618. The kitchen has sacred associations entirely apart from the Mayflower, for here George Fox and other Quakers worshiped, and from it some of them were dragged off to prison and persecuted for preferring conscience to conformity. Indeed, to an American, the afternoon was one of most unusual interest, even if evidence should be discovered to discredit Rendell Harris' discovery.

Our Pilgrim Fathers for Church Union

Their Attitude toward the Church of England

By E. Victor Bigelow

When the Puritans on the way to settle in Salem in 1629, were sailing past the western tip of England, Rev. Francis Higginson declared, "We will not say as the Separatists were wont to say at their leaving of England, 'Farewell, Babylon, Farewell, Rome!' but we will say, 'Farewell, dear England, farewell the Church of God in England.'" But Higginson's company had not felt in their own persons the inexcusable brutalities from the crown and the Church of England, which had been suffered during a half century by many other groups of Puritans just as patient and as leal as themselves. A farewell of hatred was in many cases well deserved by Elizabeth Tudor and James Stewart, by the blood-guilty bishops, Bancroft and Laud; but Higginson was mistaken about some of the Separatists. Instead of hatred they cherished a patient love for the Church of England.

After reaching Salem and learning at first hand how the Pilgrims of Plymouth really felt toward that church Governor Endicott wrote to Governor Bradford: "I rejoice much—touching your judgments of the outward form of God's worship—being far different from the common report that hath been spread of you touching that particular."

Higginson's Puritans, although they cherished fondness for the Church of England, nevertheless quickly bundled off the Brown brothers on the homeward trip as soon as they tried to establish a prayer-book service in Salem; while the Plymouth settlers, opprobriously called Separatists, kept two English churchmen, Lyford and Oldham, for a whole year and then banished them only because of rankest treason.

Long Standing Affection of the Pilgrims

This amiable attitude toward the mother church was not the softening effect of years but the original and steadfast forgiving spirit of as fine a group of Christians as ever lived. Let the words of Governor Winslow, one of the early members, speak to this point! "The foundation of our New England Plantation was not laid upon schism, division or separation; but upon love, peace and holiness. They say 'the church of Plymouth which went first to Leyden, were schismatics, Brownists, rigid separatists, having Master Robinson for their pastor who made and to the last professed separation from the other churches of Christ.' For answer to this aspersion, he that knew Master Robinson either by his doctrine daily taught; or hath read his Apology, or knew the practice of that church of Christ under his government, might easily take off the aspersion. For his doctrine, I living three years under his ministry, before we began the work of the Plantation in New England, it was always against separation from any of the churches of Christ; professing and holding communion both with the French and Dutch churches; yea tendering it to the Scots also; ever holding forth how wary persons ought to be in separating from a church; and that till Christ the Lord departed wholly from it, man ought not to leave it, only to bear witness against the corruption that was in it. . . . And if any joining to us either in Leyden or since we came to New England, have, with the manifestation of their faith and profession of holiness, held forth therewith separation from the Church of England: I have divers times heard either Master Robinson or Master Brewster stop them forthwith; shewing them that we required no such things at their hands; but only to hold forth faith in Christ Jesus, etc. . . . leaving the Church of England to themselves and to the Lord before whom they should stand or fall; and to whom we ought to pray to reform what was amiss amongst them. . . .

"But if any object, he separated from the Church of England and wrote largely against it; I acknowledge he wrote largely against it; but yet let me tell you he allowed hearing the godly ministers preach and pray in the public assemblies. Yea he allowed private communion not only with them but with all that were faithful in Christ Jesus in the Kingdom of England and elsewhere. Yea he honored them (godly Anglican clergymen), for the power of godliness above all the professors of religion in the world. Nay I may truly say his spirit cleaved unto them . . . which was no small motive to him to persuade us to remove from Holland to where we might not only continue English, but have and maintain such sweet communion with the godly of that nation."

John Robinson's Admonition

Winslow quotes a bit of farewell advice from Mr. Robinson: "I should be glad if some godly minister (from the Church of England) would go over with you before my coming; for there will be no difference between the unconformable ministers and you when they come to the practice of the ordinances out of the Kingdom."

"He advised us by all means," says Winslow, "to endeavor to close with the godly party of the Kingdom of England and rather to study union than division."

When the time came to negotiate with the London Virginia Company for a landfall in America, Rev. John Robinson and Elder William Brewster wrote seven articles covering the whole question of the loyalty of the Pilgrim Church to the faith of the Church of England and to the government. Assenting to the Thirty-nine articles, desiring to keep spiritual communion, obeying the king, conceding his right to appoint Bishops and their authority in civil matters. These two sincere and devout men without concealing their own method of church government, went so far as to offer to take the Oath of Supremacy "if it be required and if convenient satisfaction be not given by our taking the Oath of Allegiance."

It seems very clear that neither political nor ecclesiastical separatism can fairly be charged against our Pilgrim Fathers. They were brutally driven out of their homes for holding prayer meetings and for preaching the New Testament among their own friends and neighbors. In their sufferings while exiles in other lands they resented the name "separatists" and still clung to an unbroken communion with the saints at home. They discovered moreover that they were a completely effective and sufficient body of Christ, able to keep the oracles of God and to mediate salvation to other souls, and this possession they and their descendants will never deny nor abridge though they may claim and exercise unity with any or all other churches of Christ.

Church Federation

Dear Mr. Editor:

It is with some hesitancy that I ask to appear in your columns among the ministry to suggest church reform, since my profession is that of a lawyer, and I am one of the laity; but I have decided to make the venture.

While I realize that the Christ spirit in the church and the world today has been the moving spirit which caused the several splendid organizations to work in harmony and with united effort to do the great work they have done to aid in winning the world war, and while I would not purposely unjustly censure the Church, it does seem that, largely because its energies and funds have not been applied in such a manner as to get the best results, it has come far short of accomplishing the great purpose for which Christ came into the world, to wit: To save the world, to lift the human race to a higher level, and to establish the universal brotherhood of man.

We have churches and churches, yes, too many inefficient, weakling organizations, struggling on and on year after year in competition with each other, yes, in competition, in trying to see which can get the most members, erect the finest building, install the best pipe organ, get up the best banquet, organize the biggest choir, or do something to excel along material lines, entirely losing sight of the real purpose of the Church in the world.

A few people had caught the vision of the universal brotherhood of man before the war, but because of this competition and the denominational selfishness of a majority of the members the churches have hampered themselves and blocked the very purpose of their existence.

It is worse than the Chinese Puzzle to the Chinaman himself, and to other Orientals where missions have been established, to understand why there are Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, United Brethren and other church denominations and so many kinds of Christians. The heathen, as we call him, seems to think that all Christians ought, at least, to have the same name. Strange, isn't it, that the heathen caught this idea before the highly educated, enlightened Christian himself?

Why should there be dozens of different church denominations? I think of numerous causes, but not a single reason, not one. All these numerous denominations ought to be federated and harmonized into one great system, working through one channel, spreading out into the missionary and other various fields of labor.

When the United States Government needed greater efficiency in transportation, it took possession of all the different railroads and merged them into one great system, and, with all the other almost impossible tasks of the war, the purpose was to organize in such a way as to create the least possible loss of time and labor, or waste of money and energy.

The Protestant Church, if it ever expects to perform its mission in the world, will not longer allow the selfish whims and caprices of its members, who, like the Pharisees of old, insist on strictly adhering to the narrow, circumscribed rut in which they have long been going, to block the Church and keep it from accomplishing the great purpose for which Christ came into the world.

I believe the time is coming, yea, near at hand, when the numerous Protestant churches will unite their efforts under one combined system, thus stopping the prodigious waste of both energy and funds.

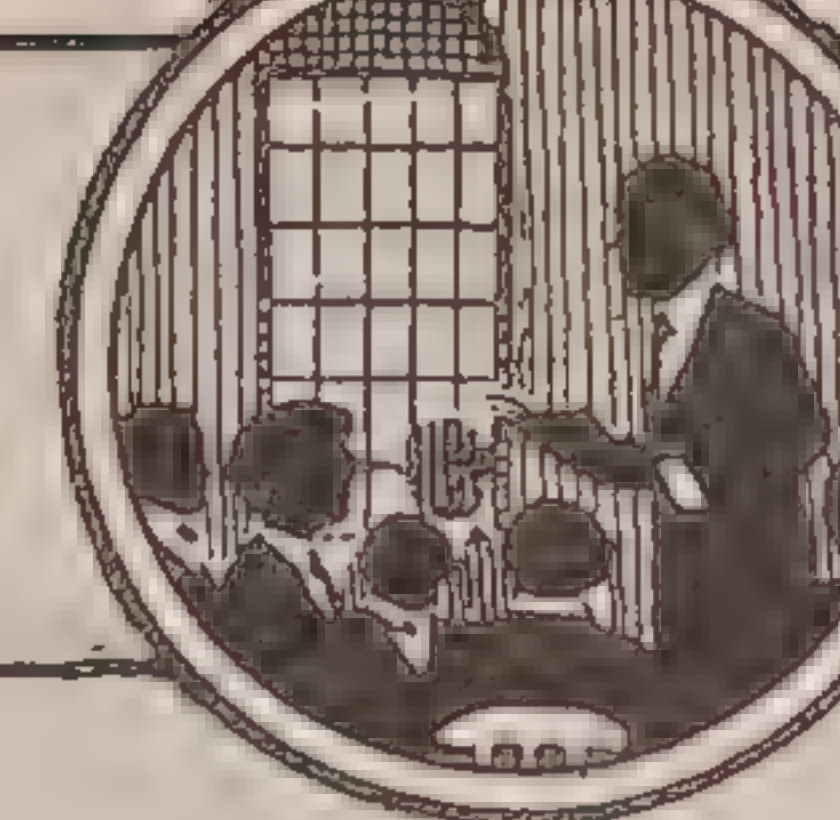
IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL



DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Birth and Childhood of Jesus

International Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 3. Matt. 2: 1-15.

It is a great pleasure to turn for six months to the study of the life and message of Jesus as it is set forth in the good news of the Kingdom of God. The life and words of Jesus never lose their charm and power. However familiar a passage may seem as we begin it, we never end any serious bit of study without making some fresh discovery of truth. So we shall be going over familiar paths during the next six months; but they will lead us to ever more beautiful visions of truth.

1. The World's Quest. This is what the wise men represent. Humanity is yearning and eager for new truth. All that the schools have taught does not completely satisfy that native and urgent desire for truth by which to live, of which we are always conscious. Do you not feel it yourself? What signs of it do you find in history and in the world today? What are the surest and quickest ways in which to arrive at truth? Give some concrete experience by which you feel that you have found truth in Christ. Notice that these different men were seeking a common object. Their common yearnings were greater than any differences that separated them. What does this fact signify in our complex modern life?

2. The Flame of Envy. It is a quick spring from the earnest search for truth on the part of the wise men to the envy anl treachery of Herod. He was selfish. To him only one matter was important, the preservation of his personal power. Like all selfish and envious men, he set himself in opposition to the whole world. He could not consent in any program that would promote the common welfare if it interfered with his own privileges. Envy burned like a destroying fire in his soul when he learned that there was a possibility that he would be compelled to surrender any of his personal authority. He was not jealous to guard the welfare of others; he was concerned only with his personal prestige. How important is the command, "Thou shalt not covet"? Does envy still bar the path of Christ with positive opposition? Give a concrete example from modern American life.

3. God's Use of Common Things. The reason that men were not looking at such a small village as Bethlehem for the coming of the Messiah was because they had forgotten how God uses small things and obscure places for the realization of his plans. Of course the religious and political leaders—and in the time of Jesus they were the same—were looking to the schools and the official classes for their leaders. That is the range of vision that generally marks the privileged groups. And God is always disappointing them by going outside these classes and finding the leaders of his cause in the unexpected place. Give an illustration of this from history. Does this fact have any relation to the prospects of the boys and girls in the small villages in America? What lesson does it bring to those who are inclined to boast of their official position or privilege?

4. Love's Offering. Those gifts laid out before the wondering eyes of Mary stand for the offering that our love ought to be willing to render to Christ. Go over the items of our obligation to Christ. What has he brought to us which evokes our gratitude? Mention knowledge of God, true appreciation of ourselves and of others, courage and comfort, and many other gifts. Now what are we giving back in return for all this to show our love and thankfulness? Mention some of the ways in which we can show our gratitude and devotion. There is our time and personal power to help others, our thought and imagination. What is the best gift that you can think of to render to Christ this coming week? Make it specific and practical.

5. God's Unthwarted Purpose. Herod probably went to sleep that night feeling that he had put up a clever scheme that would work well on the unsuspecting old men who were not used to dealing with politicians. And perhaps he would have worked out his selfish and wicked program if it had not been for one fact that he entirely left out of his reckoning. He forgot God. And God is still engaged with human life. His plans are still the most important item in the whole program of life. Men are strong and clever. But it is God who still lives and reigns. So the wise men fail and the strong men are conquered, while those sincere and trusting souls who ally their lives with God succeed. This is a fact that upsets all our clever programs. The great achievement is to find out the will of God and then work with it, not to shape up a big program and then push it through by sheer human strength. The Herods are always going to sleep satisfied with their clever schemes and waking up in the cold gray morning to find their crafty devices in ruins because God has been at work during the night. When we are once convinced of this it brings us great comfort and joy. It does not make much difference whether or not we are rich and strong; but it makes an infinite difference whether we are working with God or against him.

The Distortion of the Bible

The Bible is a wonderful book. It still exists in spite of much maltreatment by its friends. It teaches Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Episcopal, Dunkard, Holy Roller, Roman Catholic, Christian Science, and Mormon doctrines and the doctrines of all the other sects. At least all these claim to found their teachings upon the Bible and are likely to insist that their teachings are the most important and result from the truest interpretation of the book.

Emphasis and point of view make a deal of difference. If we only take our Old Testament we will find no disapproval of polygamy. If we try to prove certain theories by individual Scripture texts and then literalize, allegorize or spiritualize at will, we can prove from the Bible the pre-millennial second coming, the post-millennial second coming, that Christ is already here, predestination or its opposite, inbred sin, total depravity, universalism or eternal damnation, even infant damnation, and all absurd dogmas of the various so-called Christian sects.

Difference in emphasis and point of view together with difference of method are to a considerable extent responsible for the splitting of Protestantism into a large number of groups and develop such absurd attitudes as that taken by one denomination which refused to give anything to one of its colleges because two of the faculty believed in "alien immersion." It reminds one of the two churches standing on opposite sides of the street in a large city. They were cousins denominationally. Some one asked the difference between them and was told that one believed that Adam was a good man and fell and the other believed that he was a bad man all the time.

> Why is the Bible held responsible for all the hobbies and fantastic, divisive "isms" of the various denominations?
> What false emphasis and point of view have made it teach outrageous things in direct contradiction to the spirit and teaching of Jesus?
> The Bible grew. Thus there is in it that which was outgrown. Failure to recognize this fact and to test all by the spirit and teaching of Jesus are responsible for much of the distortion.

As a result of emphasis and point of view, which give us so much sectarianism, we have all sorts of unseemly denominational competition with a good many over-churched situations, where we profiteer on the community in our endeavor to build up denominations at the expense of the Kingdom of God. At the same time, this waste of energy leaves other needy fields uncared for. As a matter of fact, practically none of the things which divide Protestantism have anything whatever to do with essential Christianity or with our salvation.

What kind of an interpretation of our Bible are we living by? And what kind of an interpretation are we giving to our boys and girls? Are we teaching from our Bible that which is contrary to the essential spirit and teaching of Jesus? Are we denying the Master of our salvation by building again religious points of view which he gave his life to destroy? This book should be the divine charter of human progress. Some people have persisted in interpreting it in such a manner that it palsies thought, develops artificial barriers and sets people to chattering about doctrines which have little value except to turn us away from the real work of building a Kingdom of God in the earth.

How did we ever get into such a situation? And more important, how are we going to get out? Before attempting to answer that question in a direct manner, let us ask ourselves where and how we got our Bible.

The Bible was put in its present written form during a period covering approximately one thousand years. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David and Solomon had no Bible. What these men did have was great experiences with God. They felt his presence; sought to know and do his will. There is no evidence or indication that accounts of these experiences were written down at the time, but they did tell them to other members of their families and to members of the clan. For years and even centuries these accounts of experiences with Jehovah were thus passed on from one generation to another.

You would hardly suppose that these stories were always told in exactly the same words with the same emphasis and for the same purpose. They were human, helpful incitements inspiring those to whom they were told to seek like experiences with Jehovah that they might know and do his will. Not till the seventh to the fifth centuries B. C. did the religion of the Old Testament begin to become the religion of a book and ideas of verbal infallible inspiration begin to make the revelation rigid and correspondingly external and legalistic. Even then the Jews never held to a dead level of inspiration, but placed the law first, the prophets next and the Hagiographa, or writings, as the least highly attested.

Likewise New Testament Christianity was first of all an experience, a way of life, which people talked about and to which they gave loyal allegiance. Jesus, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Paul, and even the early church had no New Testament. There is not the slightest indication that Paul and most of the New Testament writers had any idea that their writings were to become the New Testament and a part of the Bible along with the Old Testament.

The whole thing grew. Jesus lived his marvelous life; taught his matchless message; and sealed both with his death upon the cross. So far as we know, he did not write anything. He did not lay down a lot of rules. He fought literalism and external conformity. He sought to give a new attitude to life, a new inner purpose, a new motive. He seemed to be more interested in persons and life and the contagion of the right kind of life than to give explicit or detailed instructions about things. One almost wonders, as he breathes the free air of the Master's life and message, who could dare to literalize the teachings of the Christ and make an external law where he sought to impart a new inner life.

In the following articles we hope to indicate a way of approach to the Bible which shall discover the great essentials and eliminate devisive non-essentials.

Next week we shall consider Essential Christianity and the Christian, and following that, What is the Bible?

Questions and suggestions are welcomed.

Knowing Your Own Town

By W. H. Morse, M. D.

The girls returned from the Northfield Conference full of missionary ambition. They had listened to inspiring addresses and were eager to offer themselves for the mission field. It made little difference which field, if they might only go. They had graduated from the high school in June, and at that time had very indefinite life plans. The probabilities were in favor of their becoming teachers, and both had cherished ideas of taking the course at the state normal school. Much as they would have liked to go to college, their parents' circumstances would not admit of their doing so, and the normal course was planned to take its place. But after Northfield it was put aside in favor of the missionary enterprise.

"Never mind it!" they said. "Never mind the normal or a training school! Lots of the best missionaries never had either. We have given ourselves to the missionary work, and one of the lecturers said that a consecrated life is what counts. And we are consecrated to it. So!"

The pastor smiled pleasantly, gave them missionary literature, and furnished the addresses of the missionary secretaries. Then he suggested that during the time that they would have to wait for appointments, it would be a good idea to take up a course of reading, religious, classical, and historical. This was pleasing, and forthwith they entered upon it under his instruction. China came nearer to being their objective than any other field, and the historical reading had to do with that country. For the classics Marcus Aurelius was taken. In religious reading the great missionaries of the Bible were studied, and in this connection the life of St. Augustine, who was chosen as a representative early missionary. Although it was the summer vacation season, the reading was fascinating, and was not neglected even for a day. The pastor invited them to come to him at any time and "talk it over;" and they gladly did so. And as they read their missionary aspirations grew.

In due time the missionary secretaries wrote to the pastor concerning the applications. Yes, teachers were wanted, normal graduates, who must first have teaching experience. The minister laid the letter aside. Instead of taking up the matter with the girls, he took up his camera and went forth. One evening, in the following week, he sent for the girls. It was "about the reading course," he said over the phone, that he wanted to talk with them. They came gladly, and for an hour they talked.

"And now," he said after a while, "let me show you some pictures."

Mounted on yellow board, thus giving it the appearance of age, he showed a picture marked "Marcus Aurelius." The girls were delighted. Then another, mounted in the same way, was "Moses, the Lawgiver." Then a third—"Saint Augustine." And a fourth—"Confucius." The girls' delight increased. A Roman, a patriarchal Jew, a Negro, and a Chinaman—four pictures.

"How good of you to get them!" the girls said. "We had often wondered how they really did look."

Placing the pictures in his pocket, the minister suggested a walk. Down on Broad Street, as they strolled along, they stopped in front of a Chinese laundry, and watched a "Charley" ironing. Crossing the street, they came to the shop of a Jewish tailor, where, outside in a chair, sat the tailor's aged uncle. The minister shook hands with the old man, and they passed on. A little further up the street they stopped at the "hot waffles" wagon, where the Negro proprietor sold them some of his "hot eats." Several blocks further on, the minister responded to a bow from a Neapolitan barber who stood in his shop doorway.

"Fine looking fellow!" the minister said.

Then both girls made the same remark.

"He looks like —"

There they interrupted themselves for one to say, "And that old Jew —," and for the other to exclaim, "And the nigger —." Then, both together, "The Charley chink —."

"Well?" the minister asked.

"How much they resemble the pictures you showed us!"

He took the pictures from his pocket, and showed that which was written on the back of each one. "Marcus Aurelius" had "Tony Addio, tonsorial artist." "St. Augustine"—Pete Gunn, Hot Waffles." "Confucius"—"Charley Lee." "Moses"—"Sol Klein, aged 92."

"Their autographs, all except Charley's, which I wrote!" the minister said.

"And they really and truly looked like—" the girls chorused.

"Yes," was the quiet reply. "Aurelius a 'dago,' Confucius a 'chink,' Moses a 'sheeny,' Augustine a 'nigger'! Still with us." Then, "Come back into the study a moment."

On the study table he arranged the pictures. Then he read the secretaries' letters to the girls.

"Oh, oh, oh!" Then, both together: "We will take the normal course! And we will teach, after! And—oh, say, while we are at the normal, and after, can't we—?"

The minister interrupted, "Yes, you can be home missionaries, and get good experience among the brothers and sisters of Marcus Aurelius, Moses, Confucius and Augustine."

At the New Britain (Ct.) State Normal School the two girls are in their second year, and in their room are the four pictures on the wall. At the parish house of the South Congregational Church they are workers in the International School which the Rev. Dr. Ozora S. Davis established when he was pastor of the church, and in the classes they teach the Augustines, Marcus Aureliuses, Confuciuses and Moseses. And the names of the girls will one day be on the list of foreign missionaries.

Pie Plates Furnished

By Mary Davis

"I'd as soon make a pie for you as not," said Mrs. Foster frankly, "but I never get my plate back so I'll give you money instead."

"Yes," chimed in Mrs. Minot, "I imagine there are at least a dozen of my plates in the church kitchen. John is always in such a hurry to get home that he won't let me go into the kitchen and look for them. And if you don't get them that night—" she stopped and waved her capable little hands expressively.

"Well!" said the President of the Ladies' Benevolent Society, and she ceased soliciting for food and went down town and bought fifty pie plates. These are distributed the week before the supper and inevitably come back with a pie on them. It is an idea worth copying as the average woman dislikes to lose her dishes.

Another church society which has a splendid reputation among the men of the town for its suppers, cooks all its food by certain standard recipes. The women of this church are extremely progressive and harmonious. Mrs. Cushing, whose veal loaf was very popular, gave a demonstration in the church kitchen and the women of the society wrote down the rule. Next Mrs. Hammond made one of her lemon pies and a Swedish cook was persuaded to come in and teach her famous salad dressing. The women like the plan and the food is of a uniform grade and excellence.

This church, too, provides for a certain number of people. Each place at the table is numbered and one ticket is sold for that place. The tickets are gobbled up greedily a fortnight ahead. This way of running a church supper is much easier and more satisfactory than letting people sit down at all times. Everybody gets the same amount of food, too.

The women of a third church paid for a new heater in a rather novel way. The Chamber of Commerce was accustomed to have a supper every month. The local caterer was unable to serve the supper one month so the church ladies volunteered to save the day for the town. The Chamber of Commerce liked their supper so well that it asked them to take charge of the supper at a good profit.

The church supper has a place in the church because there is something about eating bread and salt, or rather cake and coffee together, that makes people feel as if they were really acquainted. We modern folks need to realize that the church is just one big family, the way that our pioneer fathers and mothers did. In a city church, where there are many young people who have no home in town, the women serve cocoa and wafers after the evening service. There is such a genuine spirit of friendliness that the extra work and steps on the part of the busy Marthas pay them richly.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Christian Honesty

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 26—Oct. 2

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Rom. 13:1-14.

Is the World an Honest World? The apostle associates dishonesty with darkness. We are to walk honestly, as in the day. The words come after full recognition of obligations in all sorts of directions, toward authority and toward those with whom we live and work. A good test of our honesty is whether what we are doing and paying and giving will bear the light. Now the immediate answer to our question whether this is an honest world is the recollection how widely it is the policy of many people to keep things in darkness. It is difficult, as everybody knows, to buy an honest basket of fruit. It is not difficult for a man like Ponzi to get money out of other people's pockets into his own by offers which do not make clear how the money is to be used. We all know, I suppose, many people whose word on any subject that interests them we expect to discount, ten, twenty, fifty per cent.—all the way up to those whom as the saying is, we would not believe on oath. The world is not all in the darkness of dishonesty, but there are black patches everywhere.

Are We Honest with Others? We have to face that situation of dishonesty in the world and as followers of Christ we have to face it with our own unquestionable honesty. And the root of that is in a complete recognition of the rights of others. It is all "briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The only way we can get perspective for an honest vision is in complete detachment from ourselves. That is a part of our witness in the world. Did all Christians walk in the light of a complete honesty it would immeasurably raise the standard of respect for the church and make its witness effective.

Are We Honest with Ourselves? Honesty of conduct comes out of an honest heart. And an honest Christian heart has no concealments to itself. One trouble with us is that we do not tell the truth to our own selves about ourselves. We lack humility, for one thing, and are very unwilling to face anything that shows us up to ourselves in an unworthy attitude. We cover up actions which we find easy or profitable in the darkness of refusal to consider and test them. The way of self-examination may sometimes lead to a morbid conscience if it is self-regarding only. But we need to test our thoughts and words and acts in the clear light of the second of the great commandments.

The Practical Difficulties of Honesty. We must not think that honesty is easy, especially at first. The set of the current in which we are afloat may be heavily against us. It may require a pretty complete overturning of habits and character to "walk in the light." But it not only pays, it transforms. It pays even in competition with dishonesty. We all try to avoid a liar in trade. We all like to deal with people who tell us the truth. The difficulties are there; but they are part of the adventure and the education of Christian faith and must be faced and overcome.

CHRIST IN THE HEART

If any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with me.—Rev. 3:20.

Christ is so related now to the souls of them that receive him, that he is present with them in all places, at all times, bearing witness with their spirits in guidance and holy society; a friend, a consoler, a glorious illuminator, all that he would or could be if we had him, each to himself in outward company.—Horace Bushnell.

His righteousness does not merely mean righteousness like his, but his own very righteousness. We must receive himself into our hearts, and then his righteousness will spring up within us and overflow all our doings.—F. J. A. Hort.

Turn in, my Lord, turn in to me,
  My heart's a homely place;
But thou canst make corruption flee
  And fill it with thy grace;
So furnished it will be brave,
  And a rich dwelling thou shalt have.
—Christ Church, Ms., in A. H. Bullen's "More Lyrics from the Song-Booke of the Elizabethan Age."

The best answer any one of us can make when questioned for proof of the Resurrection of the Lord is the humble, but irrefutable, one: "Christ liveth in me."—J. Stuart Holden.

There is no man whatever that hath any want in reference to the things of God, but Christ will be to him, that which he wants—whether it be life, or light, power or joy, all is wrapped up in him.—John Owen.

The opening of the heart is man's, the entering into it is his. He enters the spirit home the moment its doors are thrown open, bringing with him spiritual entertainment. The guest becomes the host, for when Christ comes he comes as a King, bringing his own rich entertainment with him, and sharing it with us.—James M. Campbell.

O thou, true Light of the morning and the evening, shine upon our souls and dispel our darkness. When the day dawns, may we awake with thee. In work and pleasure go with us that we may refer all questions to thy wisdom and know thy rejoicing in all that we enjoy. Gird us for toil. Keep us from lassitude. Enrich us with patience. Let our courage be full of cheer and the light of laughter come to rest our minds. When the day is over and we turn to rest, afford us some sweet thoughts of thy loving kindness and some lively hopes of overcoming by thine aid. O thou who hast prepared the rest that remaineth for the people of God, let our sleep of the night become a foretaste of that refreshment and our work a preparation for its joyful service. Blessed be thou by whom we live, in the morning and at noon and at eventide, forevermore! Amen.

—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

To Love and Serve

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 3-9

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Our Church Privileges and Obligations. Ps. 84:1-12. (Consecration meeting).

Light from the Bible Passage

The writer of this Psalm was hungry for his church. How hungry the first two verses show. Whether he represented many people we do not know. Undoubtedly a larger per cent. than of our people today. To him it meant life, refuge, worship, strength, rare delight, unique gifts. He rejoiced that he might dwell in the church. It was the place where he took his joys and his sorrows. There he especially found the God who answers our prayers. To him it was not alone a place for worship but one where he could also serve. even it it be no more than as a doorkeeper. From it he got the inspiration for his daily life, the characteristic of which is that he walked uprightly and carried himself in a righteous way.

Leads for the Leader

The closest point of contact Endeavorers have with the Kingdom is through their own church. The society was founded with that idea uppermost. It was never intended to stand or live or work apart from its own church, but in it. This meeting gives us a chance to set this idea out again in strong relief, and then think and pray ourselves into better achievements along this line.

Our privileges are in part:

1. It gives a place for united worship. What is its value over private?

2. Also for united inspiration. The value of communion of ideas and ideals.

3. For united good will. How much more comes through this?

Our obligations:

1. Loyalty in attendance, in "advertising," in support as far as we can.

2. Service (1) in the church itself. Young life in action makes a church go. (2) In the broader interests in the community. (3) In doing something for your church in the country and in the world.

Thoughts for Members

Many have died for the church. The call of the hour is for millions to live for it.

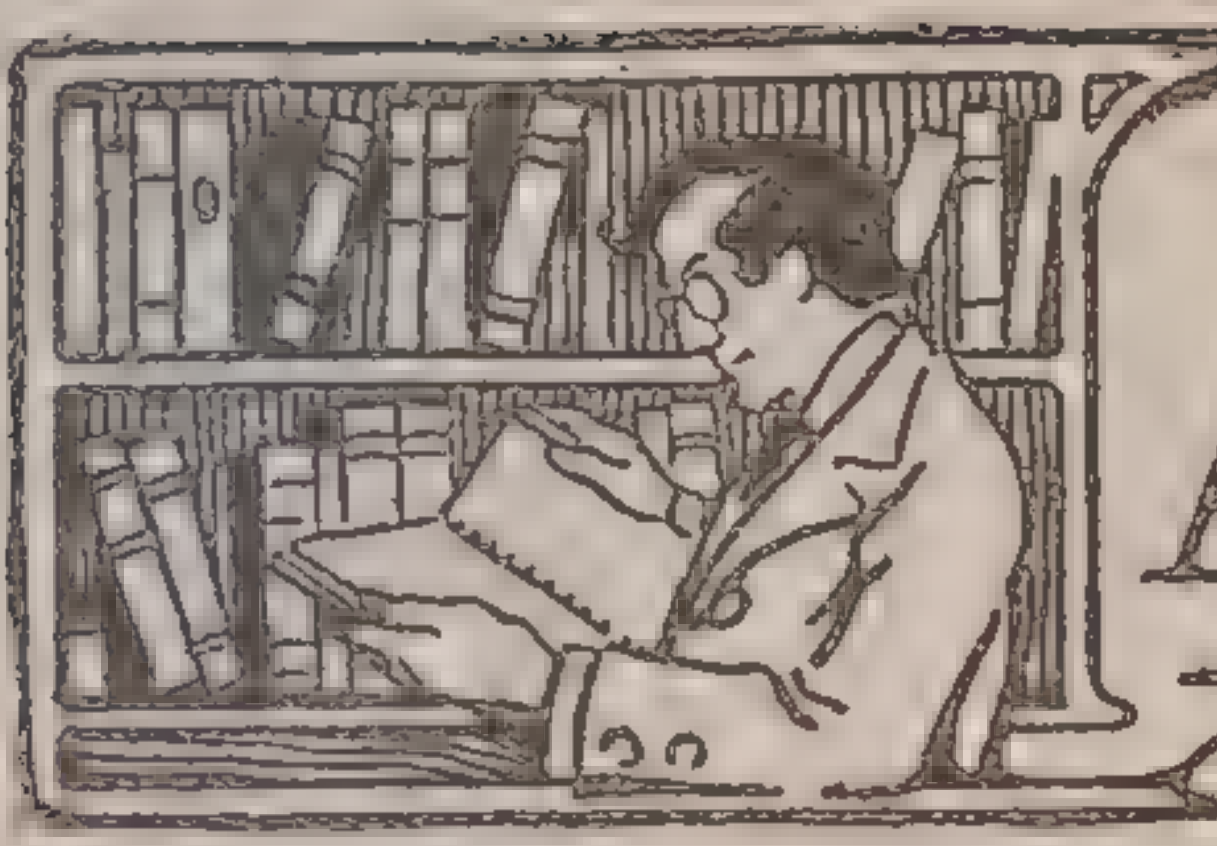
My contributions of love and gift and service may be small, but are they made with a single heart and mind?

If my church is "dead," what have I, as an Endeavorer, done to bring it back to life? Anything more than to be a "knocker"?

"What is needed is not a new church but a new spirit among its members," wrote a soldier from the front.

A Moment of Prayer

O Father, teach me, who am always ready to sing "I love thy church, O God," to do the things that will truly show my love. Through me may others who care less become concerned afresh with the church which our Master gave to the world. In his name. Amen.



AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Concerning America

THE RAILROAD BUILDERS, by JOHN MOODY, and THE MASTERS OF CAPITAL, by JOHN MOODY (Yale University Press). These are volumes 38 and 41 in the admirable Chronicles of America series. The first volume tells entertainingly the wonderful story of the development of the great lines of railway, beginning with a brief introduction on the century as a whole and then in successive chapters describing the history of the New York Central, the Great Pennsylvania System, the Erie Railroad, and the transcontinental lines. It closes with a discussion of the American Railway Problem. The second volume deals with the questions of High Finance, The Rise of the House of Morgan, The Iron Masters, Standard Oil and Wall Street, The Steel Trust Merger, Wall Street and the World War, etc. Both volumes review the building up of colossal enterprises and the making of enormous fortunes in the most spectacular period of the development of the country. Little or nothing is said of the ethics of methods employed. Both volumes are well illustrated with maps and portraits.

THE COLLEGE AND NEW AMERICA, by JAY WILLIAM HUDSON (Appleton). To find out what we Americans really intend to make of this American order—to make this the supreme motive of our entire educational system—to subordinate the old idea of scholarship and the new tendency to vocationalism. These phrases express the purpose of the series of studies on our present educational needs. One of the great, persistent purposes of the founders of this nation has been the establishment of educational privileges. Corresponding to that must arise the sense of duty and training in its performance. Some hindrances are described but most of the book is devoted to the question of what the American ideals really are and what the colleges may do to promote them. In these days of world gloom it is good to read that "the two chief American virtues are optimism and courage." Even better is the hope that "true education may yet mean the reasonable transfiguration of life, morally and religiously."

THE CONSTITUTION AND WHAT IT MEANS TODAY, by EDWARD S. CORWIN (Princeton University Press). This little book contains the complete text of the United States Constitution with the Amendments up to date and the author gives an explanation of the meaning and scope of every passage that is in the least obscure. The important court decisions and popular practice in relation to the various subjects referred to are thus indicated, in brief, handy reference form.

OCCASIONAL PAPERS AND ADDRESSES OF AN AMERICAN LAWYER, by HENRY W. TAFT (Macmillan). A collection of able and illuminating discussions of important subjects, largely political, by a distinguished lawyer, brother of ex-President Taft.

DARKWATER, by W. E. B. DU BOIS (Harcourt, Brace & Howe). A collection of brilliant, poetic and tragic studies and sketches on the race problem, revealing much of the author's own experience and suffering as a sensitive, high-minded colored American.

HISTORY OF JOURNALISM IN THE UNITED STATES, by GEORGE HENRY PAYNE (Appleton). The story of newspaper progress in this country from its beginning to the present day, introducing the great journalists and the events and causes with which they have had to do.

THE RED CONSPIRACY, by JOSEPH J. MERETO (National Historical Society). An attack on radicalism, consisting mainly of quotations from The Call, The Appeal to Reason, The Social Democratic Herald, The Eye Opener, and other Socialist organs, together with extracts from press reports of public utterances by certain labor leaders. Some chapters are devoted to conditions in Russia, Germany and other European nations, but mainly the author desires to warn Americans of the movement at home to overthrow the Government by rebellion.

MY NEIGHBOR THE WORKINGMAN, by JAMES ROSCOE DAY (Abingdon Press). Chancellor Day has a caustic pen as well as a facile tongue. He claims to be a friend to the workingman but he certainly does score "the blind guides who have spoiled his unions by plotting to use them for selfish purposes."

AMERICAN DEMOCRACY VERSUS PRUSSIAN MARXIANISM, by CLARENCE F. BIRDSEYE. (Revell). A strong argument for the theory that Marxian socialism is Prussianism.

For Boys and Girls

THE MYSTERY OF THE SEA-LARK, by RALPH HENRY BARBOUR and H. P. HOLT (Century). A first-class boy's story. Jack Holden buys a sloop that had been cast ashore in a storm and deserted. He repairs the boat and devises a scheme for earning money. The plan works well but certain unprepossessing appearing men, for some mysterious reason, hang around the boat and make much trouble. The mystery is eventually solved satisfactorily. Not all was clear sailing. One terrific storm is well described. Any boy, especially one who loves the water, will greatly enjoy this story.

MR. FRIEND-O'-MAN, by JAY T. STOCKING (Interchurch World Movement). A delightful book for children from six to twelve, and for their elders. In it, in story form, Mr. Wise-and-Wonder-Man teaches Queery-Queer why one should go to church, who are "the Best People," whose names should go on the city's Honor Roll, and various other lessons involving right standards. It is admirably done.

HERO STORIES OF FRANCE, by EVA MARCH TAPPAN (Houghton Mifflin). A thrilling review of the great events in the history of France, told in a series of chapters on its heroes, from Vercingetorix, who fought against Cæsar, Saint Denis the missionary who brought Christianity, Clovis the first king, Charles Martel, Pepin, Charlemagne, Roland to Lafayette, Napoleon and Foch.

BOBBY AND THE BIG ROAD, by MAUD LINDSAY (Lothrop, Lee and Shepard). A book for the very youngest readers. It describes life in the country, the squirrels and rabbits and birds and trees and flowers, playmates and interesting experiences of a small boy. It is beautifully illustrated with full-page colored pictures.

THE GIRL WHO SAT BY THE ASHES, by PADRAIC COLUM (Macmillan). An Irish Cinderella story told with the literary charm of a prince of story-tellers, working in the beautiful folk lore with which his country abounds. The volume is richly and abundantly illustrated with pictures of exceptional artistic merit.

WHEN I WAS A BOY IN PERSIA, by YOUEL B. MIRZA (Lothrop, Lee and Shepard). The author, a Persian, served in the United States Navy during the Great War. After receiving his discharge he wrote this little volume telling the story of his own boyhood in the far-away land where he was born, describing the habits, customs and mode of living of his own people. It is well written, well illustrated and will doubtless be as well enjoyed as any volume in this admirable series.

WHEN I WAS A BOY IN SCOTLAND, by GEORGE MCPHERSON HUNTER (Lothrop, Lee and Shepard). The author was born in Glasgow but is now a clergyman in Delaware. He describes pleasantly his boyhood days, games, holidays, queer customs, stories from Scotch history and much else which all boys and girls will enjoy reading about the beautiful and interesting land from which he came.

THE MAN OF TOMORROW, by CLAUDE RICHARDS (Crowell). A book for the boy who is thoughtful and ambitious to make the most of his life. First it shows clearly the great advantage of laying a broad foundation, keeping at school as long as possible. Then it describes briefly but attractively the various vocations which may be open before him and aids him in making a choice.

ELIJAH, by E. B. TRIST (Macmillan). The Story of Elijah told for children. The work is exceedingly well done, the type is large and there are numerous excellent illustrations, some of them full page and colored.

Some Little Books

THE NURSERIES OF HEAVEN, by G. VALE OWEN (Dutton). A book of selections from spiritualistic literature for the comfort of bereaved parents.

THE CHURCH AND THE COMMUNITY, by RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER (Interchurch World Movement). Home Mission study.

THE VACATION RELIGIOUS DAY SCHOOL, by HAZEL STRAIGHT STAFFORD (Abingdon Press). A handbook for teachers in a thoroughly graded vacation school.

THE RELIGION OF JUDAH, by JOHN BAYNE ASCHAM (Abingdon Press). A companion volume to the Religion of Israel, this begins with Rehoboam and traces the history of Judah through the Maccabean period.

METHODS OF CHURCH SCHOOL ADMINISTRATION, by HOWARD JAMES GEE (Revell). A valuable handbook of advice for organizing and administering the larger Bible schools.

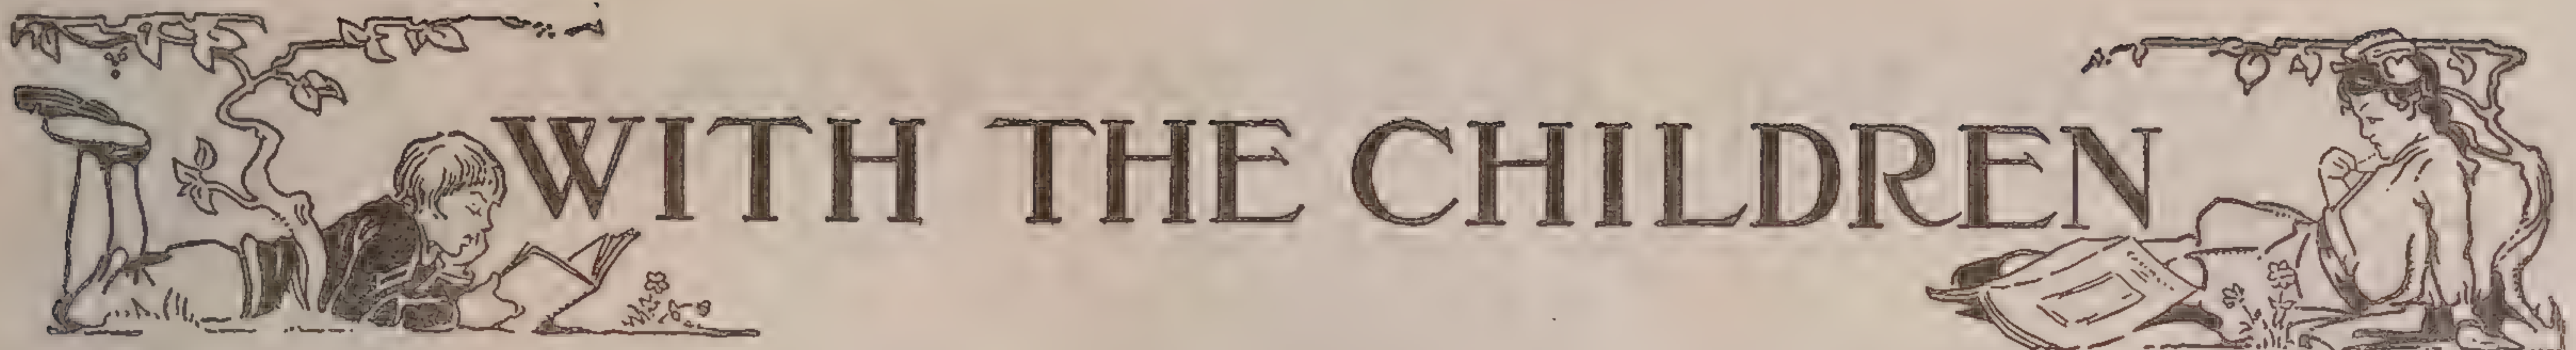
THE CHARM OF FINE MANNERS, by MRS. HELEN EKIN STARRETT (Lippincott). "A series of letters to a daughter" by a former principal of a school for girls.

HANDBOOK OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, by WILLIAM H. BARTLETT (Crowell). A standard book, brought up to date. It explains our form of government, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and its Amendments.

HANDBOOK OF BUSINESS ENGLISH, by GEORGE BURTON HOTCHKISS and EDWARD J. KILDUFF (Harpers). A revised edition of a guide for business correspondence.

THE LISTENER'S GUIDE TO MUSIC, by PERCY A. SCHOLES (Oxford University Press). A book for readers who "do not know a thing about music," giving them in untechnical terms information about how a composer works, the principle of design in music, the sonata or symphony, program music, the orchestra and its instruments, etc.

POLITICAL SUMMARY OF THE UNITED STATES, by ERNEST FLETCHER CLYMER (Dutton). A handy volume of tabulated facts concerning the origin of parties, biographies of presidents, and votes at presidential elections.



WITH THE CHILDREN

The Mayflower Cat

By Anna Deming Gray

PART I.

In the first place, it was only as large as a good-sized kitten, and in the next place, it was not a real live cat at all, but a doorstop, which had belonged to Mr. Abner Morton's grandfather.

Nancy Patience Palmer lived at the end of the same street where Mr. Abner Morton's old, many-windowed house stood, in Plymouth town. And this story has quite as much to do with Mr. Abner, and his sister Charity as it does with Nancy and the cat. Since long before Nancy was born, Mr. Abner had lived in the old house with its many windows, and its wonderful flower garden at the back. Indeed, she sometimes wondered, if when the Pilgrims had landed on the great Rock which she could see when she swung on the gate and looked down toward the Bay, they had not even then, found Mr. Abner there in the old house, with its flaming garden of flowers.

The friendship had begun when Nancy was only three years old, and the flower garden began it. Mr. Abner lived with his twin sister Charity, in the home where their father and grandfather before them had lived. He was a stooped, little old man, with a face like a winesap apple, and sharp, twinkling eyes. The children of Plymouth town were a little afraid of him, in spite of the twinkle in his eyes, for they had heard it said that Mr. Abner was getting "queer."

His flowers were his greatest pride and no one was allowed to tend or pick them but himself, not even Miss Charity. As for Nancy, she was not in the least afraid of him, for she loved flowers herself, and when the other little girls, playing in the wide shade of the linden trees, would run away when he came thumping by with his cane, she always stood her ground and smiled up at him as he went thumping by.

And then one morning, peeping through the garden fence, she found that the golden marigold had come into a perfect riot of bloom over night. She wriggled her fat little body under the picket fence, and there being no one in sight to ask, she gathered her hands as full of the flowers as they would hold, and wriggling back under the gate, ran home to give them to her mother.

And she had not the least idea that all the while Mr. Abner was watching from the back window. You may imagine what a commotion was started when she reached home!

Her father was a deacon in the Plymouth Meeting-house and a stern man, built after the severe pattern of his Pilgrim forefathers, and when she told him that Mr. Abner had too many flowers in his garden—so many that they were crowding over each other—he only looked at her very hard over his glasses, and said, "The human tongue is full of deceit, and the heart conceiveth evil. I will take you to Pastor William and see what had best be done." And Nancy, near tears, felt that she was in a very bad way indeed.

"Nay, William Palmer," said her mother gently, "the wiser plan would be to send the child back to Abner Morton with the flowers, that she may confess her sin."

And back trudged little three-year-old Nancy, and though the glowing sunshine of an early August morning was all about her and the blue waves were dancing down in the Bay and the birds of Plymouth town were singing in the trees, she saw very little of the beauty about her.

When she reached Mr. Abner's house, the garden gate stood wide open as if waiting for her, and Mr. Abner himself was cutting great bunches of flowers. She told her story in a faltering voice, and with her curly head bent so low that he could hardly hear her. And though he said only a few words in answer, in the child's heart was born that day a respect and an understanding for the rights of other people, which she never forgot. He took back the yellow marigold and gave her a bunch of late roses to take to her mother. This was ever so long ago, when Nancy was only three, and now she was almost eight, but they had been fast friends ever since.

Miss Charity was gone now, and Mr. Abner, much older and much more feeble, still lived in the old house and tended his garden. But times were very different with him now, for all he had left was the old house.

His friends of Plymouth Meeting-house looked after his needs, and Nancy's mother, from her home farther down the street, often sent her with a loaf of bread or a baked custard for his supper, but it was whispered about that he was more "queer" than ever, now that Miss Charity was gone. It was said that he dug in his garden, even after dark and his old lantern had been seen bobbing up and down long after nightfall.

He would sit almost all day by the window, brooding and looking out toward the blue waters of the bay and Duxbury, where the tall white shaft above the grave of Miles Standish on Captain's Hill seemed to be watching over the harbor. Sometimes Nancy sat on a little stool at his feet, while he told her tales of the early days of Plymouth, and of how the great linden trees which the children loved were brought from England when they were tiny twigs and planted there. The one at the far end of the street was planted by Mr. Abner's grandfather when he was a child no older than Nancy, and had always been known as the "Morton Linden."

But her favorite story was the one about the Morton strong box. In it was kept the seven hundred dollars in gold, left by Mr. Abner's grandfather to Abner and his sister Charity. He always got so excited when he told this story that he would thump on the bare floor with his cane, until all the dishes on the highboy would fairly rattle. "Charity was powerful set in her way—a Morton, through and

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

Our little game of hunting up a misspelled word in The Congregationalist has undoubtedly stirred some of our Comrades to watch and see whether there are others. Margaret Anderson of East Orange, N. J., is one of these and she found in one of the advertisements recently a man's name spelled "Earnest," but states, "I have seen it spelled 'Ernest.'" Of course both of these are used. I happen to know some one whose name is spelled in the latter way and he is very much troubled when some one spells it the first way. Perhaps he doesn't wish to be considered as being an example of the word. They may expect too much of him. By the way, do you live up to the meaning of your name? Unless it is most unusual, you will find it defined in a list in the back of the dictionary.

Are you getting tired of names? Some of our Comrades apparently are not, for Martha J. Haywood of Keene, N. H., sends in an unusual list "of names of children in one family, all of whom were baptized by my father during his pastorate of fifty-six years. Five were baptized at one service." Now the names are these: Cloris Manlius, Cornelia Lestine, Ralsamon De Witt, Rondo Remon, Ulric Adzera, Anza Meronius, Clerus Shuebiah, Marion Wiltshire, Conrad Rodolphus." I wonder if they were all called in the morning by their full names.

The pleasant little note from this Comrade says, "I knew Mr. Martin, your predecessor, and my brother, Samuel Burnham, was one of the editors of The Congregationalist, at one time taking Dr. Dexter's place when the latter was abroad."

Well, when is the best time to kill a mosquito?

I thought some one might suggest that it is best to let the "skeeter" fill up and then kill him. They used to tell me that when I was a boy. Still I never quite enjoyed the experience, even though the bite was certain not to swell up and itch! I did not feel very pleasant about letting her pull out my valuable blood that way and I never found that it worked the way they said it would.

Comrade Susie T. Taplin of East Corinth, Vt., says, "Before they hatch, if possible." From Groton, N. H., Comrade Lucy Sanborn writes: "My grandmother thinks that the best time to kill a mosquito is before it spawns. I quite agree with her but I don't know how to tell whether a mosquito has spawned or not, so it is about as bad as before. In June or July they bother the most here, so I suppose we should take more care of swamps and such places during the spring so that the mosquitoes will be killed before they are big enough to bite."

These two Comrades are on the right track. The "best time" is before they hatch into full-sized and full-armed villains. They are born in moist places—swamps and stagnant pools and the like. Nowadays big efforts are being made to fill up and clean up such places. Tin cans and bottles, rain barrels and old boxes, are just the sort of "cradles" they like. Hollows in trees and stumps are breeding places, too, and open cesspools. Spreading kerosene on the water does the job but my! the expense at the present price of the kerosene! The experts tell us that a campaign of doing away with these breeding spots is the only "best way" to get rid of these troublous creatures. Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts can do much in this way.

The best time to kill a mosquito, then, is before he, or she, is one.

Next week I am going to announce the winners of our "Beast, Bird and Fish Contest," and also give a few of the lists sent in. They have all been interesting.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

IN THE CONGREGATIONAL CIRCLE

How They Do It

An Exchange of Methods in Church Work

Effective Use of Bulletin Board

The public will read display signs. If it were not so, the advertising world would not use them. If they are out of the ordinary in form or location or subject matter, they will get more attention. People are curious and people will read. Here is an opportunity for the church in giving its message. Instead of using the bulletin board merely to carry announcements, make it also a wayside pulpit, preaching a constant message.

Following out this idea, NORTH, BERKELEY, CAL., Rev. R. B. Larkin, pastor, makes the bulletin board a definite part of the preaching activity of the church life. It is a large display board, standing seven feet and more in height, its posts solidly set in cement. It is designed to arrest the attention of the passers-by and constantly to present a vital message. This is usually in the form of editorials, both original and quoted, which seek to say in a pointed manner things the church wants to say to the community. The results of the experiment are encouraging. The editorials are read with interest. People get the habit of looking for them.

The board stands almost immediately at the inner edge of the pavement. Typewritten matter is easily read. Many people will stop and read and think who rarely or never enter a church. It seems to be an effective way of getting a message to them. It is the aim to have the subject matter vital and forceful and sympathetic, with the hope that it may be a means of disarming prejudice among a class that has little idea of what we are talking about inside the church. It is aimed to have the subject chosen cover a wide range of human thought, whether spiritual, ethical, social, economic or scientific.

The following is typical of the editorials presented:

What is God to You?

A Guess? A Hypothesis? A Hope? Or an Experienced Reality?

If God is to you only a guess or a theory, it will not do you very much good. Do not rest until you have reached certainty through personal experience.

The first and fundamental requirement is sincerity—utter, downright, unmixed sincerity.

A man has achieved an enormous victory within himself when he achieves sincerity.

When a man is wholly sincere, he is wholly obedient to all the light he has.

And when he is obedient to the light he has, the light increases and floods his soul.

People do not relish being told that they are insincere.

They do not like insincerity in others and they do not want to believe that they themselves are guilty of it.

And yet it may be that there is more darkness in men's souls and more doubt and more distress and more moral defeat through insincerity than from any other cause.

Because men do not play fair.

They do not play fair with truth. They see it but do not obey it.

And that is insincerity.

They do not play fair with God. They believe in him but do not obey him.

And that is insincerity.

Jesus said, "If any man wills to do his will he shall know of the teaching."

An Easter Sunrise Service

Just as during the war Greenwich, Ct., led New England in being the first town to begin noon-day prayers for the soldiers, with the ringing of the church bells and town bell, so it is the first town in New England, as far as we know, to have the unique Easter Sunrise Service with the trumpet playing from the church spire at sunrise, and the people singing Easter hymns among the graves of the churchyard. This year was the third annual service, which has greatly endeared itself to the church people of the community. It is such a service as is observed in many English churches, and at old Oxford University, and has also been held among the Moravians at Bethlehem, Pa., for many generations, and in California.

The trumpeter began to play from the spire of the Congregational church just as the sun began to rise over the eastern hills. This was at 5.33 A. M. He played Handel's air from the Messiah, "I know that my Redeemer lives," once to the east, then to the west, then to the north, and finally to the south. The people, gathered at the foot of the spire among the graves of the churchyard, and near the monuments of Dr. Joel Linsley and Dr. Walter M. Barrows, former beloved pastors of the church, were led in the Scripture, prayers and meditations by Dr. Oliver Huckel, and special jubilant Easter hymns were sung by all. These hymns included, "Rise, glorious Conqueror, rise, into the native skies," "For all the saints who from their labors rest"—(in memory of the departed)—and "Christ, the Lord, is risen today, Alleluia!" The ancient Easter morning greeting was given by the minister, "The Lord is risen," and the response by the people, "The Lord is risen indeed."

The public generally was invited to this service on Easter morning, following the gospel example: "And very early in the morning, before it was day, they came." It was arranged that in case of stormy weather, the service would be held in the memorial chapel of the church which has the beautiful Tiffany mosaic of the Angel of the Resurrection.

Poet's Evening

NORTH COLLINS, N. Y., Rev. A. J. Miller, pastor, has tried the plan of having a poet's evening on the last Sunday night of each month and has found the arrangement successful. The topic is the religious ideas of the poet in question. Mr. Miller, who was formerly a professional reader, then gives a reading. The response of the young people has been especially encouraging.

Fathers and Sons in the Ministry

"BLOOD WILL TELL"

The Blomfields

REV. FRANK BLOMFIELD

REV. STANLEY F. BLOMFIELD

After varied experiences in England, Canada and the United States, Rev. Frank Blomfield is now continuing his life of service as pastor of the church at Berlin, Vt. A year ago Mr. and Mrs. Blomfield celebrated their golden wedding anniversary and had the pleasure of having with them on that occasion their six sons and daughters, all of whom were born in England but who early in life came with their parents to America. Here they were given a college education, five of them at Olivet and one at Kalamazoo.

The elder Blomfield as a young man commenced training for the Christian ministry but was forced to relinquish for a time his hope of a college course and devote himself to business. Later, however, he was ordained in a lumber town in Michigan, where he served for several years. He held pastorates in several other towns in that state, his last charge there being at Highland Park, Muskegon. He then removed to Montpelier, Vt., and preached for a while in East Barre, in 1910 accepting a call to the Berlin church which he now serves.

Stanley F. Blomfield also felt the compelling call of the ministry and was trained for this work at Olivet College and Yale Seminary. He was born near London, England, but crossed the Atlantic while still a youth. He has held pastorates at Boulevard Church, Detroit, Mich., Stony Creek and Woodbury, Ct., and Montpelier, Vt. He is now pastor of the church at Easthampton, Mass.

Bethel Pastor Married

Rev. F. R. Dixon, pastor of BETHEL, and Miss Madeline E. Halford of Pittsfield, Mass., were married Aug. 17. Mr. Dixon is under engagement for missionary work at Mt. Silinda, Africa, but the time of his service is uncertain and he will continue at Bethel for the present. Mrs. Dixon was graduated from Middlebury College last year and is an accomplished violinist.

Pastor's Ford Car Stolen

On the night of July 4 a thief entered the barn of Rev. C. R. Hamlin of CORNWALL and stole his Ford car, and no trace of it has been found. It had just been overhauled at an expense of more than $100. An effort is being made by friends in the parish to purchase another car for his use.

Derby Also Remembers Pastor's Wife

FEDERATED, DERBY, has increased the salary of the pastor, Rev. F. E. Davison, $200 and in addition the Ladies' Aid Society has pledged $120 to be paid to the pastor's wife.

Raise Fund in Memory of Organist

Eleven young people united with WEST GLOVER in July. A gift of $200 has been received as a memorial fund for Miss Clara Young, former organist of the church.

Gift for Northfield Church

An electric motor for the organ has been recently installed at NORTHFIELD. The church has received a gift of $1,000 from C. M. Davis, the income from which will be used to care for the church grounds.

Whiting Makes Repairs on Parsonage

The parsonage at WHITING is undergoing repairs, including a new piazza, cement walk and other necessary improvements. The pastor, Rev. B. L. Chase, is holding afternoon services at Leicester with encouraging results.

Wilmington Has Old Home Week

Old Home Week, an event held once in 10 years, beginning in 1890, was celebrated this year by WILMINGTON. About 500 former residents of the town were registered. A former pastor, Rev. W. A. Estabrook, now of Brimfield, Mass., preached the sermon of the occasion, and Rev. J. D. King of Rupert gave an address in memory of the five men who lost their lives in the World War. The first man born in the town, Rev. Zedekiah Swift, born in 1771, became a minister. Seven other men born between that date and 1812 entered the Congregational or Presbyterian ministry.

New Pastor for Stowe

Rev. C. E. Hayward, who recently resigned the pastorate of North Troy, has begun work with STOWE. Three denominations have united at Stowe, so that there will be but one community church in the town, and the prospects for community work are encouraging.

The three Puffed Grains form the greatest foods one can imagine. The texture is dainty—bubble-like, crumbling at a touch. The flavor is nut-like. Blending with cream there is nothing so delicious.

The three grains supply variety. The ways of serving are endless. And, unlike most good things, their use need never be restricted.

Bicentennial at Oxford

First, Oxford, Rev. C. F. Luther, pastor, celebrated Aug. 29 the 200th anniversary of the founding of the church. Under the brightest of summer skies and with every circumstance favoring, nearly a thousand people gathered on the lawn in front of the church to witness a commemorative pageant written and directed by the present pastor.

Congregational Church, Oxford, Mass.

Oxford shares with many other towns of this section the honor of having been visited by John Eliot preaching to the Nipmuck Indians. In 1674 Eliot came to Oxford and this event was the subject of the opening episode of the pageant. The town is unique in having been the location of a settlement planted by the Huguenots when they were driven from France at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, making it in the estimate of Oliver Wendell Holmes second only to Plymouth in point of early historical interest. The permanent English settlement dates from 1714, and consisted of 30 families from Framingham. These events were presented in the second episode.

The main part of the pageant represented the efforts of the English settlers to secure a minister for the young settlement and the circumstances of the "laying in" of the foundation. Oxford church and town are alike fortunate in having complete and detailed records of the early years, so that the writer of the pageant took the opportunity offered of clothing the several events in the language of the period, and in many cases, in the exact language of the actors of two hundred years ago. Leading characters were impersonated by members of the church, not a few of them direct descendants and in some cases bearing the family names. Episodes three and four presented the action of the settlers in securing a minister, following closely the church and town records in language, personnel and incident. In the scene depicting the signing of the covenant, the ministers present from Mendon and Woodstock, Ct., were represented by the pastor, Rev. C. F. Luther, and the present pastor of Woodstock, Rev. F. B. Harrison.

A fifth episode in lighter vein depicted the coming of the bride of Rev. John Campbell. About 75 characters were in the cast, the chief part of Capt. Richard Moore being taken by Mr. A. F. Putnam, and that of Lieut. John Town by Mr. Homer S. Joslin. The exact anniversary date will be Jan. 18, 1921, and other exercises will be held at that time. The presentation of the pageant marked the date of the acceptance of the church's call by John Campbell, its first minister. F. D. T.

Missionary Messages at Worthington

Possessing the strength of the hills is Worthington in Western Massachusetts. When the pastor enters his pulpit there he has a special right to announce the hymn, "On the mountain's top appearing." This has been a delightful summer's season, and the pastor, Dr. N. I. Jones, has found a summer assembly right at his church door. An interesting missionary meeting was held on the church lawn Aug. 26. Lunch was served by the Ladies' Society, and was followed by addresses by Dr. William Vincent, who told of work in Siam; Dr. Weld, who brought tidings from India; Dr. Pyke, who represented a China mission; and Dr. Merrill, president of Aintab College, who has just returned from Turkey. The arrangements were in charge of Mrs. Stevenson, wife of Dr. J. R. Stevenson, president of Princeton Seminary. Dr. Stevenson has his summer home in Worthington, as have also Dr. Allison of New York, and his son, who is pastor of a Presbyterian church in Bridgeport, Ct., all of whom have occupied the pulpit with the pastor of the local church on recent Sundays. Dr. Jones began his pastorate in Worthington last spring.

Mr. Hanscom came to Lewis Ave. in November, 1913, from Pilgrim, Providence, succeeding Dr. R. J. Kent. During his first year 100 new members were received into the church and the membership has remained at about 1,000, in spite of the great changes which have taken place in the neighborhood during the last seven years. IS PREACHING FUTILE?

Dr. Lyman Abbott, in the "Outlook," says:

"JOHN SPARGO, the most spiritually minded of modern Socialists, has contributed to The Christian Century, of Chicago, an article entitled, 'The Futility of Preaching.' I wish that this article might be reprinted in leaflet form and sent to every preacher, Protestant or Roman Catholic, orthodox, liberal or Jewish, not because I agree with it, for I do not; but because it presents with great clearness and in an admirable spirit the reason why so many men and women of fine ethical ideas and genuine religious spirit do not attend our church services."

Mr. Spargo's widely discussed article, together with three honor replies to him chosen from more than sixty manuscripts, Mr. Spargo's reply to his critics, and Doctor Abbott's article in the "Outlook" will be reprinted as a supplement of The Christian Century of Sept. 30. Copies of this issue and of two subsequent issues will be sent free to any minister in the United States, not now a subscriber. Others, not ministers, may accept this offer for 35c.

church was paid off soon after Mr. Hanscom took charge, and the benevolences have increased nearly 100 per cent.

At the outbreak of the war, Mr. Hanscom felt the call for some active service and upon the resignation of Dr. S. P. Cadman as chaplain of the 23d Regiment—later a part of the 27th Div., U. S. A.—he was appointed his successor and was commissioned on May 1, 1917. Mr. Hanscom at once went into camp with his regiment and followed his "boys" to Spartanburg and then overseas and was with the regiment in all its battles and engagements. He was cited for bravery. After the regiment was mustered out, Mr. Hanscom returned to Brooklyn and resumed the active pastorate of the church; but he believes that it will now be possible for him to undertake, with greater promise of results, work in some new field.

Celebration at St. Mark's, Brooklyn

Beginning Sept. 12, ST. MARK'S, BROOKLYN, had a series of Sunday celebrations in honor of the extensive improvements and repairs made upon the church edifice during the summer. Electric lights have been installed; the entire interior has been redecorated; a new carpet has been laid; a dynamo and organ-blower have been put in, and the organ itself rebuilt; besides necessary repairs upon the roof and in the basement. The total expense will be about $5,000, most of which has already been paid or subscribed. The sermon on Sept. 12 was by the pastor, Dr. Charles W. Dane, who took as his subject, "The Holiness that Becomes God's House." Dr. J. P. Huget of Tompkins Ave. was the visiting preacher on Sept. 19, and on the morning of Oct. 3, a special Old Folks' Service will be held with Holy Communion and reception of members.

Dr. Dane is just beginning his fourth year of ministry with St. Mark's, which has great opportunities for service in the community in which it is situated. During Dr. Dane's pastorate the membership of the church has increased by some 250, about 75 per cent. of the accessions being on confession of faith, and the benevolences have been doubled. B. A.

IN THE SOUTH

Summer Campaigning

Excessive summer heat is said to militate against aggressive campaigning in churches of the North, but in the cooler South, utilizing the pause in August between crop cultivation and harvest, it is quite the custom to stress evangelistic campaigns.

At Rainey, Tex., Rev. J. W. Riley, pastor, with the assistance of former pastor, Rev. J. W. Saucier, meetings lasting two weeks filled the church every night despite unfavorable weather and muddy roads. Community interest increased, several professions were made, some have united with the church and there is a prospect of others joining soon.

During the associational meetings of the northern churches in Louisiana, Rev. Samuel Holden, general missionary under the Extension

Societies, was present for two weeks of the most strenuous ministry. Evangelistic meetings were held for a brief period in several churches and at rural preaching points. Crowds attended. Interest was keen. Mr. Holden presented not only the appeal to decisions but to better organization, more adequate support and a larger teaching ministry. Everywhere his messages were received with fullest sympathy, resolutions of approval were adopted, committees were appointed, and delegates assumed responsibility for definite amounts for their churches. Subsequently these appropriations were presented to the churches for approval and adopted. Mr. Holden reports that in all his experience in the ministry he has not seen greater need, larger opportunity for real evangelization nor more earnest and sincere response to the appeal of higher standards than in these fields of Northern Louisiana. Here Rev T. A. Edwards has been spiritually bishop of a diocese 20 or 30 miles in extent, covering five or six stations, and with the help of others, like Rev. J. W. Spillers of Eros, the gospel has been proclaimed to large congregations, although the preaching points are all rural. The most genuine sacrifice is exhibited. Mr. Spillers reported, as the custom is, to the association, as though it were but the expected in the days' work, that during the year he had traveled, in making his appointments, 1,200 miles, preached 75 sermons, made 87 calls and received in salary payments from the churches $102! For personal, sacrificial service can this piece of work be surpassed?

When Sunday Comes
By John Andrew Holmes

In New Testament times a village became a town as soon as it had ten men who would agree to be regular attendants on the religious service. Such men are still the sort of people that make a town.

Rev. R. C. McCoy is pastor of the dual field of Manchester, Okla., and Waldron, Kan., two villages nine miles apart. Recently evangelistic meetings have been conducted in Waldron, a cousin of the McCoys helping, and the pastor reports 70 conversions, the prospect of 50 accessions to the church and the reasonable likelihood that a parsonage will be acquired and that Waldron will make a bid for the full-time service of a minister, which is urgently needed. Similar efforts are soon to be put forth in Manchester, and the outlook is that each church will develop into a self-supporting community organization, serving effectually the religious, educational and social interests of a wide constituency.

ILLINOIS

New Pastor of Warren Avenue, Chicago

Rev. W. H. North, who has just taken up the pastorate of WARREN AVE., CHICAGO, was born in Canada and had his education in the public schools of Illinois and at Illinois Wesleyan University. He began his ministry in the Methodist Church and became a Congregationalist in 1903. He served the church at Emington, Ill., four years, the Home Missionary Society a year, working in East Moline, Ill.; the church at Little Falls, Minn., for three years and for the last nine years has been pastor of First, Billings, Mont.

During this period Mr. North has been one of the leading men not only of Billings but of the state in all moral and religious movements. He has given to his church and to the denomination painstaking and devoted service. He has been a member of the Board of Directors of Billings Polytechnic and was pastor of the Polytechnic Church for a number of years. During the war he was active in Red Cross work, served as a member of the Montana Recruiting Committee of the Y. M. C. A., and had five months' service in France and Germany with the A. E. F. During his pastorate about 500 members have been received and the church property has been greatly improved.

The membership of Warren Ave. has been somewhat depleted by the removal of many leading members to the suburbs and it is in some sense a down town church. Mr. North has talents of mind and heart that put him in the succession of the strong ministers who have done valiant service at Warren Ave.

The Congregational ministers of the state, in their convocation at Middlebury, recognized the event by appropriate resolutions and a present of $50. Dr. Merrill has for many years been the beloved secretary of the state conference.

My Note Book

By Rev. Bromide Smith, D. D.

I have been going over the notes of my prayer-meeting talks for the last two years. Before burning them I thought I should jot down some of the ideas which I find seem to have strayed into them. Perhaps they will be seed-ideas to some prayer-meeting-goer as they have been to me.

Here on an old sheet is a sketch of the first talk in the fall to the young people of the church. Subject: "What We Have Done: What We Can Do." For the last part of the topic the headings are SEE, FEEL, ACHIEVE, THINK. What would Shakespeare see, or Jesus feel, or Edison achieve, or Emerson think in your position? What could you achieve if a mad bull was after you? There is. It is Time.

"English, Irish and Scotch Religion" is the heading of the next sheet. Irish Catholic strays into Scotch Presbyterian Church, no cross, no altar, no images, no praying on knees; nothing but a man in a box speaking to people in a room. No religion. Scotch Presbyterian strays into Roman Catholic Church, idolatry everywhere, mumbling of Latin, meaningless superstition. No religion. Irish Catholic strays into English Episcopal Church. No authority. No religion. Why not give up that attitude of mind? Irish give us Mysticism and Authority. English give us the Authentic and Orderly. Scotch give us the Intellectual. Be all.

"Half-baked" is next text (Hosea 7:8). Consider the rich too rich and the poor too poor in the next blocks in N. Y. Or our Sundays full of meetings and our weeks full of meanness. Worst of all think of our culture. "Guests in taxi-cabs only will be admitted to the church," said a wedding invitation. Beware of half-bakedness!

"Our Boys" comes next. A boy is made up of a little of his father (that's the Man), a little of his mother (that's the Child), and a little of his ancestors (that's the Monkey). S. Smith said, "All little boys should be drowned." This probably is too severe, but either do this or trust to the man in him, remember the child in him, and love the monkey out of him.

"Human Nature" is a good broad subject. Three points. (1) Everyone is so different from everyone else. (2) Everyone is so much the same as everyone else. (3) There is so much more good in everyone than anyone has ever found out.

"The World's Unknown Saints." The Saints of Toil, the Mothers of the world. The Saints of Renunciation, the Aunts of the world, and others. It's harder to be a Saint than a Hero. A saint is God's Hero. Be one!

"Magnanimity" has three sides to it. (1) You choose what you see. (2) What you choose to see changes you. (3) What you don't choose to see doesn't hurt you. 'Nuff preached.

"Things That Can't Go On" attracted a large meeting ready even eager for the worst. But the things that could never last were Carelessness, Insincerity, Extravagance. While Good Works and Love both last.

"The Three Things" were Come, Go, Stand. That is Humility (Come to Jesus for help), Service (Go into all the world), Consistency (Be on the spot).

Well that is the end of that pile! How they do collect in the barrel! Use them at your prayer meeting some time. We have at ours!

There is need for service to our country and our civilization today, more insistent even than in war. It is a call not from the high emotion and glamour of war, but a call for citizenship based upon daily obligation to the community, not upon privilege to exploit it.—Herbert Hoover.

Two Letters on the League

This League or Some Other

Dear Mr. Editor:

One of the most unfortunate circumstances in connection with the criticisms, pro and con, of the action at Boston, is found in the fact that so many people seem unable to recognize that it was not the act of the Council but of the American delegates.

The question was not before the Council and had no business to come before the Council for official action; but because of that as well as for other reasons, it was pre-eminently a fit and proper matter for the American delegates to act upon, if they so desired—altogether Congregational and democratic.

In fairness to our British brethren we ought to try to keep clearly in mind the scrupulous, almost pathetic attitude of opposition which they assumed toward any official act on the part of the Council, that would involve them in even seeming to dictate to the American Government in state or nation, upon the League of Nations, Prohibition, or any other question. If all American public men, as well as some other folk, were as scrupulous in the matter of minding their own business, a good many of us would not feel humiliated as often as we do.

In connection with this whole problem, one sometimes gets a bit weary of the pharisaism which in effect says:

"I am in favor of a League; but not this League. I want a League conceived and constructed in the atmosphere of prayer and other holy and exalted monitions."

That would seem to mean, would it not, that the prayer must be not only of my own country and language with the proper accent, but of my own political party as well. Any other prayer would only serve to vitiate the atmosphere. Me und Gott!

A. W. GERRIE.

Why I Shall Vote the Republican Ticket

Dear Mr. Editor:

I have been vastly disappointed in the failure of the Republican Senate to support the proposed League of Nations. I have so regretted the inaneness of both the Republican platform and its candidate's address of acceptance as to feel no enthusiasm for either. I heartily appreciate the sentiment of a trusted Congregational leader that the Republican party richly deserves a rebuke for its pitiful failure to lift on its standards the ideals needful for the hour. I believe that President Wilson, in spite of his desperate errors, will go down to history as the ablest and most consistent champion of such a League of Nations as would secure world peace. If I could believe that Democratic success would realize this ideal I would gladly give it my vote. But I shall support the Republican ticket:

1. Because Democratic success affords to me no hope or possibility of such achievement. As Mr Taft has clearly shown, the votes for that end would still be lacking.
2. Because I believe such a League as will function for world peace, such a League as has had the support of Colonel Roosevelt, Senator Lodge and ex-President Taft, is far more likely to be realized under a Republican than under a Democratic administration.
3. Because, though Mr. Cox resolutely protests that he does not represent the "wets," it is an outstanding fact that he is counted upon and is being vigorously pushed, by wet leaders, as the chief hope of those who seek, by a modification of the Volstead provision, to nullify the Eighteenth Amendment.
4. Because President Wilson's royal capacity for high ideals and his splendid conception of world liberty and peace, have been, unfortunately, eclipsed by a superior capacity for political blundering.

As an idealist, Mr. Wilson commands my grateful admiration; but, as a politician, disappointment akin to contempt. His failure to take counsel, in a matter of such vast import and national concern as the League, with any but favorites of his own party; his failure to invite the support of senators on whose sympathetic concurrence all success would finally depend; his pitiful but abortive appeal to the country for the support of his party as the one path to the desired end; his spiteful refusal to afford to either Colonel Roosevelt or General Wood opportunity to serve the nation in France; these are a few among many considerations which dwarf the stature of the idealist to the meager dimensions of the ungenerous, narrow-minded politician.

Briefly, then, the clear avowal that Mr. Cox will pursue a course wholly consistent with that of Mr. Wilson; the far greater promise of Republican support for the integrity of the Eighteenth Amendment; together with, what seems to me, a far stronger hope for achieving a consistent League of Nations, constrains me, albeit with small enthusiasm, to support the party through which so great victories for righteousness have been gained in the past, and which has, once more, confirmed such reputation by the action of twenty-seven Republican Legislatures, as compared with but nine Democratic, in conferring upon the women of the nation their well-deserved but long delayed right of suffrage.

Three Little Shavers

Three kids upon a city square
  Made friends with me the other day;
Three little shavers playing there,
  Had each a special speech to say.
One asked me for the funny sheet;
  One for the band on my cigar;
One sat a wheel, and from the seat
  He scarce could reach the handle bar.
No mere material things asked he,
  No inroad on my purse or love,
'Twas but a simple courtesy,
  He craved the kindness of a shove.
None rendered formal thanks to me;
  These were not verbose little men;
But six young eyes right merrily
  Said, "Mister, we'll be friends again."

Why is it that

Hymns of the Centuries

is used in hundreds of satisfied churches?

Because:

1. All the best of the old favorites are there, set to the right tunes.
2. The new hymns easily sing themselves into the hearts of the people.
3. The words are printed within the staff.
4. Each selection for Responsive Reading occupies one page and one only.

REV. THOMAS SIMMS

After months of most painful and trying illness, Thomas Simms, pastor of First and South Churches, Ipswich, Mass., entered into rest Aug. 27.

Leaving Gorham, Me., after seven years of service, in the fall of 1918 he undertook the pastorate of the "yoked" churches of Ipswich. The task was one demanding full manly vigor and wisdom and though Mr. Simms assumed it with high purpose and dauntless courage, the ravages of the foe which finally laid him low, to a large degree prevented his realizing his worthy ambitions. As long as it was possible he heroically fulfilled the duties of his office, and when strength failed and retirement from service became imperative he valiantly yielded to the Divine will.

Weeks upon weeks of increasing weariness and suffering ensued and through them all the same cheer and fine heroism characterized his spirit. He loved life and had cherished high hopes as to enjoyments that might be his when the activities of the settled ministry should be laid aside. But these he loyally surrendered to the will of the Father. It is altogether possible that the spirit which revealed itself in those months of confinement, and which emanated from the sick room, will exercise a mightier influence than could have resulted from the pulpit's message.

Mr. Simms was a man of broad vision, keeping abreast of the religious movements of his time but remaining truly and sanely evangelical. In a final letter to a friend he wrote that if he were going through life again he should "follow the Christ, preach his gospel, and look after the suffering ones."

Through the trying days the loyalty and devotion of the people of the community, whose hearts he had already won, were a very great comfort.

The funeral service was held in the First Church, Ipswich, Monday, the 30th. It was conducted by Rev. Benjamin Swift of Princeton, Mass., who was assisted by Rev. Mr. Ward of the Baptist Church, and by Rev. Mr. Littlefield of Lynn, a college friend. The interment was in the Ipswich Cemetery.

Mr. Simms was born in Bath, England, in 1854, and came to America at an early age. He graduated from Wesleyan College in 1883. The first years of his ministry were given to the Methodist Episcopal denomination; after which he served Congregational churches in Norwich and South Manchester, Ct., in Middlebury, Vt., in Gorham, Me., and in Braintree and Ipswich, Mass.

In 1887 Mr. Simms married Nellie B. Swain of New Haven, Ct., whose fine service in the different parishes greatly enriched his ministry. Four children were given them: Herbert L., now with the Banker's Trust Co., New York; Henry S., class of 1920, M. I. T., just beginning work with the Rockefeller Institute; Ruth H., teacher of Domestic Arts, Hathorne School, Danvers; and Helen, wife of Arthur T. Vaughn of East Orange, N. J.

Many persons in the churches Mr. Simms has served through the years will hear with deep regret of his going and will be ever grateful for his ministry. B. S.

it or not, you have to admit was clean cut and decisive as well as incisive.

Secretary Houston, who was glad to be shifted from the Department of Agriculture to the Treasury Department, is making his mark. He is not a tooter for himself, is not popular with the reporters, and he seldom gets much publicity. But what he knows he knows, and what he does not know he knows where to get it. He is keeping as many of the experts as he can who served during the war, and he is asking no questions as to their politics. To Europe's pleas for aid he answers "yea" when the law allows; but he will not give away Treasury funds or loan what he has no authority to so treat. Buttressed by the Federal Reserve Law he sits and twiddles his thumbs and smiles when Wall Street tries to resume its traditional condescending patronage of the Treasury. What McAdoo began he is finishing.

through—and she never put faith in savings banks. We had put that money by for our old age, and now here am I, Abner Morton—the Mortons of Plymouth town—and on charity my last days! The day after she hid the strong box she had her stroke and never spoke again. I used to take my lantern and dig all over the garden hunting for it after dark. That's why I never let anybody set foot in there but myself. But don't you tell no one, child, or the whole of Plymouth will be up here a-diggin.' "

And as he went over the story, Nancy would sit listening breathlessly at his feet, her knees hunched up to her little pointed chin and her eyes on Mr. Abner's excited face. She always cuddled the Mayflower cat in her arms while he talked, for it was one of her games that the doorstop cat had once been alive, and had been changed into china by a wicked fairy.

Nancy was a dreamer and her world was full of fairies that peeped from Mr. Abner's flowers, or hid among the crumbling stones on Burial Hill, where the children loved to play. But the Mayflower cat has been kept out of this story quite long enough, for the cat is really the leading character and not Nancy nor Mr. Abner.

Enter the Mayflower cat! He was quite a lapful for Nancy to hold, for he sat up very straight, his two little front paws on the floor and his long tail curled about him. He was a white cat with a black stripe down his back, and two black ears that stood up very straight as though always listening; there was a black spot on his forehead, and you could see the tiny point of his pink tongue. Nancy thought him a really beautiful cat.

Underneath his tongue was printed in black ink, "Two Feet West of M. L. T." She often wondered what the words might mean, but though they talked of the cat and how Mr. Abner came by him, the words underneath were never spoken of.

"Hold him carefully, Nancy, child," he would say. "You see my grandsir' brought him over in the sea chest from Leyden when he came with his folks. He was just a little chap of four and that sea chest held all they owned and it wasn't so big neither. Nobody knew why in creation he had to bring that chiny cat, but maybe it was the only plaything he had and anyway they let him bring it. My mother set great store by it and Charity and me weren't allowed to play with it much. I don't even know if it was a doorstop, for I suspicion the Pilgrims thought about that later. But mayhap there isn't another chiny cat like it in all Plymouth town nor in Boston neither." And he would smile down with real affection upon Nancy, as she sat on the little stool, the Mayflower cat cuddled in her arms.

But there came a day when her affection for Mr. Abner meant a real sacrifice for Nancy Patience Palmer.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Paper

Sherwood Eddy, who describes "A Student Conference in Czecho-Slovakia," is the leader of student work in foreign lands under the Y. M. C. A. International Committee. He is a brother of Rev. Brewer Eddy of the American Board, and has recently united with the United Congregational Church of Bridgeport, of which Dr. William Horace Day is pastor.

F. Lauriston Bullard, who begins this week his series on "Dramatic Scenes in American Churches," has been for many years in newspaper work in Boston and is now the Sunday Editor of the Boston Herald. He is the author of several books and many magazine articles.

Pilgrim Sermon Topics

What are the ministers planning to preach about in connection with the Tercentenary anniversaries this autumn and winter? Our question is suggested by the fact that on page 400 of this issue appear two suggestive lists, one from a minister in the Pacific Northwest and another from one who has of late been serving a Florida parish. These brethren evidently believe in taking time by the forelock and their specific themes arranged in a cumulative order should be suggestive to other preachers.

May we not have soon a little broadside of topics for sermons on the Pilgrims? Let those who have worked out their lists follow the example of these two brethren and send to this office at the earliest possible moment their lists.

Pilgrim Celebrations

How will your church celebrate the Tercentenary? This is another timely question relating to church programs for the season on which we are just entering. Most of the projects this year have emanated from central sources. What we need now is initiative and action in a thousand local centers, and of course the church that prides itself on its Pilgrim ancestry should be one of the first organizations to put the idea into practical form. So let us have a symposium from our readers, with each communication brief and to the point, in reply to this question: What is your church doing to celebrate the Tercentenary? We hope many letters will pour in. They cannot fail to quicken the entire fellowship. Address Pilgrim Celebrations, The Congregationalist.

In the Circulation Department—

We have a plan for a New Honor Roll to be published weekly, and we hope you will help us develop it. It will include every church in which All the Church Officers subscribe to The Congregationalist and Advance. Of course we're counting on the ministers to check up their flock and send in the name of their church just as soon as it reaches the Honor goal.

Every one who is sufficiently interested in his own church to accept an official position surely wishes to be informed regarding the larger work of our Congregational denomination. Sympathetic understanding and knowledge of the activities in all our churches will help to strengthen and make more effective the progress of the individual church. Our leaders need the vision and stimulation which our church paper will bring to them week by week.

Help your church to win a place in the Honor Roll. We await with confident pleasure the first names for printing in our next issue.

Wanted, More Leaders

THE biggest shortage in the world today is that of leaders. The need of them is even more desperate than the need of building materials and laborers.

In this country 20,000,000 men, and nearly as many more women, are now engaged in the task of selecting those who, as they sit in legislative houses, will guide this nation forward in the path of prosperity and peace.

One would think that in a population of 110,000,000 persons, many of whom are well educated and intelligent, it would not be hard to find capable and trustworthy leaders. There is an abundance of men who aspire to play the rôle, who are eager to sit on the front seats and make the speeches, who readily jump into the band wagon that seems best fitted to take them to the coveted goal.

But men who can think out our national problems ahead of the rest of us, who can see at least a little way into the future, who can untangle the industrial snarl, who can administer our common affairs economically and efficiently, who can go to the root of the difficulties connected with high prices and with the constant friction between capital and labor and outline a remedy that shall not be worse than the malady itself, are rare.

Yet if the democratic movement which has made such tremendous headway all over the world during the last decade is not to fall a prey to its own inherent weaknesses, democracy must raise up more leaders and must trust and follow them. They are harder to get than a succession of kings and czars in lands where monarchy holds undisputed sway century after century. Under such conditions children grow up with an inherent respect for authority and over-lordship.

But members of a democracy resent dictation from above. They discern instinctively the difference between a leader and a ruler. Moreover, they exercise freely, frankly and frequently their right to criticize and object. That is one of the reasons why good men who should be elevated for leadership often refuse to take public office. They are too thin skinned to stand censure and abuse. Nevertheless, it is the duty of such men to put aside personal feeling and to assume the leadership for which they are fitted; otherwise we shall have demagogues and time-servers in their places. Resentful though democracy is of one-man rule, insistent as it is that the leader shall be kind, fair, broad-minded and conciliatory, not going so far ahead on a single track as to lose "the common touch," democracy at heart yearns for leaders whom it can respect, admire and follow.

That is why with the passing years this nation pays every year increasing tribute to Washington and Lincoln. The American people will never long be satisfied with government by committee or cabal. They know that the Emancipation Proclamation was not penned by a commission and that almost every forward-looking piece of legislation now on the statute books of state or nation has been to a large degree the product of one inventive, courageous master mind.

A democratic church needs leaders. They, too, are hard to get. There are splendid men who will serve on committees and boards and whose faithful service in routine matters deserves more appreciation than it often gets. But the Christian Church in the future as in the past will need outstanding men within the ministry, and especially in the laity. Boys and girls in so-called Christian communities are suffering because the right persons cannot be found to be their Sunday school teachers, their Camp Fire Guardians, and their Scout Masters. Many a church is marking time because of the lack of leadership. What a difference it makes in the church when an earnest, devoted business or professional man comes into it, who knows how to enliven the atmosphere, create enthusiasm and discover new outlets for its expression, without at the same time causing consternation and disaffection in the ranks of the old timers!

American Congregationalism needs leaders. Several positions of the highest influence have long been unfilled because of the dearth of competent men willing to take them. One of the things for which Congregationalism should be profoundly grateful is that there are so few among us afflicted with the itch for office. We never wish to see anything approaching a bureaucracy in Congregationalism. But if our denomination in the twenty-five years before us is to play an honorable part in the field of organized Christianity, if it is to make contributions to Christian thought, to the Christian program and to Christian service equal to those which it has made in the last quarter of a century, we must produce, utilize and honor a larger number of able, unselfish, ministerial and lay leaders.

How admirably Dr. Herring met the test! His mind was always at work thinking out plans that might not come to fruition for a decade. Yet whenever a forward step was to be taken he was eager to ascertain the mind of the denomination. That is the quintessence of leadership either in the state or in the church—the ability to submerge self in the general good, to dream dreams and see visions, and yet to keep one's feet on the solid earth, the ability so to understand one's fellowmen to the end that one may help formulate their best thought and become the servant of their highest impulses.

God give us leaders who shall take the helm of the nation and of the states, and guide the American people past all quagmires and precipices out into the open road of mutual good will and service!

God give the Christian Church strong, courageous, Christlike leaders who shall help make it a more fit instrument for the fulfilling of God's plans!

God grant to Congregationalism in this tercentenary year the brotherly leadership that shall help our churches to renew their youth and meet the demands of the age!

And may every teacher who this autumn looks into the faces of the rising generations, every minister, every parent, every one else who has a chance to mold the life of the young, so instill into their minds the virtues of religion and the spirit of Jesus Christ that the democratic nations and the democratic churches of the world shall not lack in the high leadership that shall prove their salvation.

WHAT THE CHRISTIAN WORLD IS DOING

World Conference at Geneva

ON another page of this issue, our special correspondent gives an interesting report of what took place at Geneva from Aug. 9 to 12 when delegates from fifteen countries, including Germany, met there. The next conference, called a "Universal Conference of the Church of Christ on Life and Work," will probably be held in the summer of 1922, to which all churches of all lands will be invited to send delegates. The American members of the committee of arrangements for this conference are Rev. Peter Ainslie, Baltimore; Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, Brooklyn; Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Buffalo; Rev. Arthur J. Brown, New York; Bishop James Cannon, Jr., Birmingham, Ala.; Rev. Samuel H. Chester, Nashville, Tenn.; Bishop John Hurst, Baltimore; Rev. Lauritz Larsen, New York; Rev. Frederick Lynch, New York; Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, New York; Rev. William P. Merrill, New York.

Future Relations with Germany

ON the first day of the Geneva Conference a division was threatened when a memorial was presented from the French Protestant Federation insisting on a declaration of repentance from the church representatives of the Central Powers for the crimes against humanity of their respective governments. Rev. Ernesto Giampiccoli of Rome, Moderator of the Waldensian Church of Italy, who had lost a son in the war, advised against these demands, counseling forgiveness and charity. At the evening session one of the Scotch delegates, Mr. McGilp, presented an appeal for prayer which is to be printed in different languages and distributed in various nations, the first sentence of which is as follows:

> The members of this preliminary International Commission at Geneva, drawn together by a consciousness of the painful and urgent need of the world, and by a conviction that only the Gospel and spirit and leadership of Jesus Christ can meet that need, and that only a Church united, consecrated, daring, and self-forgetful can form the body, through which this spirit may do his gracious and healing work—earnestly and solemnly appeal to Christians of every name and form, of every land and race, to pray now and continually for the coming of a fuller unity of spirit and of action in the entire Church of Christ throughout the world.

English Visitors During the Autumn

THE first of several well-known Englishmen who will visit America this autumn is Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, successor of Rev. R. J. Campbell in the pastorate of the Union Church at Brighton. He will speak before the International Congress of Free Christians and other Religious Liberals in Boston next Monday and will also speak at the closing demonstration in Symphony Hall on the following Thursday. On Sunday, Oct. 10, he preaches at Columbia University. The New York Congregational Club is trying to arrange a date with him, as is the First Church in Montclair, N. J. He will be in this country until early November. Soon after his departure, Dr. Alexander Ramsey, Rev. Robert C. Gillie, pastor of Marylebone Presbyterian Church in London, which was served at a former time by Dr. George F. Pentecost, and Canon Burroughs, are expected. They come at the invitation of the American Mayflower Council to address various celebrations of the Pilgrim Tercentenary in various parts of the country during the special week that has been set apart from Nov. 15 to 23. Two Frenchmen and one or two men from Holland and Belgium are also coming.

The Holland Tercentenary Celebration

OUR English and Dutch friends have had the advantage in their celebrations of the Pilgrim history that they come in the time of pleasant weather and lend themselves to summer commemoration. Holland celebrated the departure from Leyden and Delfshaven, which was at the last of July, a little later. Previous services were held in the great church of that city, the Pieterskerk, in which Pastor Robinson is buried. Dutch and American ministers took part, but the chief address was by Dr. R. F. Horton of London who said that John Robinson was a saint as well as a scholar, and proved the reality of his religion by the character he displayed. His achievement was out of all proportion to the fame that attached to his name. He would have been horrified at anyone calling himself a "Robinsonian," and his great service was that there was no "Robinsonian" upon earth, but that there were men who are nearer to Christ because John Robinson had lived.

On the Trail of the Pilgrims

THE next day a reception was held at Amsterdam, with speeches by Sir Harry Brittain, M. P., Dr. Hamilton Holt, editor of The Independent, and Sir Murray Hyslop, who claimed in his speech that the Free Churches of England were the lineal descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers, the inheritors of the Pilgrim traditions and the natural exponents of the Pilgrim ideals. Queen Wilhelmina had already received and answered a telegram of good wishes. The following day the route of the Pilgrims from Leyden to their port of embarkation was followed by canal and train and a service held in the parish church at Delfshaven, which has a memorial window of the sailing of the Speedwell, followed by an impromptu open-air meeting at the Speedwell's mooring place. Nothing could have been more conducive to cordial relation between the churchmen of Holland and the United States than these international celebrations, in which also English Free Churchmen took so prominent a part.

Great Days at Old Plymouth

THE celebrations at the English Plymouth were also highly successful. King George in acknowledging a message of greeting used the occasion to repeat "his fervent hope that the problems arising out of the reconstruction of the world may be solved in a spirit of mutual forbearance and understanding to the advantage of the English-speaking peoples." Premier Lloyd George sent a cordial letter. The celebration at Plymouth began with a pageant in which 550 took part. Fifteen hundred guests were entertained by the Mayor and Mayoress at the town hall. The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Reading) presided at a public meeting. The bishop of the diocese compared the state of the world then and now and dwelt upon the opportunity to sink religious differences which "men who had the courage of the Pilgrim Fathers should not fail to seize." The addresses on Sunday were by Dr. Cadman of Brooklyn and Rev. Arthur Pringle. In these crowded days of social and intellectual intercourse there was a broad spirit of Christian brotherhood and little or no effort to score points in favor of this or that communion or school of thought. The courage, breadth of foresight and historic results of the Pilgrims' migration afforded scope enough for all who had a part in the celebrations.

New Department at Union Theological

UNION Theological Seminary announces the opening of a new department under the direction of Prof. Gaylord S. White, to be called the Department of Home Service. The purpose is to meet the needs of a growing number of students who desire to fit themselves for certain specialized types of Christian service in the home field. Instruction will be provided in such branches as Home Missions, including city and rural church work; work among immigrant peoples and in the whole field of industrial conditions; Social Service, as represented in the institutional church, the social settlement and the work of denominational commissions on social service; Interdenominational Movements, as exemplified in the Federal Council, the Interchurch World Movement, the rapidly growing movement for the federation of local city churches and the work of the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations; Religious Research and Publicity, including survey work and the utilization of the results; and the opportunity offered by the Chaplaincy of the Army and Navy, a field that must receive increasing attention from religious leaders. The Seminary desires to make this new department as useful as possible to the Church at large.

A Word for Our Times

What room have we for the Pilgrim temper and spirit in our modern Christianity? Time was once when people taunted the Church for being "other-worldly." Today, however, Christians of all schools grow absorbed in eager philanthropic efforts to realize God's Kingdom on earth. But in these preoccupations do they forget the overwhelming fact of immortality? How often do they muse on the saints' everlasting rest? We admit unreservedly our social duties; we respond to their corporate claim. Yet, after all, real religion begins, as it ends, in a relation between two persons—the single soul, and the God who made it.—Sir W. Robertson Nicoll.

The Lambeth Appeal and American Opinion

We must confess to a feeling of disappointment at the tone of the opinions which we quote on another page from the editorial columns of American religious papers in regard to the appeal of the Lambeth Conference in the matter of the unity of the churches. It is quite different from the first response of most English Free Church leaders from whom we quoted recently. And it is different, we think, because these American editors and correspondents seem largely to have missed the real point of progress, the real lamp of hope for brotherhood held out by these two hundred and fifty-two bishops of communions affiliated with the Established Church of England.

That sign of hope and progress lies in the assertion that the Universal Church of Christ is already in existence, that the sign of membership in it is the use of men and organizations of men by the Holy Spirit and that it is not co-extensive with or limited to the church organizations which have ministers episcopally ordained. So far, if we understand what seems to be the plain language of the Lambeth appeal, we are entirely agreed with its bishops. It is a matter of showing to the world that which already exists, and not of some new creation or submission. The common calling, the common hope, the heartfelt sense of brotherhood, the glad acceptance of work done in Christ's name and for his kingdom are already there. We have always felt them and we wish now, as we have always wished, to acknowledge and make them manifest to the world. "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Spirit. Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord."

Here we think most of the commentators whom we quote have rather missed the real advance which has been brought about by the unanimous appeal of these bishops. This appeal has apparently committed the communions which they represent to a declaration about the Church that now is, the universal Church of Christ, which is inclusive and not exclusive, and which they agree is not identical with their own church or with any particular church or group of churches, just as we agree that it is not exclusively identical with ours.

If the appeal does not mean this, it means nothing new or hopeful. And if we are in any doubt as to its meaning that doubt is derived solely from the interpretation offered us by a school and party in the Episcopal Church. The comment in The Living Church, for example, interprets the appeal as a preparation for "the time long prayed for when Protestantism should break up and a general return to the Church should be possible." And further: "There is no trace of the popular heresy that all denominations are integral parts of that Church." Even here it is only by taking the words of the appeal in some non-natural sense that they can be wrested into a denial that all men in personal relations with Christ and manifestly used by the Holy Spirit are a part of his body.

Our opportunity in this overture of brotherhood from these Anglican bishops seems to us entirely plain and grateful. It is to get into the minds and hearts of all whom we can reach, and especially, let us say, of laymen and women, the fundamental thought of the Universal Church which already is and is the body of Christ. From that must spring the sense of brotherhood and the desire that our essential unity should be manifested in the sight of all the world. The feeling and desire of brotherhood must precede expression. That does not necessarily mean that we should all have one name, or one method of church government, or even that we should exchange pulpits or sit down together at the table of our common Lord. These things, though desirable, are not at the moment essential. We Congregationalists, for example, are not welcome at the celebration of the sacrament in most Baptist churches in America. Our ministers have no authority to consecrate and administer the Bread and Wine in Methodist churches without the presence and permission of a Methodist minister. But there is no denial of the validity of our ordination here, and these are matters of order and regulation and tradition which do not trouble our common sense of brotherhood.

The Church is already one. The manifestation of that unity is the aim to be held in view. It must begin in an acknowledged brotherhood, free from all taint of scorn and pride, ready to look not only on our own things but also on the things of others. When we have cleared our hearts of prejudice and pride and opened them wide to love of God and all his children, the matters that divide us will fall into their due place and proportion and we shall be ready for the Holy Spirit's guidance in the way toward unity.

Starting Our Campaign

The Congregational World Movement is being organized for the coming season's campaign. A setting-up conference for the eastern part of the country was held in Broadway Tabernacle, New York, Sept. 16. A similar conference for the western states, including the Pacific Coast, was held in Chicago, Sept. 23. At the New York conference the board secretaries and state superintendents were present and the final decisions were made regarding the more important matters of policy and methods, and a general program for the next few months. A campaign of education will be conducted, on the one hand lining up leadership and on the other assisting the churches in their work of developing missionary education, stewardship, evangelism, and recruiting, and ultimately the Every Member Canvass. It is announced that special attention to social service will be taken up at some later time, but this does not mean any check on the usual social service activities of the denomination which continue under the effective leadership of the secretary, Dr. Arthur E. Holt. The leadership training of the Congregational World Movement now is to be largely through conferences; the two recent national conferences being followed by regional conferences, and they in turn by smaller group conferences of the field men, who with the pastors are to be engaged in the special campaign immediately before us.

These first conferences reveal a surprising amount of misunderstanding regarding our relationship to the Interchurch Movement and the present status of the Congregational World Movement. The questions involved will be effectively answered in the next issue of The Congregationalist and Advance, which will be devoted chiefly to the Congregational World Movement. This will be an interesting and informing issue, covering a wide range of our denominational interests and relationships and may well be kept for reference. Meanwhile we should pass the word along to those who do not understand that the Congregational World Movement was not affected directly by the suspension of the Interchurch Movement. We are told that in some churches people who signed pledges for the Congregational World Movement thought that the suspension of the Interchurch Movement released them from pledges to our Movement. Evidently they do not understand that the money they had agreed to give was to go directly to our American Board of Foreign Missions, to our Home Missionary Society, to our American Missionary Association, to our Board of Ministerial Relief, to our needy Congregational churches, and the other Congregational boards and churches, and that none of it was directly involved in the Interchurch World Movement, which failed because the pledges to that Movement itself were not sufficient to cover expenses.

We should all understand fully that the large measure of success which we achieved in our Emergency drive of the Congregational World Movement last spring was made possible by the publicity and the surveys of the Interchurch Movement and that we shall continue to be beneficiaries of the Interchurch through the extensive and highly valuable surveys covering foreign missionary fields, American educational institutions, and to a less, but by no means unimportant degree, the home mission fields.

The united effort in which Congregationalists are engaged places, as it should, emphasis upon missionary education, and it is hoped that all of our churches will avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by this new organized enterprise to promote this subject, so vitally related to the Christian Church and the individual Christian.

The Commission of One Hundred recommended that the Every Member Canvass be held next spring, but churches are free to select their own date, and Congregational churches are pretty likely to follow their own preferences. Present indications are that a large number of the churches will have their canvass the first Sunday in December.

The financial goal for the year ahead of us is $5,000,000, and this takes the place of the Apportionment Plan, and differs from that in size and in a somewhat larger range of objects to be benefited. The recent goal of the Apportionment Plan was $2,000,000. We are asked to give a little more than double that. The need of the increase is imperative.

In addition to the seven national missionary societies which we know so well the Congregational World Movement undertakes to help a group of worthy educational institutions, for which we have definite responsibilities, and several other causes that we should be helping anyway and will find it more convenient to help by this group method.

The effort before us is one that challenges us to prayerful, earnest and intelligent support. May we clear the way for its complete success!

The Challenge of Terrorism

The explosion of a bomb in the street just in front of the United States Sub-treasury in New York is a direct challenge to our Christianity and our present form of civilization. It is an anonymous challenge, and therefore indicates the fear of those who made it and of their sympathizers. That they are a small, even a minute, though not quite negligible minority of the American people is shown both by their efforts to conceal their identity and by the practically unanimous reprobation of the American people. But then, terrorism is always the weapon of a minority. Majorities do not strike in the dark or assassinate by shooting in the back those who stand between them and the power to overturn and rule. Even in Ireland, though there is an undoubted majority in the South in favor of self-government, we refuse to believe that a majority are in favor of the methods aimed to create an atmosphere of terror employed by a minority.

This New York bomb explosion is, after all, somewhat logical in using the weapons which have been perfected by our modern science for use in war. This bomb, except in a certain malicious ingenuity which sought to kill as many innocent people as possible at an hour when they would be on the street, is not very different from the bombs which our enemies planned to drop upon New York from specially designed airships. It wrought no more destruction than one of them might have done if it had fallen unannounced in the same street at the same hour. It is a demonstration, therefore, brought within the range of every American citizen's imagination, of what war under modern conditions really is and does. It should confirm in the hearts of our people the determination to take every measure and engage in every hopeful form of co-operation which will henceforth make war, if not impossible, at least so dangerous and difficult that no group of ambitious men in any country (and such groups are always a minority) will take the risk.

How shall we deal at home with this challenge of a small minority bent on overturning our forms of law and social organization by terror? In the first place by not being afraid. The aim of terrorism is to create an atmosphere of panic. And not by creating our own atmosphere of fear by repression. We shall all have to put up with some restrictions on our liberty in consequence of this war against the republic which has been instituted by a dangerous few, just as we do on account of the continual war against crime. But it would be silly and wicked and just what these enemies of order desire to subject even our great cities to martial law. Not by closing our minds to all criticisms of the present order and praising what already is as the best that can ever be. It is a time to study the system we have inherited; but for its improvement and not for its overthrow.

The real answer to this challenge of anarchy working by terrorism is in a better citizenship. We boast of our numbers, but it is really quality which counts. One hundred million, two hundred, three hundred millions, as in China, will not give us a place of leadership in the world or make us a power for peace and righteousness, or even arm us against little minorities bent on having their way by threats and terror, unless we are strong and brave and righteous and are ruled and directed by good will toward others. The two great commandments are, after all, not out of date. If we could see Christians enthusiastic in their Christianity and faithful in their life we should be confident for the future of the nation, whatever changes come. But in so far as the salt has lost its savor, there may be troubled years ahead.

Dr. Herring and the Future of the Council

As Congregational forces reassemble and take up the work of the autumn, the gap in the circle occasioned by the absence of Sec. Hubert C. Herring of the National Council seems even larger than when he was so suddenly snatched away from us last August. The lull of mid-summer then prevailed, but now workers are girding up their loins for another season of activity. Dr. Herring more than any other man envisaged the entire field of denominational activity and his counsel and leadership will be missed at every turn in the road.

On the other hand, there is solace in the continued realization of what Dr. Herring was to the entire fellowship East and West, North and South. Since the special memorial number we printed in his honor communications, clippings, church calendars and poems also have come from many sources indicating how highly he was regarded. For example a recent letter from a California pastor says, "I have been corresponding with him only recently and he really gave time enough to make the best contribution to the subject in hand. Others contributed but his letter was by all odds the best." How characteristic that was of Dr. Herring! In the midst of pressing and large general responsibilities, he never was too busy to heed the call for help from any one. He often took long and wearisome journeys just to fulfill a single appointment, never sparing himself by night or by day, and drawing upon his unfailing fund of humor and playfulness to relieve the tedium of waiting at railway junctions.

Undoubtedly autumnal Congregational meetings in different parts of the country will be tinged with the thought of Dr. Herring. The Boston ministers devoted their first autumnal session to a memorial service, and his name will be affectionately mentioned at many a local and state gathering. The many and varied lessons from the life of this great Christian leader will not be lost or quickly forgotten.

We understand that the Executive Committee of the National Council expects soon to make an ad interim appointment to the secretaryship, but Dr. Herring's permanent successor will not be chosen until the biennial session of the National Council at Los Angeles next June. The requirements for that high office will be all the more severe in view of what Dr. Herring made it during the seven years of his service. It stands for more today and is more acceptable to all our churches because of the dignity and worth he gave to it. Yet as Rev. Charles F. Carter of Hartford said the other day, who as chairman of the executive committee of the Council knew Dr. Herring intimately: "He never cared much for denominational machinery save as it was the instrumentality through which great moral convictions and impulses were brought to realization." He certainly was as ardent a Congregationalist as any man in the fellowship, yet from the strictly ecclesiastical point of view he was very little of a Congregationalist. He saw the entire Church of Christ as potentially one and he gave unstintedly of his time, thought and energy to undertakings looking toward a larger unity.

Held at the "Common House" Jan. 21, 1621

Dramatic Scenes in American Churches

At the Pilgrim Church in Plymouth

By F. Lauriston Bullard

Safely ashore at last, crowded within the rude structure they call the Common House, their hearts full of gratitude and hope in spite of the perils they must dare and the deprivations they must endure, their memories lingering tenderly upon the friends and the beloved minister left behind in Holland and upon those fellow voyagers from whom already they have been called upon to part in their bold venture overseas, listening reverently while Elder William Brewster leads them in the worship of God—the Pilgrims at New Plymouth on Jan. 21, 1621, hold their first Sabbath services on the shores of that New World whither they have come that they "may not lose their language nor their name of English," that they may preserve their liberty of conscience and maintain their "covenant to walk with God, and one with another, in the enjoyment of the ordinances of God, according to the primitive pattern in the word of God."

The House of Meeting

The building is of rough logs, about twenty feet square, the cracks filled with mud, the roof thatched after the fashion at Scrooby, and now made secure again after the fire of the preceding Sunday. There runs the brook and there stands the wood whence they have carried the timber laboriously hewn for their dwellings. There rides the Mayflower safely anchored, their home for a third of a year. Clark's Island is near at hand, the refuge of the party which had found Plymouth Harbor for them, and where through the Sabbath the explorers had rested.

Just down the slope is the landing place, where, on Dec. 21, 1620, Standish, Bradford, Carver, Winslow, Tilley, John and Edward Howland, Warren, Hopkins and Edward Dotte had made the landing that was to become a great event in the history of America and of the world. Just above the Common House is the hill to be known to themselves as Fort Hill, but tragically known to those who have entered upon the splendid heritage of the Pilgrims as Burial Hill. And there is Cole's Hill where they are to plant a field of grain, lest the Indians count the graves of the fifty whom they lost that first winter.

Here in their "assembly hall," with the wilderness all unknown before them and the wide ocean behind, with savages always to dread and grim death week by week decimating their small numbers, they listen with swelling emotions to the fervent but simple ministrations of their elder. Psalms are sung, prayers are offered, the Scriptures are read and some brief exposition attempted. The service over, they separate, quietly to spend the day in meditation, personal devotions and rest. Soon they rear upon the hill the meeting house which they equip also as a fortress, and this serves until a new church is erected in 1637.

The Pilgrim Church-Going

One lingers upon the picture of their march to service:

> They assemble by beat of drum, each with his musket or firelock, in front of their captain's door. They have their cloaks on, and place themselves in order three abreast, and are led by a sergeant without beat of drum. Behind comes the Governor in a long robe; beside him on the right comes the preacher with his cloak on, and on the left the captain with his side-arms and cloak on, and with a small cane in his hand—and so they march in good order, and each sets his arms down near him. Thus they are constantly on their guard night and day.

One reads with curious interest the sermon, upon 1 Cor. 10 : 24, delivered by Robert Cushman, who after all had not been ordained to preach, on Dec. 12, 1621—a sermon which, when printed in London the following year, became the first sermon delivered in New England to be given permanent form. But one deeply wishes that he might know which Psalms were sung, what passages read, what petitions offered, in that hour of worship on the third Sabbath of January, 1621, in "the house which they had made for a generall rendevoze," by the Ruling Elder who had been appointed in Holland to represent the distant minister whom the Pilgrims considered the pastor of their church until his death in 1625. In imagination one strives to picture the scene, but with small success. You may think of Bradford as you choose for no one can tell if he was a Lincoln or a Douglas in stature. Sketch your own likeness of Rose Standish, for she may have been small and dainty or tall and stately. Much about their times and their manner of life and thought you may know, but their personal appearance you must provide almost entirely after your own reasoning and fancy.

How remote seems that world of only three centuries ago! Reading and writing were rare accomplishments, lacked often enough by nobles, and free schools were unknown. The cottages of the people, thatched with straw, contained no stoves and had no chimneys. The tables bore no china nor tinware and pewter dishes were just coming into use. Steel reflectors served for looking glasses, there were no friction matches, the weaving was done by hand. England had no weekly paper. London still was to wait 100 years for a daily, 160 years for street lights, 200 years for railroads, cheap postage and illuminating gas. Letters traveled on horse back about five miles an hour and a day's wage was not enough to cover the cost. To hurry the tidings of the death of Elizabeth 190 miles from London to York required three days and three hours. Water pipes, sewage systems, pavements, wooden floors, carpets, fire engines—all were unknown. Fens and filth menaced health, smallpox was common, scientific medicine was far in the future, the death rate was one to twenty-three.

As to science: Galileo bore the punishment of the Inquisition for teaching that the earth was round and moved in space, during the period the dissenters from Scrooby were in Holland. The telescope in the early part of that century revealed the rings of Saturn, the satellites of Jupiter, and the phases of Venus, but the idea of the solar system had not found lodgment in the minds of many. The discovery of the law of gravitation was sixty years, and of the stratification of the earth a full century, ahead. The barometer had not arrived, nor the mercurial thermometer. Clocks with oscillating pendulums were not known, Harvey had not discovered the circulation of the blood, the sunbeam had not been split into its prismatic colors nor was the progressive motion of light surmised.

As to government and morals: The chief officer of the crown was the sheriff; London Bridge bore human heads almost every week; the gallows was common on the King's Highway; 200 offenses were punishable by death. Sports, the stage, social standards, all were coarse. "Witchcraft" was common, omens influenced the lives of most, the pulpit was narrow. Elizabeth, the great queen, was profane of speech, untruthful, vain as her mother, Anne Boleyn, bold as her father, Henry VIII. She accumulated 3,000 fine gowns, half dominated Spain, France and Holland, and governed England as well.

The Religious Story of Christendom

As to religion: Almost a century had passed since Luther had nailed his theses on the Wittenberg door and had defied the greatest power on earth. In the Low Countries the fierce struggle for liberty of faith and for toleration had raged for many years and England had been vastly influenced thereby. Holland in celebration of her victories was founding free schools and establishing universities. Political freedom was coming with religious freedom in spite of all the might of Spain, then the dominating state of the Continent, whose rulers sought to subjugate the world by means ever since execrated by mankind. The English State Church, great, rich, autocratic, came into existence as the result of the strategy of a king. Elizabeth played all parts to all men in questions of religion, seeking always to hold her kingdom secure, but softening the persecutions of "heretics" and allowing them to move out and take their "heresies" along with them. James, her successor, claimed divine right, sharpened persecution, forbade emigration, sought to control opinions, insisted upon passive obedience. But he did give his people a new version in English of the Holy Bible, a version which became the law of the lives of churchmen, and which put God higher than either the State or the Church, made private judgment supreme and the individual responsible only to his Maker, a version that hastened the Revolution.

An Age of Great Men

But that was a great age. Shakespeare and Bacon, Spenser and Sidney, Raleigh, Hooker, belonged to it. Plain men were thinking hard and remembering how their fathers had demanded and obtained their Great Charters and their guarantees of rights. John Knox had been preaching and printing. Elizabeth brought skilled workmen from Flanders and their advanced ideas found lodgment in English minds; her soldiers returned from Holland with new notions of freedom; a fresh force was gathering strength year after year. The great mystery of the New World in the West fascinated the imagination and challenged the courage of the bravest and most thoughtful.

Puritans and Pilgrims

Out of these conditions emerge the Puritan and the Pilgrim. Opposed to ceremony, regalia, ostentation, seeking to purify faith and simplify worship, the Puritan developed the army and the party which changed the course of English history. Opposed to an established church as inherently wrong, caring nothing for power and place and mixing not in politics, standing for all the Puritans stand for and besides for tolerance and liberty, the little third party of the Pilgrims see in separation their only chance for full freedom both religious and political, and, true to their faith, leave their home country to find security in Holland. Twice apprehended in their attempts at flight, at last one congregation reaches Amsterdam, the leading mart of the world, and in the beautiful city of Leyden they make their home, where a great university has been founded in token of a Dutch victory over Spain. Among the exiles are the well-educated Bradford, Brewster, who had been an undergraduate student at Cambridge, and Winslow, a printer from London. In Leyden, Brewster and William Brewer set up a Pilgrim Press. They practice also the tolerance which they preach. For eleven years they have peace, quiet, prosperity. Then dawns the hour when the war with Spain is to be renewed. The Pilgrims also fear absorption in the surrounding population and the disappearance of their faith. Therefore they will migrate once more. And they undertake the negotiations and make the several removes which culminate in their voyage to the Western World.

The Voyage

And now on this January Sabbath of 1621 they are "at home" in the little settlement upon which they bestow the name found upon John Smith's map. Their ship out there in the harbor is only of 180 tons burden, about 90 feet by 23, a wooden vessel of course, carrying three masts, two of them square rigged and the mizzen with a lateen sail, high decked at bow and stern with a low deck between. The shallop 30 feet long required much space between decks even when carried in pieces. The ship bore some guns, possibly some animals and poultry. What cooking was done on the voyage must have been by holding a frying pan over a fire of charcoal or suspending a kettle on an iron tripod over fire in a box of sand. Probably the captain had a hanging compass, for the invention had been given to mariners a few years before. Exact charts there were none, but on board likely were the crude maps not only of Smith but of Cabot and Gosnold. The flag was the new one in that time of the United Kingdom of England and Scotland. Small and frail was the Mayflower from the modern viewpoint, not so in the thought of the Pilgrims. To them she seemed a large and well-built vessel. But she was heavily loaded and therefore sank low in the ocean and shipped great seas, especially through the latter half of the 66 days' voyage. She carried 102 passengers and a crew of fifteen or more. Forward lived the crew; the passengers were assigned to places aft in bunks and cabins. The ship has missed her intended destination, but having come safely to land, in what now is the harbor of Provincetown the 40 adult males of the Pilgrim Company draw up and sign their famous Compact, the agreement in which a distinguished English writer within a year has found "a solemn dedication of themselves, their successors, and their new land, to the principles of popular government," the "planting of democracy on American soil," an "act of immense significance for the future course of American history."

Adventures of Exploration

They put their shallop together and make it seaworthy. One exploring party goes and returns. A second of eighteen men and six members of the crew departs from the ship on Dec. 16; on Dec. 18, sights a harbor, and on Monday, Dec. 21, with the tide at the flood, in mild and sunny weather, lands somewhere on the Plymouth shore. On Dec. 26 the Mayflower enters the harbor. The following day, being the Sabbath, Brewster conducts service on board. Eagerly they undertake to explore, industriously they set to work upon their buildings, with an eye to security they lay out the town, assign the site for the Common House, and divide the company into nineteen "families." Delayed by rains and storms their progress is slow, but "some fell tymber, some saw, some rive, and some carry," and at last their arrangements are complete enough for their first Sabbath service on land, on Jan. 21, Old Style, Jan. 31, New Style, when all who were able gather in the assembly hall, no doubt with some thought of the ten or more of their number, including Dorothy Brewster, who have passed away.

Against the background thus broadly sketched how superb seems their faith, their sincerity of motive, their tolerance, their courage. They could not know the full significance of what they were doing that day as they listened to their elder conducting that service of prayer and praise. But they knew enough to understand that they faced no easy task. Their debates in Holland, "often seeking the mind of God in fasting and prayer," show how deeply they felt their responsibility for the faith which they believed God had revealed to them in the Scriptures; their acceptance of a debt which they were long and toilsome years in paying, mortgaging their future to serve the world, proves their tenacity and sincerity. That cabin compact, when they believed themselves outside the rule of the law of England, the first written constitution for the first pure democracy, discloses their ideals and spirit. Who can say how far into the future their minds penetrated?

Until April the Mayflower remained with them. And then the little ship, their sole present link with the Old World and the home lands, lifted anchor and started back across the ocean. But no one faltered. Their gaze must have followed the vessel. As they plied their tasks their eyes again and again must have lifted to look upon her receding sails. But no one went back. In the quaint phrase of a Japanese convert: "These men had a plow on hand." Soon their little settlement was overshadowed by the greater settlement at Boston. But the Pilgrim influence has grown ever greater. As John Masefield writes of them: "A generation fond of pleasure, disinclined toward serious thought, and shrinking from hardship, will find it difficult to imagine the temper, courage and manliness of the emigrants who made the first Christian settlement of New England. . . . It would be healthful could either England or America see herself through the eyes of those pioneers, or see the pioneers as they were. . . . They were plain men of moderate abilities, who, giving up all things, went to live in the wilds, at unknown cost to themselves, in order to preserve their children a life in the soul."

In addition to the usual authorities the writer wishes to notice his indebtedness to an address by Dr. Andrew S. Draper at the Cooper Institute in 1905.

The Church Conferences in Switzerland

Intimate Fellowship Expressing and Promoting Unity

By Our Special Correspondent

My mind feels as though a glove-stretcher had been vigorously applied to it; my body would welcome the quiet peace of deep pine woods and days a-fishin'. But truly, my spirit has been exalted. For these past three weeks I have been "conferencing" in Switzerland, where East and West have met together, and God's purposes for his children and his Church have been comprehensively sought and courageously espoused. Was it by strange coincidence or was it an evidence of the working of the Divine Spirit, that seekers, white and black, from the driving West and the mystic East, sought each other in that amazing little land of snow-capped mountains, to consider what hand and head and heart, dedicated to the knowing and doing of the will of God, might accomplish for this weary, perplexed and needy world?

However you may explain it—and there is no doubt in the minds of those who were present for they knew that God was at work among them—the words which I have chosen carefully, exactly represent the scope of the three church conferences held these past three weeks, the first two at Geneva, the last at St. Beatenberg.

The first conference, technically known as the meeting of the Preliminary Committee to consider a Universal Conference of the Church of Christ in Life and Work, was busied with the question of whether the Protestant denominations, now working separately, can work together on the overwhelming needs of our day, bringing to bear on the molten life of our world, great single sledge-hammer blows, rather than trying to shape its mass of hissing desires and glowing purposes, malleable with the heat of burning human needs, by the futile tapping of many tack-hammers, as is now so tragically attempted.

The second meeting was the World Conference on Faith and Order. In this the intellectual problem of a united christendom was the keynote. What can it contribute to promoting the realization of God's presence among men? Our denominational divisions, what are they but obvious shortcomings of Jesus' ideal of the Church, his body? And how are we to find our way to that actual goal of inclusive unity where all men know themselves to be bound together in the unity of the spirit because all are conscious of their equal place in his Church?

And at St. Beatenberg, high up on a mountainside, above low-lying clouds and valley mists, in the presence of the majestic, heavenward-pointing fingers of the glistening peaks, these seekers once more gathered together, there to give expression to the voice of God as it moves in the heart of man. The deliberations of this Conference of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches were fitting climax to the previous meetings at Geneva.

It was easy at first to "wave the cynic's ban." I had come from a parochial atmosphere where, in spite of some vague movings of a spirit of discontent with the separation of this denomination from that, the barriers between the churches are sufficiently unyielding to produce spiritual black and blue spots when one really bumps into them. I thought, for instance, of a certain Congregational and a certain Baptist church in the same locality, which were not moved to worship together a winter or two ago, even though God assiduously wielded an economic club labeled "coal shortage." I was conscious of the almost sinister presence of History. For there in Geneva one could not be unmindful of the yeoman work done by Calvin and Knox and the rest in dividing the Church into many camps. Was it not strange irony that within a block of the scene of their labors, men should now be gathered, a few hundred years after, to essay a task, the antithesis of theirs, to try to unite, rather than divide, to coalesce, rather than separate? Nor was it unreasonable poetic license to imagine grim Salive, raising its rocky bulk above the busy noises of that little city, musing to itself as it beheld the generations of men follow each other across that stage, "Why so hot, little man?"

But my littleness was compelled to silence as gradually the underlying significance of it all shaped itself in my consciousness. So far as I know, no man or group planned or aimed at a general scheme. No one with whom I have talked has seemed to be conscious that the three conferences formed a whole. It just happened, that three different groups of men and women, starting quite separately and independently of each other in years past, moved along lines strictly their own which, however, converged at Switzerland in August, 1920. And the fact is, that in so doing the whole field of Christian experience was touched, one conference supplementing another. "It just happened?" Rather, to use a phrase born in Geneva years ago, I am convinced that it "fell out contingently," according to the purpose of God. Cynicism and conviction are poor bed-fellows. Exit the former.

As I sat day after day in the various meetings and heard the words which were spoken, and as day after day I was even more keenly conscious of the spirit in which they were spoken—for spirit needs no laborious interpreting as do words of foreign tongue—I shared with many others present the knowledge that "God was in that place."

I should hesitate to affirm, however, that in the person of some of the delegates, it would have been possible to entertain angels unawares if outward habiliment were true symbol of inward consecration. For "clericals" were many, cassocks not a few, our brethren of the Orthodox Greek Church, with funneled hats and heavily jeweled breast pendants and massive gold crosses, acclaimed by their dress their profession; and gaitered bishops added ocular information if it cannot be said that they added thereby grace. It was very apparent that churchmen had gathered together.

There was the Archbishop of Upsala, inveterate worker in the Geneva Conferences, his mass of flaxen hair framing a countenance at once strong, knowing, genial. The benign, snow-haired Bishop Herzog of the Old Catholic Communion, whose opening prayer at the Faith and Order Conference, spoke so truly of one who had walked with God, that his words, though those of an unfamiliar tongue, found meaning in the heart of all. Germanos Strinapoulos, Metropolitan Bishop of Selencie, swarthy of countenance, black flowing beard, robed and wearing the ponderous decorations of his office, moved in and out with stately mien. Dr. Giampiccoli, brilliant and versatile, Waldensian pastor, brought the sunny warmth of his native land to temper now and then the quick, keen-edged, but volatile spirit of his brother from France.

Dr. Sigmund-Schultze, young, earnest and able pastor from Berlin, maintaining calm poise and sinking the acerbities of the recent past in determined endeavor to help bring about better things in the future. At St. Beatenberg, the tall, bent figure of the Lord Bishop of Winchester, a sturdy oak showing signs of the buffeting of many storms, was a marked contrast to the gentle marking of nearly seventy years which the Dean of Worcester bears with genial grace—and both labored mightily for the cause to which they are devoted.

Poland and Austria, Hungary and Denmark, Africa and Japan—from all corners of the world followers of Christ came to those conferences, so that it is a true record that at the Faith and Order Conference, for instance, eighty churches and forty nations were represented.

And in it all America has played a leading part. It was Dr. Lynch who brought to effective focus the desire on the part of many to confer as to the possibilities of united church work in our day and generation. Dr. Boynton, Bishop Cannon, Dr. William P. Merrill, Dr. Peter Ainslie, Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, Dr. A. T. Brown and others from America found themselves in the conference room at Geneva and at St. Beatenberg, and played a most important part in the shaping of the decisions. It was Bishop Brent, who, ten years ago, gave expression to the conviction which had grown up within him, that the "broken Church of Jesus Christ must be joined together in a special pilgrimage toward unity," a purpose in which a small company joined with him, and which, by the untiring work of Robert H. Gardiner, grew until it expressed itself in the historic Conference on Faith and Order just now held.

It was the group of men associated together in the Carnegie Peace Union which was largely influential in linking up the men and women of similar mind in many countries and bringing into being the World Alliance for the Promotion of International Friendship, to the presidency of which the Archbishop of Canterbury was elected at the recent meeting, and to the executive chairmanship of which Dr. Boynton was elected. At St. Beatenberg, Dr. S. A. Eliot, Dr. H. A. Atkinson and Hamilton Holt were prominent additions to the American delegation.

What was accomplished? It is time which must answer. Resolutions were passed, world conferences voted to be held, and other actions taken. Courageous utterances were made. One stands out clearly in my memory. The Bishop of Bombay made it. He was garbed in a bishop's uniform, his appearance seeming odd to my provincial eyes. Gaiters and cincture, with which latter his hands played nervously while talking; President Eliot's query to a preacher at Harvard who also wore a cincture came to my mind. "That was a good sermon, young man," said President Eliot, and, pointing to the girdle continued, "Do you think that thing helps you any?" So I was wondering as the bishop, in halting speech, went on. But I forgot the cincture and awkwardness of address and all the rest when I heard him say: "We want ministers of all denominations to be able to be acceptable in their ministries to all congregations. Therefore we would offer ordination to non-episcopal ministers. And if necessary, in order to be able to minister acceptably to their people, I would be willing to receive non-episcopal ordination." And I know from his voice that he meant it.

Bishop Brent, in speaking of the drawing together of the conference, made this arresting remark: "The competition of churches received a body blow from the united action of the pilgrims at this conference. Sheep stealing in the cattle world is held to be a crime. How then ought it to be viewed by the under-shepherds of the Good Shepherd?"

No day passed without eloquent, wise and consecrated utterances from men, who, though separated by far reaches of sea and land, nevertheless were united in spirit.

This was accomplished and I hold it the most significant accomplishment possible. As has been written in another connection, so it may be truthfully said of these men at these conferences: "They did not win, they were success."

For in all their relationships they "kept the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace."

A Student Conference in Czecho-Slovakia

Sidelights on the Religious Tendencies of the New Republic

By Sherwood Eddy

We have just concluded the first student conference ever held in Czecho-Slovakia. We are in an ancient Hapsburg feudal castle, a thousand years old, looking out across the deep moat, through the century-old trees flooded with sunshine. It is five hundred years since John Huss was burned at the stake (1415), three hundred years after the battle of White Mountain (1620) when Bohemia lost its independence and the Protestant Hussites and Moravian Brethren were subjected to fierce persecution. Their leaders were beheaded, their Bibles were burned, their language was forbidden, their schools were closed, the Roman Catholic religion was forced upon them by torture, and yet today, after five centuries of persecution, this nation stands free at last with the first stabilized Republic of Central Europe.

Long-Standing Prejudice Breaking Down

During the first Bible hour these students took into their hands a fresh copy of the Scripture, and many began for the first time in their lives to study this Book which will kindle a fire here that shall never again go out. Here are these students to whom the very words "religion," "church," "Christianity," and even "Christ" have so long been connected with crime, tyranny, inquisition and oppression that they have become loathsome—students who are atheists, free-thinkers, agnostics, materialists, Catholics, and a few Protestants, but mostly anti-churchmen; and here among these men we must gather at least twelve men, and spreading in widening circles, with the experience of Galilee, Calvary, and Pentecost, there must be reproduced the dynamic life that shall make Bohemia live again. How strange it is that one must win them back to faith in Jesus Christ through John Huss; for all agnostics, atheists, and anti-churchmen swear by this man who kindled their national Renaissance. But now, with splendid enthusiasm in their new discovery of Bible study, the prejudice of years is breaking down, and with the New Testaments the students come up asking for our autographs. I write "July 4–6, 1920," the two memorable dates of this week commemorating Washington and Huss, in this old castle, the former seat of a Hapsburg Austrian duke. It is now confiscated by the government and given over to the Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. as the first Northfield of free Bohemia.

I have just come from the closing meeting of this student conference. These students are the flower of the universities of the Czecho-Slovak Republic. There was a strong delegation from Prague, with its 15,000 students, one of the oldest in the world, founded in 1348. All the leading institutions were represented. These Slav students present a unique type in the student world. Three elements are found in strange combinations in their character. There is first that deep, basic temperament of the Slav—mystical, with a tendency to Pantheism, somber, with a vast capacity for sacrifice and suffering, keen intellect, warm affection, and a deep religious yearning. Superimposed upon this the Czech students have a strata of German rationalism, with a strong antipathy to the supernatural and a demand that everything should be proved at the bar of reason. They were far more thorough and searching in their mental processes than American students. Last of all, upon the surface there was a strong reaction against all organized religion as the result of the long centuries of oppression and persecution behind them; yet that deep, insatiable Slav heart hunger has ever yearned and reached out after God. Driven from the Church, it has sought other channels of expression.

Variety of Beliefs

In the Bible class this morning I asked the students what their previous faith had been, and endeavored to ascertain what currents of thought and religious influence had been flowing through their lives. Of the forty students present, I ascertained that eighteen had at one time been atheists, and five had come to this student conference as such. Nineteen had conceived of God in Pantheistic, impersonal terms. Nine had been attracted by Buddhism; seven by the Hindu doctrine of transmigration. An equal number had been under the influence of theosophy, spiritualism, and "new thought," while others had been influenced by Nietzsche or Tolstoi. Ten had come from Protestant homes. Twenty-five were nominal Catholics. Six were free-thinkers. Thirty confessed themselves strongly anti-church and anti-clerical. Seventeen had a deep prejudice against religion, and nine a strong aversion to prayer. All unanimously looked upon John Huss as their national hero and ideal. All but three had been deeply influenced by their study of the New Testament during the conference and had found it a new Book. All but one had received spiritual blessing in the conference.

I have never known, save in Russia, so large a proportion of students influenced by strange vagaries of thought, and driven into such tortuous channels of doubt as the result of their bitter experience of "religion." In Russia the Greek Church was identified with the Czarist reactionary régime, and was consequently abhorred by the students. In Germany the Protestant Church identified itself with militarism and the State, instead of with Christ and the people. In Austria the Roman Church identified itself with the Hapsburgs and the hellish tortures of the Inquisition, against freedom and justice. The result in each case has been atheism, agnosticism, infidelity, and immorality among the intellectuals, and an abhorrence of organized Christianity.

Besides a daily devotional Bible class, I had a series of apologetic addresses on Science and Religion, Reason and Faith, The Existence and Character of God, The Place of Christ, Prayer, What is Christianity? etc. At the beginning of the conference they would tolerate no hymns or audible prayer, and were suspicious of all "clericalism." In the afternoon we joined all together in a new and much-needed system of competitive sports, basket-ball, volley-ball, etc., as we took up the physical side of the triangle. At another hour we took up practical methods, social service, and organization.

Forced to Seek a Satisfying Faith

The conference was their own and delegates and speakers were chosen by the students themselves. In the middle of the conference a powerful address was made by a national leader, which, on strong rationalistic lines, tended to banish all revealed religion, a personal God, and many vital essentials. It looked as if the day was lost. But that afternoon one of the students was drowned while in swimming. A letter found in his clothes came to the students like a message from the life beyond. They were forced to face spiritual realities again and seek a satisfying faith.

Our closing meeting this morning in the conference lasted three hours. After speaking upon the subject, "What is a Christian?" I asked how many, out of sin, doubt, or infidelity, were ready to begin to follow Jesus Christ in a new life of fellowship with God and service for man. Some thirty men responded to this appeal, rose, and publicly confessed Christ. On the next question five men announced themselves earnest seekers after truth, who, though unable to believe in God, promised earnestly to study the teachings of Jesus, and, if they found God, to follow him.

Following these decisions, men were given an opportunity to tell what blessing they had received at the conference. I shall never forget these testimonies. Men who had been atheists, who had never read the Bible before, men from every shade of doubt and infidelity testified to having found new light or life, to having discovered a new Bible, and undreamed wealth in Christ. Strongly rational as they were, a number of the students were in tears as they spoke. They have adopted a new basis; they have today admitted their first members; and a Christian Student Movement is now firmly established here. The fires that smoldered about John Huss have leaped again to flame in the liberty of the new Czecho-Slovak Republic, and God's truth is marching on.

Move to Form National Church

A great movement has started in the Catholic Church here, breaking away from Rome to establish a national Church. In five months about 200,000 have joined the movement. The whole nation is now in a state of transition. A national church like that of England may be formed. I have just met the national leader of this new movement. They have adopted for their services the national language; they stand for a married priesthood, an open Bible, and the whole position maintained by Huss at the beginning of the Reformation five centuries ago.

There is the great bridge of Prague where the heads of the Bohemian nobility were hung to terrorize the population, and here in this city men and women were imprisoned, shot and hanged during this war by the agents of the degenerate Hapsburgs of Austria. But high over the city stands the great castle, now the residence of President Masaryk, the most learned and democratic ruler in the world. I stood in his study one evening at midnight looking over those 10,000 volumes in his library, where he quietly works in four different languages, and examined some of the score of works which he has himself produced. I was deeply impressed in my interview with the President. He is a great and humble man, who has suffered much for liberty and truth. He was condemned to death by Austria. His wife and daughters were imprisoned during the war and the former has never regained her health.

His daughter, who is a national leader in social service, gave a most helpful address at the student conference, and the President took a deep interest in the new student movement. I talked with him about the social program of the Republic and the movement in Russia, which I now hope to visit.

From Resentment to Faith in God

I have recently returned from a series of meetings among the soldiers and civilians in Bohemia and Moravia where 2,000 soldiers a night crowded the Y. M. C. A. huts, and, with far deeper intellectual interest than American soldiers, listened night after night in the most intense silence as we tried to lead them back from resentment left by years of oppression to faith in God. There under the shadow of the old castle in Brno with its instruments of torture, its racks and thumb-screws, red-hot irons, damp vaults, and corridors where the prisoners were chained naked to be eaten alive by hordes of hungry rats—there daily the soldiers were listening to a free and full gospel. Night after night in Olomouc officers and soldiers, professors and civilians not only listened to the addresses, but sat there for one or two hours afterwards, pouring out a steady stream of questions, eagerly seeking the truth, asking, "How can we prove the existence of God? How can we reconcile modern science and religion? Was Christ man or God? What is the meaning of life? How can I find a satisfying and dynamic religion?" etc. I have been asked to return to organize a national evangelistic campaign in Czecho-Slovakia. A native Huss or a Wesley is needed today to lead a great national movement of reformation and regeneration that could sweep this land like a fire.

The great national gathering of the Sokol Society is now on in Prague. There on the hill is the stadium filled and refilled with 135,000 spectators each day while 12,000 performers at a time go through the most marvelous drills I have ever witnessed. First men, then women, then boys, then girls; 12,000 in each company moving in perfect time to music through complicated exercises, lasting nearly an hour each, without one audible command and without one mistake. This marvelous athletic organization, embracing now nearly a million members, drilled and disciplined the nation, inspired it in years of gloom, gave it the courage that marched its legions across Siberia, held the people tenaciously to their dream of national independence, and finally gained their hard-won freedom.

A New Nation

As the performance of the day opens there is a blare of trumpets, a moment of breathless expectation, and 12,000 boys march into the great stadium. This is no dress parade, but it shows the results of disciplined exercise twice a week during the past years. Their drill is marvelous. No boys of any nation in the world today, no, not all the Boy Scouts of the world combined, could equal it. Another blare of trumpets and the boys march off, while 12,000 girls of the same age go through their wonderful drill in an exhibition of organized grace and beauty. The trumpets sound again; 12,000 men, from 20 to 50, march on and give a yet more marvelous exhibition, without one man out of step or time. When these 12,000 pairs of arms cut the air in unison it sounds like the breaking of a sea. Another blare of trumpets and 12,000 women march in to give another exhibition.

Thus in free Bohemia a nation is being born in a day. An intellectual Renaissance, a religious Reformation, and a social revolution are moving the nation to its depths. The future is bright for the new Czecho-Slovak Republic.

From Day to Day

By Allen Chesterfield

Every city man should manage to spend at least two or three days in the year on a regular farm, run by a native American who knows his business. Such a person can still be found in New England, although many of the best holdings have gone into the hands of French-Canadians and Polacks.

The vacation period furnished me no happier three days than the ones I spent on a New Hampshire hilltop, where a man who has lived most of his life in the midst of the uproar of New York acquired, a few years ago, a two-hundred-acre farm. Through diligent toil and wise management he has made it one of the best in the state. Don't talk to this man about the joys and advantages of urban residence. He is as happy today as when he was laboring from morn till night at a desk charged with the financial responsibilities of large organizations. It was not because he failed therein that he decided to cut ties that had grown strong and precious and to go back to the soil. Perhaps the fact that as a boy in a remote Vermont town he learned the rudiments of farming had something to do with his change of base. More influential was his belief that agriculture must continue to be one of the bases of American prosperity. At all events he had made for himself and his household a comfortable and charming home. There in his amply furnished library, when winter winds howl without and whirling snowstorms dim the lights of the city in the valley twelve miles below, he sits and reads the standard books, which were seldom opened during his busy days in the city.

But he is no gentleman farmer for most of the year he has to be up betimes to take care of his own stock, carry his milk to the station and attend to the innumerable duties that go with farming. While you repose comfortably in his prophet's chamber in the early morning you hear the tinkle of the cowbells as he drives the wearers of them to pasture. You camp down on his velvet lawn and through the open doors of the barn watch him with his men pitching oats into the loft. No, even with modern conveniences a farmer's life today means hard physical labor and utter indifference to eight-hour days. That is why help on the farms is so scarce. Maybe we shall have to draft young men for such work, as we did for the war. Would that more of them and more and more men in middle life, like my friend, could see something in farm life besides long hours and exposure to the hot sunshine and the biting blasts! Would that they could realize that though money comes a little harder it doesn't slip away so fast as in the factory towns! Would that they could appreciate the compensations—succulent vegetables, fresh from garden and field, plenty of milk and cream, the rides along winding and entrancing country roads, which even a cheap automobile furnishes, and the many offsets that come in the simple joys and pleasant fellowships of country life in the chance to extend hospitality, which few dwellers in city apartments possess, and above all, in the realization that he, who, at this time when the world is so short for bread and has to pay so highly for what it gets, makes two blades of wheat grow where only one grew before, is a true contributor to the maintenance of civilization.

Not from his own lips, but through other agencies, I learned of this man's usefulness in the town which has now become his home—in the Grange, in the church, in civic and patriotic undertakings. How it would refresh any country church if an experienced Christian layman from the city, who had all his life borne an active part in the work of the Kingdom, should bring to it his willingness to work and his progressive spirit.

The church in this particular town had a revival forty-five years ago in which Y. M. C. A. workers from Massachusetts assisted the local pastor. The results of it are still felt. It brought into membership members of many of the leading families. Since then the church has experienced the vicissitudes through which most country churches pass. A great revival is a splendid thing in the background of the church's history provided it serves as an inspiration to present-day progress and growth and not as a historical landmark only. As I looked out of one of the western wondows of my prophet's chamber at the white spire, jutting above the trees two miles away, it seemed to me not only the most picturesque feature in the lovely landscape, but the symbol of all that has been best in New England life in these last three hundred years, and the agency right at hand, which if properly employed can save our rural communities from decay.

The Lambeth Appeal

Comment of American Papers

No Real Concession

The appeal of 1920 registers a brotherliness of attitude, a warmth of affection, and a recognition of the spiritual unity of believers which are as welcome as, unfortunately, they are unusual. . . . The Episcopal clergy will "accept some form of commission or recognition" and from the same motive the ministers of non-episcopal churches would "accept a commission through Episcopal ordination as obtaining for them a ministry throughout the whole fellowship." It is here that the denominations are likely to pause. Since they have always been willing to receive the Protestant Episcopal clergy on equal terms with their own ministers, they will see no real concession in this offer to "accept such recognition," while the implication that their own ministerial orders are inadequate without the further imposition of the hands of an Anglican bishop is not likely to lead the way to unity.—The Christian Advocate.

No Real Equality

In plain words, under this plan, an Episcopalian rector would go into a Methodist or other "separated" church with full authority, because he is Episcopalian; but the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Reformed, or any other "separated" brother would go into an Episcopal church only after being ordained by the Episcopal bishop. Otherwise his standing is nothing, in the proposed universal Church. This leaves us, of course, exactly where we were when we started, except there is an official and unfeigned recognition that the grace of God does operate outside Anglican orders. The Anglican logic stops short of doing the will of God. And so Lambeth fails in deed while it quickens by its spirit.—The Christian Register.

The Humility of the Lambeth Conference

There have been times when the dream of church unity seemed well nigh hopeless. But that dream will continue to trouble the conscience of the Church. In spite of pride of opinion, of self-assertion, the work of unity is going forward. We can think of no finer spirit in which to attack the problem than that displayed at Lambeth. Its humility is its witness to the Holy Spirit.—The Churchman.

Barriers Crumbling

It is the prelates from distant shores who have saved the situation. In their own land they happily know nothing of the penalties and the snobberies of a state church. Thus their outlook is broader and kindlier and there is no doubt that the decision of the Conference to recognize the Christianty of non-Episcopalians is due in a preponderating degree to the votes and the speeches of bishops from overseas. The barriers between the churches had begun to crumble. The Lambeth decisions will accelerate the process. It is too soon to decide what will be the result of these more brotherly proposals. But the readers of these jottings may be assured that at any rate Wesleyans and indeed all Methodists will not be lacking in their desire to bring to an end all that smacks of jealousy and division in the life of the churches.—English Correspondent of Zion's Herald.

A New Testament Ministry

Probably such a ministry as the bishops have in mind cannot be provided without the imposition of the hands of a bishop, but is that the only valid, New Testament ministry? They would say "Yes"; but the free churches say "No." Of course, the bishops believe that the claim made for the episcopate is justified, for they are godly and honest men. But hundreds of thousands of equally honest and godly men do not believe this; and right here is found the abiding obstacle to organic union. Honest men differ upon fundamental matters.—The Baptist.

The First Requisite to Union

The Bishop of Zanzibar is known throughout the Anglican communion as an uncompromising upholder of the idea of apostolic succession in the ministry. It was he who made a great stir over the administration of the holy sacrament to some non-episcopal Christians by a neighboring bishop. It is interesting to note that he has been perceptibly mellowed by recent events in his communion. Following the recent Lambeth Conference he said: "The bishops testify simply and solemnly to the fact that God has richly blessed non-episcopal ministries as effective means of grace." This is, of course, a cautious and studied concession, but it shows that a change has come in the mind of this particular bishop. There can be no Christian union without a cordial recognition of the Christian status of the ministry and membership of each body participating in the union. Baptists and Disciples cannot unite with any Christian group until they are willing frankly to recognize that unimmersed members of other Christian churches are Christians and members of the church. Episcopalians will find union talk futile without recognizing fully the ministry of the evangelical churches as a valid ministry of Christ.—The Christian Century.

Less Generous Than Before

This, so far from being a more generous offer of fraternity to other churches than the bishops made thirty-two years ago, is more selfish and less ingenuous. It speaks of a ministry "acknowledged by every church." Any one denomination objecting to the ministry of the others can hinder union, under this specification, until all the rest come around to accept its notions. And that is precisely the end which the bishops lately gathered at Lambeth have in view—they expect to object to Presbyterial and Congregational ordination until the non-episcopal churches decide to take on bishops as the only way to escape discord. It would have been very much more to the credit of Lambeth if in 1920 as in 1888 it had said in explicit terms rather than by labyrinthine circumlocution what it meant—identically the same in one year as in the other.—The Continent.

Exclusively Interpreted

It is evident that the bishops deem that the time long prayed for when Protestantism should break up and a general return to the Church should be possible is near at hand. Whether they be right or wrong, it is undoubtedly our duty to prepare for that break-up; and especially is it the duty of Catholic Churchmen to be most sympathetic and to leave no stone unturned to see that the way of return be made as easy as possible while yet the Catholic securities of the Church be in no way undermined. We must carry out the bishops' ideal of setting forth what is Catholic rather than what is Anglican. . . . This is much more than Anglican bishops have ever said before. It can only mean that if the Catholic world sees a bar to unity in the circumstances under which the historic ministry was preserved in England during the period in which the Ordinal has been attacked, successfully or unsuccessfully, their own participation in our ordinations such as may cure whatever they may deem to be defects will be welcomed, provided that we can reach the stage where nothing else than this stands in the way of reunion. Thus holding, they are justified in expressing the hope "that the same motive would lead ministers who have not received it to accept a commission through Episcopal ordination, as obtaining for them a ministry throughout the whole fellowship." Acknowledging "all those who believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, and have been baptized into the name of the Holy Trinity, as sharing with us membership in the universal Church of Christ which is his Body," there is no trace of the popular heresy that all denominations are integral parts of that Church.—The Living Church.

Plans for American Board Meeting

The officers of the American Board are anticipating a meeting of quite unusual interest at Marietta, O., Oct. 12-15. The invitation has been extended by the churches and the college, and great efforts are being put forth by the pastors of Marietta, President Parsons of Marietta College and Mr. W. W. Mills, who for many years has been a devoted corporate member of the Board. Although Marietta is somewhat apart from the usual routes of travel, a large attendance is already assured. Friends of the Board have learned that often the most valuable meetings are held in the smaller cities, where the coming of the missionaries and the officers of the Board constitutes an important event in the city's life. The attendance at Marietta will be largely increased by the fact that the local committee have invited as their guests all the Home Missionary pastors of the state.

The program as usual will be rich in the number of missionaries who will speak as representing the Board's widely scattered field. Some twenty missionaries will take part and will bring stirring stories from the fields. One feature which will delight the hearts of many is the appearance of Rev. Chauncey Goodrich, the "grand old man of the American Board," after fifty years of service in China. An innovation will be the placing of Secretary Barton's annual survey in the evening, when the entire time will be occupied by the survey, illustrated by stereopticon views. Robert A. Woods of the South End House, Boston, who has recently returned from a world tour, will speak on Missions and Social Problems in Foreign Lands. There will be the usual commissioning service for volunteers, when Rev. D. A. Poling will give an address on The Appeal to Mission Service Today.

All things considered, the program impresses us as one of the richest the Board has ever offered. The Congregationalist will give reports of the sessions but no one who is able to attend should miss the meeting.

Object for Intercession

For Those Who Are Tempted to Forget God:

We would remember thee, our Father, not only when we have some gift to beg, but at all times and in all experiences. And we would ask for guidance and satisfaction, not for ourselves alone but also for those who in the midst of temptations or the stress of trial or in the allurements of the material world are tempted to forget thee. Forget us not but recall us to the strength and comfort of thy presence and let thy joy be our portion evermore. In the name of Christ. Amen.—R.

OUR READERS' FORUM

The Church as Political Artificer

Dear Mr. Editor:

In your comments on my letter on "Inadvertent Autocracy," issue of Aug. 5, there is an unintended misstatement which I wish to correct. You there say: "Not long ago Mr. Dumm advocated his position—which seems to us equivalent to that of Messrs. Johnson, Borah and Reed—before his own local conference in New Hampshire, but after the subject had been duly discussed the Conference supported the League by a vote of fifty-eight to four." I have never advocated "my position" before any conference of churches. In May, 1919, a resolution was reported in the closing session of the New Hampshire Conference in favor of the League of Nations which, as it was worded, I should have voted for. An amendment was moved to urge the Senators, and that I opposed, on the ground that we were not qualified to take such action from our present knowledge (even the Treaty was not yet in the hands of the Senate), nor was there time for deliberation and the maturing of a conclusion in the haste of closing the Conference, even if we had the facts, and under the circumstances I held it unwarrantable to force a citizen to record himself in such a fashion either for or against such a world-determining proposition, on the sole ground of membership in a religious body. Besides myself, the chairman of the committee on resolutions was among the four who voted against the amendment, even as somewhat softened down, but, as you say, fifty-eight voted its adoption, and many such things have been done in many places since. In all this I did not "advocate" a "position" and I may be permitted to add that I had with great restraint distinctly refrained from doing so in the annual sermon I had preached before the Conference.

The paragraph, in my manuscript appended to the above, but which was printed separately in the issue of Sept 2, so altered the text as to make me say that the resolution I quoted which I had offered in May, 1919 before the above event, had instead been put forward this summer and even since the Council in Boston.

Alfred Dumm.

We deeply regret these wholly unintentional misrepresentations of Mr. Dumm's position and procedure.—The Editors.

Harding and the League

Dear Mr. Editor:

It is hardly profitable at this time to call attention to the many conspicuous infelicities that have marked President Wilson's course respecting the League of Nations. "Let the dead past bury its dead," while we look forward hopefully to the future.

If Senator Harding can be credited with a fair degree of common honesty he is no "bitter-ender," but is anxious to see our nation meet fairly its responsibilities among the other nations of the world. Without going into minute details, he has announced his purpose, if elected president, to summon a company of our best statesmen, without respect to party affiliations, to devise a plan of co-operative action with other nations for securing peace throughout a large part of the civilized world. Doubtless this can be done and our nation can assume an honorable place among the great nations of the world.

What Governor Cox thinks or plans need not here be asked, his course recently having made his election to the presidency to all appearances impossible.

Facts Regarding Dr. Herring

Dear Mr. Editor:

May I make a request, through you, of the Congregational constituency the country over? I am working on a biography of our father, Dr. Hubert C. Herring. I aim to serve as editor, that the volume may prove a medium through which he can speak for himself and his friends can speak about him.

The volume should gather up, in a personal and intimate way, the experiences of his large ministry. I therefore appeal to those who have letters in their possession, which might be of value, for the use of such material. I will return them promptly. I also appeal for accounts from any who may be willing to set down their recollections and estimates of the man. I shall particularly appreciate written accounts of specific incidents. All such help will be deeply appreciated.

A Modern Jonah

Dear Mr. Editor:

During the months of July and August the Protestant churches of this city are holding union services on Sunday evening on the Court House lawn. . . . One of the churches of the place is at present without a pastor and on last Sunday evening the man who supplied this pulpit was invited to speak at the evening service and did so, taking for his theme the Authenticity of the Word of God. In connection with his reference to the Book of Jonah, he told the following story in all seriousness and declared that it was true in every detail: "Some few years ago five men were fishing in a boat off the coast of Massachusetts near the city of Boston when a huge fish ran under the boat and upset it, throwing all the men into the water. While the men were struggling in the water, the fish appeared at the surface and swallowed one of the men. . . . The four survivors saw their comrade disappear feet foremost down the fish's throat. . . . They succeeded in regaining the boat, righting it and set out in pursuit of the monster, harpooning it and shooting into it as they could. Thus they pursued it until dark compelled them to give up the chase. In the morning they discovered that the fish had died from the wounds inflicted and had washed ashore. The men set upon the fish with knives to recover the body of their lost comrade. They soon had him out, and to their surprise he was still alive. They sent him to a hospital (presumably in Boston) and in four weeks the man was as well and sound as he was before his marvelous experience."

Now in as much as this is reputed to have happened near your city, I am writing you for a verification of it.

Two things make me certain that it never happened. One is that it is palpably impossible and the other is that in this day and age, the man would certainly have taken to the lecture platform and exploited so wonderful an experience. However, I will suspend further judgment until I hear what you have to say in regard to it.

The minister who told this story is a pastor in another denomination and holds a fairly prominent pulpit in this state. He stated in his sermon that the thing that makes unbelievers is the inconsistency of church members. I am inclined to think that such stories as the above told seriously from a Christian pulpit do more to make unbelievers than any other one thing.

New Hampton, Io. W. D. Spiker.

Editors' Note.—If the alleged episode ever took place it has failed to come to our attention though we have been pretty diligent readers of the Boston dailies for many years. If any of our readers were eye-witnesses of the event or got the account first hand from the alleged participants, we trust they will at once communicate with our Iowa brother. This is a wonderful world in which we live.

Why Not Another Redactor?

Dear Mr. Editor:

I am interested in a recent article by Shelton Bissell, entitled Helping the Bible to Meet the Man. I have long been interested in this very thing. The lawyer says, "There is too much in the Bible," and "I do not know where I am going when I get inside it." I want to emphasize the first point briefly.

There is too much in the Bible. Not for the scholar, the builder of theological systems or the stickler for creeds. But too much for the children, the busy people (not ministers or theologians) and the average Christian seeking such reading as will enrich devotion. A few examples will illustrate my meaning. One story says, "God made man." Then along comes another story saying, "and there was not a man to till the ground." One story says that Noah was commanded to take into the ark "two of every sort" and adds "thus did Noah." Along comes another story saying Noah was asked to take "seven and seven of the clean" and "not clean two." And then Noah forgot or disobeyed or was unable to secure the stipulated number; for they went in "two and two."

Then there is endless confusion in getting the children of Israel across or through the Red Sea. Two men are named as being the father-in-law to Moses.

Some one wrote a beautiful Psalm (51:1-17) stating that God had no delight in burnt offerings. All of which did not meet the approval of a later musician who added two stanzas calling for "burnt offerings," thus urging what the author of the hymn said was not wanted. That is, as our good lawyer says, "there is too much in the Bible," especially when one statement contradicts the other.

The redactors have done well in attempting to harmonize the documents; but scrupulous care to leave nothing out has gotten too much in. Why not another redactor, a man with sympathetic scholarship, guided by the Spirit of God, why not such a man who shall retell the story not putting in too much? This would be putting in readable form what Dr. Brown somewhere calls "A Bible within the Bible," a "Little Book."

And this not for the legends only but for the whole Book, omitting all those writings which have little or no application to modern Christian living. This for our children, for daily reading in the family and for busy people in devotion.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

On Religious Themes

Bringing Up John, by Edward Leigh Pell (Revell). The big need of American Christianity is for mothers who will sift out from the religious ideas on which they have been brought up what Christ really taught. So says Dr. Pell and proceeds to do some sifting. He has done a good piece of work—in suggesting what we should teach our children about God, prayer, religion, the Bible, sacrifice, the supernatural and most of the fundamentals.

The Church and the World Peace, by Richard J. Cooke (Abingdon Press). The writer, a Methodist bishop, believes that the League of Nations may do much to prevent war, but it cannot eradicate the desire for war. He calls for a league of Christendom supplementing the political League of Nations. A united Protestantism at least and more frequent intercourse between the churches of Europe and the United States, for Christian influence through the press, for an effectual propaganda and foundation of world peace.

The Christian Home, by William Wallace Faris (Presbyterian Board). A text-book of thirteen lessons for Bible classes. It is comprehensive in its scope, taking up themes like Guiding Habit Formation, Helping the Child to Study and The Child at Play.

Modern Reader's Bible for Schools, The New Testament, by Richard G. Moulton (Macmillan). A very interesting arrangement of the New Testament in literary form, without the usual chapter or text divisions. The text is not complete. In the Book of Acts and the epistles "some of the details that are of local or temporary importance are omitted," as for example the passage in Acts explaining that "all that believed were together, and had all things common." So in the epistles, each one is presented in a summary, to which are appended "notable passages of the epistle." This limitation is sometimes disappointing. Nevertheless the volume is admirable as an aid to Bible study. The text used is that of the revision. There are good introductions to all of the books of the New Testament.

XVI Revelations of Divine Love, shewed to Mother Juliana of Norwich (Dutton). Mother Juliana was one of the saints with an utterance of mediæval conventual life. The English Norwich has always been a center of religious influence and movement. She was herself a recluse who wrote these revelations more than half a millennium ago while Edward III was still king after his victories in France and Wickliffe was preaching and translating. The text has been slightly modernized, a list of the words substituted being appended. In spite of the monastic point of view and the unfamiliar diction these meditations well illustrate the real continuity and unity of Christian experience in the life with Christ. The introduction by Father Tyrrell interprets the heart of the book, which is a rich storehouse of devotional material drawn from a deep of unfamiliar Christian experience.

Sadhu Sundar Singh, by Mrs. Arthur Parker (Revell). This is the story of one of the most remarkable personalities developed by Christian missions in India. A native Sikh, his conversion to Christianity led him to become the "Apostle of India," adopting the garb and life of poverty of a Hindu Sadhu, or holy man. Regardless of persecution and hardship he traveled throughout India and made converts wherever he went, even among the Himalayas and in forbidden Tibet. His later travels have taken him to China and Japan. It is a thrilling and soul-stirring story of a Christlike life, wholly devoted to seeking to carry the gospel to those who know it not.

The Three-Hour Sermon, by Paul Kanamori (Revell). The author is an evangelist known as the "Moody of Japan." He preaches only this one sermon, which requires just three hours for delivery. He has preached it over eight hundred times in his native Japan and thereby has secured nearly 50,000 conversions. He proposes to devote the remaining years of his life to this evangelistic effort. Under the three heads, God, Sin and Salvation, Mr. Kanamori explains the Christian religion with remarkable clearness and adapts the message most effectively to the life and thought of the Japanese.

The New Life and Other Sermons, by Herbert Booth Smith, D. D. (Revell). Dr. Smith is pastor of Immanuel Presbyterian Church in Los Angeles. His ministry is popular and his methods of thought and expression keep close to the comprehension and enjoyment of the average man, as these sermons bear testimony.

The Memoir of Principal James Denney, D. D., by T. H. Walker (Marshall Press). Professor Denney was one of the great religious teachers of our generation. Mr. Walker has given us a careful and sympathetic study of his career and of the elements which made his greatness. The story leaves a clear impression and wins the affectionate reverence of the reader. It is prefaced by an admirable portrait.

Immortality, by William Newton Clarke (Yale University Press). Dr. Clarke was a genius as a teacher of Christianity, and his power both of presenting truth and holding attention is well illustrated in this reprint of addresses delivered at different times and under diverse circumstances. For the confirming of faith and for a sense of the deep-lying charm of Christianity as interpreted by a master mind, the book is eminently rewarding.

For Boys and Girls

Marion Frear's Summer, by Margaret Ashmun (Macmillan). Pleasing in its complete naturalness is this story for girls of from ten to fourteen. Well written and constructed, it deals with an unusual situation and has a woodsy background. A mother and daughter have been living alone for several years on a small farm in a Western wilderness. Their neighbors are few and mostly foreign. Marion is a good farmer and a worthy pupil of her lovely mother, but she is like a bird who "can't get out." The spell seems to be broken with the coming of a jolly family of young people to a near-by cabin, one summer. The newcomers are strong characters and very likable, though not always models of the domestic virtues, and they change Marion's horizon completely.

The Spartan Twins, by Lucy Fitch Perkins (Houghton Mifflin). Still come the "Twin" books which introduce American children to those of other lands. This time they are to meet children of ancient Greece. Dion and Daphne are twin brother and sister living near Athens in the age of Pericles. The story is charming in itself and so are the illustrations. Besides, we learn how boys and girls were dressed in those days, what they had to eat and what they were expected to do. A most exciting climax comes with a certain visit they made, with their father, in Athens.

Boy Scouts on the Trail, by John Garth (Barse and Hopkins). Published with the approval of the Boy Scouts of America, this is a lively story of Scout adventure during the Great War. The boys discover a German wireless, prevent a plot, entertain the soldiers and make themselves generally useful.

The Light Heart, by Maurice Hewlett (Holt). This is the story of Thormod, the Norseman, a poet and a mighty warrior. It tells how he enlisted under King Olaf and how he avenged the death of Thorgur, his blood-brother. It is rather a fierce and bloody story of the old fighting days but exceedingly well told by a master of the art.

True-Blue, by T. E. Gratton-Smith (Holt). A stirring tale of two boys and a girl in Australia during the early years of the war. German spies are plotting to lay mines and blow up transports but are discovered in time and in the thrilling adventure the youngsters all have a share. Surf-riding, swimming matches and other events, mingled with secret service, make a lively story.

Five Funny Fables, by F. B. Kirkman (Macmillan). These are familiar fables (Sour Grapes, The Fox and the Crow, The Fox and the Stork, etc.), retold for children from five to nine. There are suggestions, also, of ways in which these stories may be acted out by children.

Miscellaneous

Sanity in Sex, by William J. Fielding (Dodd, Mead). This volume opens with chapters describing the government action for the prevention or treatment of venereal disease in the army and navy, especially the educational methods employed and it also refers, in a chapter on "Sex Hygiene in Industry," to the important educational work undertaken by many large industrial organizations for the benefit of their employees. Other topics discussed are "Instruction in Public Schools," "Conjugal Happiness," "Sex Ignorance," "Birth Control" and "Psycho-Analysis." It is a sensible discussion of the whole matter.

Advertising as a Vocation, by Frederick J. Allen (Macmillan). Young men who are attracted by the call of publicity work, and others already engaged in it, will find this handbook full of information and suggestion. The main purpose of the volume is indicated by its title. It considers the business as a means of serving the public by providing honest and needed information. The chapter on "Advertising Ethics" places the business on as high and honorable a position as is held by any profession.

The Almosts, by Dr. Helen MacMurchy (Houghton Mifflin). An interesting study of the mentally defective. It shows how in literature such characters as Wamba in Ivanhoe, Maggy in Little Dorrit, Barnaby Rudge, Smike in Nicholas Nickleby, Silly Billy in Put Yourself in His Place, Quasimodo in Notre Dame de Paris—and others in the writings of George Macdonald, Stevenson, Hawthorne, etc. are presented with keen understanding of their real qualities. Sometimes the novelists have indicated cure where it is impossible, but for the most part they have pointed the way to the proper treatment of the feeble minded. The author presents each character and comments on the lessons suggested, with a final chapter on the present-day understanding of the serious and important problem.

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Baptism and Temptation of Jesus

International Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 10. Matt. 3:13-4:11.

1. Fulfilling All Righteousness. John had not only caught the popular imagination but he had commanded also a deep mood of repentance. He was administering baptism as a sign of this new moral attitude toward life. Jesus came and sought the rite. Of course it was not consistent with the message of John. This young Carpenter from Nazareth was not a penitent. But Jesus did not accept the exception which John naturally desired to make. He was ready to pass through the experiences of the average man in order that he might exemplify as well as realize what it means to express the normal relations of a man to God. Jesus fulfilled all righteousness and thus became the Captain of our salvation.

2. The Son of God's Good Pleasure. It is not easy to render into accurate English words the full meaning of the testimony given to Christ's character at the baptism. It means more than simply that Jesus "pleases" God, as a father is pleased when his children do well. God's "good pleasure" is realized when we share his loving purpose and accept his gracious guidance with complete co-operation. God is pleased with us when he finds that we are responding fully to his love and desire for us by blending our wills with his in the filial trust of sonship.

3. The Test. We speak of this most important experience in the development of character as "temptation." The root idea is a "test." It is like the tests to which all materials used in great ships or buildings are subjected before they are finally allowed to take their place in the finished structure. Here is a piece of steel which belongs in the ship. If it could reason it would say, when it was being subjected to the test of strain, This is a welcome test; if I pass it I shall be able to discharge the function for which I was designed. We can reason. We know that the tests that prove our fitness for the place where God means to use us are what we would choose to have passed upon us. Jesus met three tests:

(a) The Test of the Physical. The stones looked like loaves of bread if one only were tired and hungry enough to use his imagination. Jesus was conscious of his body; he knew what hunger and thirst meant. He knew, also, that there were wonderful powers in him. So when the suggestion came that he should use this power for physical ends, it was a real test. Jesus rose above it. He vindicated the supremacy of the spiritual. He proved that a man may not divert to a lower end the purposes and powers which have been given him for spiritual achievement. What are some of the tests of a similar nature that come to the modern man?

(b) The Test of Leadership. Jesus felt the challenge and pull of a young man's healthy ambition to lead his comrades and his generation. He knew he had wonderful powers at his command. Should he leap unharmed from the high walls of the temple, land among the people below, and thus prove that he was God's endowed and chosen leader? Surely he could come much more swiftly and surely to the goal of his earthly mission in this way. But was this spectacular method the best one? Would the loyalties created in this way last? Or should Jesus choose the way of friendship, patient teaching and self-sacrifice as the way to permanent spiritual power? He answered the question in the right way; but it led him straight to Calvary. Must we meet similar tests?

(c) The Test of World Dominion. The final form of the test came in facing the possibility and the method of securing world dominion. To every young man, conscious of power, comes the appeal in some form to attempt to secure the mastery of the world by the use of methods that are devilish instead of divine. It was a real temptation. Perhaps Jesus of Nazareth might have become another Napoleon or Cæsar if he had adopted Satan's program. And the world would have lost its Christ. Jesus chose the program of the Father in heaven instead of the program of the father of lies; and through an uplifted cross he is drawing the world to himself. Must we meet a similar test?

The Christian and Christianity

Who is the Christian? For the answer, let us go to the earliest written records of Jesus' life and teachings. They are found in the first three gospels.

"Come ye after me." Matt. 4:19. Those who hunger and thirst after righteousness are filled; the merciful obtain mercy; the pure in heart see God; peacemakers shall be called sons of God. Matt. 5:6-9. "Love your enemies . . . that ye may be sons of your father; . . . for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good." Matt. 5:44, 45. To be a son of God is to treat people as God treats them. "Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness." Matt. 6:33. "All things therefore whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them: for this is the law and the prophets." Matt. 7:12. "Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven." Matt. 7:21. "Whosoever would save his life shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it." Matt. 16:25. Inasmuch as ye did it or did it not unto one of these least, ye did it or did it not unto me. Matt. 25:40, 45.

"Who is my mother and my brethren? . . . Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother and sister and mother." Mark 3:33, 35. A lawyer asked Jesus, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" And he said to him, "What is written in the law? How readest thou?" And he answering said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself." And he said unto him, "Thou hast answered right: this do and thou shalt live." Luke 10:25-28.

Zaccheus restored what he had taken wrongfully and did righteousness. Jesus said, "Today is salvation come to this house." Luke 19:9. The prodigal went into a far country and made a fool of himself. Then he came to himself and went back to his father's house and his father received him. That is just the way God does with us.

The Religion of Jesus

God is his Father and is wholly adequate.

The Father's will is his one law of life.

The Son must always be guided by love or good will.

Good will is shown in service and sacrifice even unto Calvary.

Life is found by losing it and is lost by saving it.

Persons are the supremely valuable and sacred thing in the world.

The Kingdom of God (living according to the will of God) is the supreme good, to be sought first, and possessed at whatever cost.

Immortality is as necessary and sure as God and his goodness.

Such was Jesus' own personal religion.

Did he suggest any other for us?

"Forgive us our debts as we also have forgiven our debtors." In this we pray not to be forgiven except as we forgive. Forgiveness of us by God can have no meaning unless it produces the same attitude of forgiveness in us toward others. The forgiven debtor in Matt. 18 had his forgiveness withdrawn because he did not also forgive the man indebted to him. And Jesus concluded, "So shall also my heavenly Father do unto you, if ye forgive not every one his brother from your hearts." Matt. 18:35. Jesus can save us only so far as he can make us like himself, make saviors of us.

Christianity is Jesus' way of life as he lived it and taught it and his effort to bring us into the same way of life. To be a Christian Jesus says is to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, to treat men as God treats them, to do the will of God. According to Jesus, doing the will of God gives us entrance to his kingdom; makes us a member of his brotherhood.

What is that will of God? Jesus makes it clear and Paul follows him in this; that it is all summed up in one thing—Love—universal good will; love to God and love to man. Jesus was a life giver, not a rule giver. He did not lay down external rules and laws. He sought for people a new birth of life within, which would make them think about life as God thinks and take the same attitude toward fellowmen that God takes. No single word of Jesus indicates that anything which he did is in any way to exempt us from bearing our own cross, whatever it may be, just as he bore his, or from sacrificing our lives, if necessary, just as he sacrificed his. He even says that we are to give our lives a ransom for many even as he gave his.

And when Peter rebuked him for saying that he must go to Jerusalem and be crucified, Jesus

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

The Teacher and the Kingdom of God

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 3-9

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Eph. 4:11-32; Isa. 54:11-17.

The Problems of Unfolding. A great responsibility rests upon the teacher for the unfolding of the human consciousness. Rightly considered also the teacher's desk is a great opportunity of growth as well as of helping others to grow. Under our system direct religious teaching is seldom possible in the school; but it makes all the difference in the world whether a teacher lives in personal relations to God and with a constant sense of the responsibilities of citizenship in his kingdom. For much, I had almost said most, of the teaching we get is quite outside of the use of books and unconscious both for the teacher and the taught. If one lives in the Kingdom of God the ways and thoughts of the kingdom will appear in life and thought. For it is life the teacher has to deal with and life is not a stone to be carved but a germ to be unfolded and developed. And the qualities of each child's mind and disposition are individual. It would be well to ask a Christian teacher, or a little group of Christian teachers, to tell a little about this problem of individuality and unfolding and the conditions of good and Christian teaching.

How Can the Church Help the School? First by being aware of it. Church and school in some localities I have known seemed to be as little aware one of the other as frogs on two sides of a river pool. They are more or less engaged in the same work, but they have no relations. The Roman Catholic Church knows better than that, and we ought to. Does your church ever inquire into the condition of the schools, or take thought for the improvement of the schools, or pray for the schools in your community? There ought to be some way in which the churches, or at least Christians, because they are Christians, could show some helpful, but not meddlesome, interest in the work of the teachers, and in the teachers themselves as agents of the community and helpers in the unfolding of the life and thought and character of its children. If the churches work together as they ought, the teachers connected with those churches would be an informal committee to suggest such intelligent knowledge and focus such natural interest on school work and school improvement.

How Can the School Help the Church? If the Universal Church were manifest and triumphant in our communities, the school would be its direct instrument. As it is, we can only ask that Christian teachers should keep the atmosphere of the Universal Church of Christ in their own life and that their teachings shall be conformable to it. Nothing would help the church more than full Christian life and deepening Christian character on the part of teachers in the schools. They pass on the torch of character as well as of learning from generation to generation. More almost than the rest of us, they are lights in the world, cities set on a hill which cannot be hid.

THE CONTAGION OF HAPPINESS

Serve the Lord with gladness.—Ps. 100:2.

If good people would but make their goodness agreeable and simple instead of frowning in their virtue, how many would they win to the good cause.—James Usher.

Christians are called upon to vindicate their Christianity by their joyfulness. If they persist in being somber, despondent, dejected, heartless, then they persist in inflicting cruelty upon the Son of God: their despair does not end in itself or upon themselves, it exercises an evil contagion which brings other men into bondage.—Joseph Parker.

Joy is for all men. It does not depend on circumstances, or condition; if it did, it could only be for the few. It is not the fruit of good luck, or of fortune, or even of outward success which all men cannot have. It is of the soul, or the soul's character; it is the wealth of the soul's own being, when it is filled with the spirit of Jesus, which is the spirit of eternal love.—Horace Bushnell.

I've found a friend, O such a friend,
So kind and true and tender!
So wise a counselor and guide,
So mighty a defender!
From him who loves me now so well
What power my soul shall sever?
Shall life or death, shall earth or hell?
No, I am his forever.
—James G. Small.

Happy is the man who has that in his soul which acts upon the dejected as April airs upon violet roots. Gifts from the hand are silver and gold, but the heart gives that which neither silver nor gold can buy. To be full of goodness, full of cheerfulness, full of sympathy, full of helpful hope, causes a man to carry blessings of which he is himself as unconscious as a lamp is of its own shining. Such an one moves on human life as stars move over dark seas to bewildered mariners; as the sun wheels, bringing all the seasons with him from the south.—Henry Ward Beecher.

A sweet tone is a messenger of God, and a right harmony and sequence of such tones is a little gospel.—George Macdonald.

Make us true witnesses, O God, of the joy that comes into the heart when thou art with us in our every day's experience. O Master, who hast called thine own disciples the light of the world, grant us our part in that forthshining of faith and grateful obedience! Come, Spirit of God, our Advocate and Teacher, and form in us the image of Christ, that we may live for ministry and rejoice that our names are written in heaven! Make thy church joyful in work and worship, yes, even in suffering and trial. So by thy grace let us go with singing hearts upon our way. In the name of Christ. Amen.

The Food that Satisfies

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 10-16

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Bible Verses that Help. Ps. 119:33-40.

Light from the Bible Passage

The best wisdom is from God. His way is the wisest way. How to know about that way, how to understand it, how to observe it implicitly—are the gifts of the Bible. Few catch the note of delight and deep satisfaction in the Bible that the Psalmist had. This comes from experiences that grow out of the daily use of God's word. Its truths are unquestioned because they have been tested in living and found true (v. 38).

Another section of this Psalm throws added light (vs. 97-104). The Psalmist not only appreciated his Bible: he loved it. For that reason he kept its truth by him all day long. It steadied his feet. It gave him practical wisdom. It was delightful food for his soul.

Leads for the Leader

Here is a good meeting to emphasize that part of the pledge that refers to Bible reading. Emphasize the thought that reading is not enough. Something should be picked out of every reading for memory purposes. Why not suggest a verse-a-day plan among the members for the coming year?

A good line of discussion is the desirability of Bible marking. This used to be a very common practice. Think out its value.

Try to get the members to use about fifteen minutes in rapid quoting of their favorite verses.

Is not this an opportunity to present the value of always carrying a Testament and at odd moments picking up these rich verses?

It might be worth while trying this: Quote a dozen of the most familiar and helpful verses and ask the Endeavorers to tell where they are found in the Bible.

Thoughts for Members

Four and a half million copies of the Bible or Testament were furnished to our American soldiers and sailors during the war. What help this must have meant to thousands of the boys!

When Sir Walter Scott lay dying he expressed a wish that something should be read to him. "From what book?" he was asked. He replied, "Need you ask? There is but one!"

There may be a hurt that helps. Some of the best verses we find may lay bare our own shortcomings in a painful way, but they always show a way of improvement.

Many a life has been revolutionized by the chance finding of a bit of Scripture, a torn page, a printed card. The power of a verse may be in inverse ratio to its length.

A Moment of Prayer

O thou who hast given to us the priceless treasure of thy Word, we come to thee and ask that its worth may be impressed upon us anew with such power that we find its greatest truths for us and make them all our own. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

The Mayflower Cat

By Anna Deming Gray

PART II.

There was to be a Plymouth Rock celebration with a speaker from Boston and the band and a torchlight parade. The first part of the meeting would be held in Plymouth Hall and then the crowd was to march down Leyden Street to the Rock, to listen to the speaking.

Nancy had a new blue dress, very full in the skirt, and so long that it kicked against the heels of her slippers when she walked. She longed to go and wear it for the other little girls to see; but at breakfast that morning her father said, "Somebody will have to stay with Abner Morton, for he is too feeble to be left alone all the evening. Josiah Starr will sleep there tonight but he is in the band and will have to lead the parade with the others."

"Nancy will be glad to sit with him," said her mother, smiling across the table at the little girl. "They are such good friends, you know, and besides she would not understand the speech; we can move his chair out to the doorway, and he and Nancy can watch the crowd go by and hear the band, and it will be almost as good as being at the Rock."

Nancy could not eat any more porridge after that because of the lump in her throat. But in those days children did as their parents said, without question, and so poor little disappointed Nancy Patience winked back the tears and said nothing. Presently she slipped from her chair and went out into the backyard and around the corner of the house where the hollyhocks grew tall. And in the shadow she stamped her little slippered foot hard and said, "I won't, I won't!" It was quite like any little girl of today might have acted and you would never have dreamed that her middle name was Patience. After that she felt better and presently she went back into the house to string the beans for dinner.

She was so quiet all day that her mother said she was afraid Nancy was going to be sick and that after the celebration was over she would brew some sassafras tea for her to drink.

When supper was over and the dishes were cleared up the rest of the family hurried away to Pilgrim Hall, and Nancy and her father walked down to Mr. Abner's house. Mr. Palmer moved the easy chair to the doorway and Nancy, the Mayflower cat in her arms, settled herself on the step below to watch the people go by.

It seemed to her that every little girl in Plymouth but Nancy Patience Palmer was going to that parade. They were dressed in their best—quaint little short-waisted frocks, so long in the skirt that they almost touched the ground—and ruffled bonnets, from which their little faces peeped out like the flowers in Mr. Abner's garden. Later when the stars came out and it was almost dark, they knew that the meeting in the hall was over for they could see the procession forming.

The band began playing, the spruce torches bobbed and flared and the people of Plymouth town were on their way to the Rock for their first celebration of the Pilgrims' landing.

It was then that Nancy began to feel quite left out and abused. But Mr. Abner had somehow lost the burden of his eighty years and grew excited as he talked of the town as he first knew it in the early days.

"There can't ever be another town like it, Nancy," he said, "for Plymouth Rock is bound to be Plymouth Rock to the end of time. That's why I set such store by the Mayflower cat, for it seems like it's a sort of link between those old days and me. Those were brave men and women, Nancy, and they risked everything to give us this free country." And Mr. Abner grew young again talking about it, until Nancy, fearing he was getting too excited and determined to do her duty taking care of him, even if she had not wanted to, began to talk about the cat to quiet him.

"What do the letters underneath him mean, Mr. Abner?" she asked. "And have they been there always?"

"What letters, child?" said Mr. Abner, sitting up very straight in his chair.

"Why, under the cat—right here—only it's so dark now that we can't see them. It says, 'Two Feet West of M. L. T.'"

And then he got more excited still and had her bring him a lighted candle from the table. Shading the flame with one hand he bent close and looked at the letters long and earnestly.

"Poor Charity," he said presently, "she did what seemed the right thing to her. I'm sorry I've been feeling so hard to Charity all these years."

Nancy had never heard his voice so gentle.

"Do you know what the letters mean, Mr. Abner?" she ventured.

"Know!" he said, "Why, child, I kin read it like an open book. I see the whole thing now and the wonder is I never thought of it before! 'M. L. T.' can't mean but one thing—the Morton Linden Tree. You know it, Nancy, that one where the cobble-stone walk turns up to Burial Hill—it's the biggest linden tree in Plymouth, and my grandsir' planted it when he was a little boy. That's where the Morton strong box is hid under the cobble-stones, there isn't no manner of doubt. Abner Morton won't have to be on charity any longer. And you were the one to find out about it, Nancy—the Lord bless you! You take the candle, child, and go get my garden spade out of the back entry. The boys in the band will be marching back to the hall to leave their traps before long and you be waiting for them there. Tell them I want them to have another parade and let you be in this one."

And presently the torches came bobbing back again up the street, to be met by a flying little figure in blue, while a trembling old voice from the Morton doorway broke across the strains of martial music and Nancy danced in front of them, pouring out her story of Mr. Abner and the Mayflower cat and the Morton strong box all in a breath.

And so Nancy herself was in the parade and she never forgot it.

For while Mr. Abner's friends gathered around him to find what it was all about, she led the way to the Morton Linden Tree, and the torches bobbed and flamed and the band played "Come, All Ye Faithful," which seemed the most appropriate thing they knew.

And the very best part of it all was that they found the strong box just where the cat had told them, two feet west of the Morton Linden Tree, under a big cobble-stone just where the path turns to go up the hill to Plymouth Burial Ground. And Mr. Abner had enough to keep him all the rest of his days. This is why, a few years later, when he slept with his Pilgrim forefathers on the beautiful hill overlooking Plymouth Town and the blue waters of the bay, he left the cat to Nancy Patience Palmer, whose grandchildren still love this story of Mr. Abner and the Mayflower cat.

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

My morning paper has this interesting item from London:

"A famous old mulberry tree in North London, under which, 144 years ago, it is said the American Declaration of Independence was first read in this country, has fallen under the weight of its age. American Boy Scouts attending the International Scout Conference here visited the tree only a few days before it crashed and its history was told to 300 of them, who had their photographs taken beneath its branches."

If any of you Comrades happen to have a Scout friend who was in that party and have one of those photographs, I wish you would send it to me. Pack it very carefully and I will have it reproduced by the printer in our Corner, and then returned to you. I am sure we should all like to see it.

Poor old tree! What changes it has seen! Wars! Railroads! "Trams!" Automobiles! Air Machines! German raids!

It makes me think of another famous tree on our side of the Atlantic. I mean the Washington Elm in Cambridge, just across the Charles River from Boston. This wonderful old tree, rather decrepit looking now, to be sure, stands inside an iron railing and draws many people to see this reminder of the past. Beneath its wide-spreading branches in 1775, a hundred and forty-five years ago, Gen. George Washington took command of the American Army, the day before "Fourth of July." It was really a year and a day, wasn't it? I will furnish you a picture of this historic tree, and if I can get one (from some of you) of the other, we will put them together.

One of our Comrades has suggested that she would enjoy "ever so much" exchanging letters with other Comrades. I think this would be an excellent thing for the Corner people. It may mean more work than I bargain for; but if any of you would enjoy doing this, let me have your names and I will try to arrange it. There are fine possibilities here, if you will use them. If you wish to correspond with some one who lives in another part of the country, say so. If you would like one who collects bugs, butterflies, flowers, stamps, or anything (except dust), let me know.

Still another subject is on my mind. I should like to get an enrollment of our Comrades. Besides, I should enjoy sending to each one a certificate of membership. Please let me hear from you at once, and enclose a two-cent stamp to pay the postage on your "stiff cat," as the old Cornerers used to call theirs.

I promised to announce in this issue the winners in our Bird, Beast and Fish Contest. I have no room for the lists this time, but here are the successful Comrades: First prize, Dorothy Walters, Milwaukee, Wis., and second prize, Leonard Southby, Carthage, N. Y.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

Deserved Reward for Mr. Davies

Long pastorates are not the order of the day in the West where conditions are constantly changing, but a few ministers have served parishes for such a length as to have their work of outstanding note.

Among these is Rev. William Davies, pastor of Vernon Ave., Los Angeles, since 1902. Feeling that possibly his work there was done and that a change in leadership would benefit the church, Mr. Davies resigned this summer; but with hearty unanimity the church declined to accept his judgment and insisted that he continue. To substantiate the verbal assurance, they gave financial evidence of their loyalty in increasing his salary from $1,400 and parsonage to $1,900. They also made an appropriation of $100 a year to Mrs. Davies as pianist, so that the present support is more commensurate with the splendid service rendered by these faithful workers. On the occasion of the presentation, after Mr. Davies returned from a month's vacation, a delightful fellowship dinner was held.

Claremont Well Supplied

Claremont merits congratulation on their judgment in calling and their good fortune in securing Dr. J. H. Williams, as acting pastor until they shall find a permanent leader. Dr. Williams, pastor emeritus of Redlands, has performed splendid service of this kind in many fields where he has been pastor ad interim. The Church of the Messiah, Los Angeles, Central Union, Honolulu, and several others have been strengthened and led forward during Dr. Williams' temporary service. The results at Claremont promise to be equally valuable. S. E. B.

Mr. Dodge Conference Secretary

Rev. R. B. Dodge recently began service as Associate Superintendent of the Northern California Conference; he will have especial charge of the San Francisco Bay Region. The great extent of the territory of the Conference, with churches scattered from Modoc County in the extreme northwest corner of the state to Tulare County four hundred miles to the south, has made the work of supervision difficult. Mr. Dodge came to the Conference from Hawaii a year ago and for some months gave part-time service among the churches of this section in connection with work in the Pacific School of Religion.

Death of Rev. Fred E. Holloway

Congregationalists of San Francisco and vicinity were shocked to learn of the death of Rev. F. E. Holloway Aug. 15, after an illness of but a few days. Mr. Holloway was pastor of Mission, San Francisco, where he began his work in April, 1919. His genial personality and brotherly interest in the whole round of the work had endeared him to a wide circle of friends. He came to Mission Church directly from service overseas where he was a chaplain. Before this he had been pastor of Second, Denver.

The last service conducted by Mr. Holloway on the Sunday preceding his death marked the culmination of an effort into which pastor and people had put much of labor and sacrifice—the dedication of a new organ. For the 14 years since the great fire of 1906 which destroyed the building of the old Third Church with its fine organ, the people had waited for the day when they might purchase a new one. Mr. Holloway's leadership had made this possible. The service of dedication was held in the morning and in the afternoon Prof. R. N. White gave a recital.

Mr. Reed's Busy Furlough

The furlough of Rev. Cass Reed of the International College of Smyrna is proving a happy reunion to Southern California friends, whose personal interest in him has extended their relationship with that land across the sea. Mr. Reed is a graduate of Pomona College and has scores of friends in this vicinity.

Californians at Plymouth Rock

At the time of the International Council these California delegates attended the exercises at Plymouth. Left to right they are: Miss Addie V. Congdon; Mrs. J. W. Coleman; Mrs. C. C. Rasey; Miss Viola Rasey; Mrs. F. C. Bodine; in front: Mr. C. O. Rasey. They are all from Pasadena.

As a representative of Plymouth, Whittier, he has been their special missionary in the foreign field under the American Board. His work at Smyrna during the strained conditions of the war period has been a notable piece of service. He merits and needs a real furlough, but his popularity as a preacher and speaker has laid him open to many claims for such service during his visit here. He has participated in Missionary Education Conferences on the Coast, gave a stirring address at the Young People's Conference at Long Beach and has spoken in many of our churches.

Most of the period of furlough will be spent in the East in continued study toward his doctor's degree.

MONTANA

Indians Resourceful

The Crow Agency work during the illness and convalescence of Rev. G. A. Vennink has shown a surprising degree of resourcefulness on the part of the Indians themselves. The schools at Black Lodge and Reno were discontinued by the American Missionary Association, but at Black Lodge $60 a month was raised by members of the tribe for a woman teacher and Reno has raised $80 a month. At the latter place $1,000 has already been raised for the work of the coming year. Mr. Vennink has been training two of the native men, Enemy and Joseph Shane, to conduct the services on Sunday and they have done splendidly. These two men are to take the Indian parts in the "Pageant of the Pilgrims," to be given at the State Conference Meeting in October.

New Church for Judith Gap

Judith Gap has called Rev. Rufus Whitaker to the pastorate and plans are now being worked out to build a $12,000 church for which money was pledged during Mr. Peterson's pastorate. G. N. E.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Athol Goes Forward

Since the coming of Rev. W. E. Baldwin to Athol, about a year ago, the membership has increased 60 per cent. The Dorcas Society of 40 members raised $890 last year. The Literary Society meets a real need in the community during the winter months. The monthly devotional service was attended by more young people than the monthly socials. A committee of three edits and controls the monthly church paper, The Pilgrim Messenger, which is sent to families of the community. At a recent meeting it was decided to increase the pastor's salary $600.

ILLINOIS

Pastor's Assistant for Champaign Church

The new church building of Champaign, which is in process of erection near the university, will not be ready for occupancy at the opening of the fall term, so the congregation will continue to hold its services in Morrow Hall, College of Agriculture. The church school will be held in the various recitation rooms of the same building. Mr. J. M. MacKendrick, formerly with the Y. M. C. A. as Religious Work Director at the University, has been secured as pastor's assistant. Mr. MacKendrick saw service with the Canadian Army in France and did splendid work in the university last year. The church feels that he will do valuable work among Congregational Young People. Rev. R. J. Locke is pastor of Champaign.

NEW YORK

To Push Evangelism Throughout State

The committee of the New York State Conference on evangelism, Rev. Ansel E. Johnson of Buffalo, chairman, is pushing an effort to promote a fall campaign and enlist every Congregational pastor in the state in a plan of parish evangelism as the heart of his effort for the coming year.

An all-day conference, led by national leaders in this field, to which all the pastors of churches in Western New York were invited was held under the auspices of the Buffalo Federation of Churches, Sept. 27.

In October, Dr. C. E. Burton, Rev. W. D. Street of White Plains, and Rev. A. E. Johnson of Buffalo will each visit a group of local associations to promote this plan.

Dr. F. L. Fagley, secretary of the National Council Commission on Evangelism, has sent to the pastors an exceedingly helpful booklet upon the subject of "A Program of Parish Evangelism" which gathers up the plans of a number of successful pastor-evangelists during recent years. A fall effort and all-the-year-around plan is the goal thus sought. A. E. J.

CONNECTICUT

Ordained and Installed at Bethel

The ordination and installation of Rev. W. W. Pickett as pastor of BETHEL occurred June 25. Mr. Pickett is a recent graduate of Yale Divinity School, and served in the army during the war. He comes to his first parish with a splendid equipment which augurs well for his success. He has made a notable record both in Yale College and the Divinity School as a debater, and this unusual platform ability, a winning personality and a scholarly mind give promise that he will measure up to his tasks.

The council was formed with Dr. G. H. Beard of Bridgeport as moderator, and after an unusually well-wrought paper on his training and belief, the candidate passed the test of various questions with credit. Dean C. R. Brown gave the sermon on Keeping the Faith, while the ordaining prayer was by Rev. R. M. Houghton of the Church of the Redeemer, New Haven, where Mr. Pickett served as assistant in his time of training. The Scriptures were read by Rev. Hugh Shields of Ridgefield and the right hand of fellowship was given by Rev. F. C. Jacobs of South Norwalk. The charge to the candidate was given by Rev. T. B. Lathrop of Branford, while the charge to the church was by Rev. A. T. Steele of Winsted, a former pastor. It was an impressive and inspiring beginning of what promises to be a fruitful ministry. T. B. L.

Morris Pastor Ordained

Sept. 10 was a bright day in the life of the church at MORRIS, by the ordination of its pastor, Rev. E. B. Haines. A goodly number from the local church and from four of the seven churches invited formed the council.

Mr. Haines' statement was clear cut yet comprehensive. After a brief session the council reported favorably upon the ordination service and recognition of Mr. Haines as a minister in the Litchfield South Association of Congregational churches.

One of the striking parts of the service was the giving of the right hand of fellowship by Rev. F. W. Fletcher, President of Tillotson College, Austin, Tex., who, a few years ago, resigned after a long pastorate with Morris to take up work under the American Missionary Association.

Mr. Haines was born in Philadelphia and educated in the Pennington Preparatory School and Wesleyan University, from which he was graduated in 1910. During his course at Pennington he was licensed to preach in the M. E. church and preached in that denomination during his entire course at the university. After his graduation from Wesleyan he accepted a call to Broad Brook, Ct., with which church he was united in membership.

Mr. Haines began his work as acting pastor in his present charge Sept. 1, 1919, and his first year's work has been marked with great success.

Dismissal Council for Mr. Ellis

An Ecclesiastical Council was held in WINDSOR AVE., HARTFORD, on Sept. 10, to review the action of the church in accepting the resignation of its pastor, Rev. A. M. Ellis. Prof. A. R. Merriam of Hartford Seminary and Dr. C. F. Carter were appointed to draft the resolution which contained enthusiastic testimony to Mr. Ellis' activities for church and city. Mr. Ellis has already gone to his new pastorate at Richmond Hill, N. Y., where he has a great opportunity in a growing community and with a vigorous church.

Bridgman said, we shall see Dr. Herring as a great pioneer. He had no precedents in his work. He had to create his own enthusiasms. Dr. Herring developed a remarkable power of working with others, a capacity for leadership and team-work. We have not many ecclesiastical statesmen. He will rank with the great ecclesiastical statesmen of modern times. He had the understanding and genuine unprofessional sympathy for the common man. He was a forward-looking, persistent, untiring, unselfish Christian brother and leader.

Dr. C. F. Carter of Hartford, of the National Council Executive Committee, spoke of Dr. Herring in his work. To an unusual degree, he said, Dr. Herring was identified with all he did. He expressed and disclosed himself in his work. In the first 20 months of his secretaryship, he traveled 60,000 miles. He had a large-minded patience and a leadership of a commanding order. He possessed a genius for co-operation. He helped to build a denominational machinery that would run well but he did not wish to run it. There was an urgency of spiritual conviction in all he undertook. The vital force of Christianity was daily in his heart. He was a man of profound convictions. The impulse of his soul was that of some spiritual principle that must find expression.

Dr. C. H. Patton of the American Board spoke especially of Dr. Herring's interdenominational relationships. Dr. Patton characterized Dr. Herring as a magnificent specimen of catholicity in belief and fellowship. We owe to him the privilege of being able to exert a large influence in these last ten years of marked interdenominational activity. He had room for more than one loyalty. He had a sense of the greatness of the Kingdom. So long as Congregationalism produces such men as he, we need not fear but that she will have assured place among the forces of Christendom.

New Parsonage for North Weymouth

During an interim in pastorates last year, PILGRIM, NORTH WEYMOUTH, decided that the old parsonage no longer constituted a suitable residence for their minister and took advantage of a convenient opportunity to dispose of the property. The understanding was that the incoming pastor should rent until another house might be purchased, or until lower building costs might render the construction of a new house feasible.

But rents were scarce, no suitable house could be purchased, and the high cost of building continued to mount up on wings, so last fall the decision was made to build immediately. A convenient location was secured, contracts let, and the work begun. After many delays the building was finally completed this summer, and the present pastor, Rev. T. B. Bitler, and his family are now happily ensconced in their new home.

The house is of modified colonial design, most pleasing and convenient. Steam heat, bath, laundry, electric lights, fireplace, and hardwood floors throughout, are some of its attractive features. The building as it stands has cost some $9,000, but so generous has been the response of the parish and its friends that the mortgage on the property will be less than $2,800. After the house was completed the Ladies' Circle provided funds to paper it attractively, provide curtains throughout, and purchase a combination coal and gas range for the kitchen. The enthusiasm with which this project has been carried out is typical of the spirit which is being manifest in every phase of the church's activity, and Pilgrim folks are looking toward the future with much anticipation.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

A Sunday caller should not keep a young lady away from church. It is more practicable to bring him with her before marriage than afterward.

Installation and Commemoration at Dalton

On Sept. 14, FIRST, DALTON, with the aid and counsel of the North Berkshire Association, installed Rev. R. M. Timberlake as its pastor, and in the same service unveiled a tablet in memory of its former beloved minister, the late Rev. G. W. Andrews, pastor from 1883 to 1918.

Mr. Timberlake presented a paper of unusual winsomeness, depicting the early impressions of religion which he imbibed as a child in his father's parsonage, and tracing the development of his inner spiritual convictions. Mr. Timberlake's father, Rev. William Timberlake of Montreal, was expected to be present, but was prevented by reason of sickness in the family. After taking the academic course at McGill University, Mr. Timberlake came to Yale in 1909, and while in the Divinity School there and at Hartford pursued special courses in religious education. He held student pastorates at Bridgewater and Middlefield, Ct., and later became director of religious education and assistant pastor of Dwight Place, New Haven. From there he was called to Canaan, Ct., from which he was called by Dalton in 1919. Mr. Timberlake has had considerable experience as an organizer as well as an educator in the religious field, and brings to his new charge a well-trained mind, a hospitable heart and an inbred love for the work of the Kingdom.

The sermon by Dean C. R. Brown of Yale, taking Peter's shadow as the type of unconscious influence, challenged the pastor and all present unto the highest stewardship. Rev. H. R. Miles of New Haven, with whom Mr. Timberlake was formerly associated, presented the charge to the pastor. The charge to the people was given by Rev. H. L. Bailey of Longmeadow, and the right hand of fellowship was extended by Rev. H. G. Vincent of Pilgrim, Pittsfield. Rev. W. M. Crane of Richmond made the installing prayer. Other parts in the service were taken by Rev. W. T. Bartley, Canaan, N. Y., J. M. Twichell of North Adams, T. Nelson Baker, Ph. D., moderator, and W. R. Stocking, scribe.

Another Success

Again New England is creating a profitable industry. To the problem of supplying mica, both in ground form and in sheet form to the ever increasing users she is applying Yankee methods. Instead of mining by tunnels and shafts a group of Yankees have started blasting mica from a quarry face, crushing it up in quantity and extracting the mica by special process.

By this method they get a large quantity of scrap for grinding purposes which pays a good manufacturing profit on the entire transaction. In addition they obtain a certain amount of sheet mica which costs them nothing. The value of sheet mica per pound is greater than silver.

These same methods have been used by these men in producing agricultural lime with the result that the early investors in the Lime Company are obtaining better than 30% on their money.

Mica production should be more profitable than limestone. May we send you full particulars of the New England Minerals Company stock at $10 per share?

VERMONT

Convocation at Middlebury

A convocation which is unique among Congregationalists is the annual meeting of Congregational clergymen of the State of Vermont. This gathering, which has recently closed its fourth annual meeting at Middlebury, is entirely distinct from the annual convention of ministers and churches, with its reports and election of officers, and the discussion of more or less important matters.

The Middlebury convocation is a gathering of ministers, for the purpose of spending the larger part of a week, sitting at the feet of specialists in theology, who bring a vital message on some great theme chosen and prepared for in advance, with an opportunity for free discussion and the interchange of opinion on the subject matter. To this meeting are brought the ablest men who can be secured in the whole country to unfold the particular theme to be presented.

The meetings are held every year in the college buildings of Middlebury College, the delegates, usually more than 100 in number, being quartered in the dormitory, and eating at a common table together. Arrangements have been made to care for the travel expenses and board of many who otherwise would be unable to attend, so that a pretty general attendance of the ministers of the state is secured. The Convocation is not at all in the nature of a picnic or recreation outing. A glance at the program shows that from eight o'clock in the morning until late at night there is a succession of lectures and public services throughout the week. Some time is given for recreation but it is only incidental that the best results may be obtained.

The Convocation just closed was under the direction of the popular state secretary, Rev. C. C. Merrill of Burlington, who proved himself as always a master of assemblies, and whose closing words on the work in the state at large showed conclusively his broad vision and his grasp of the details of the entire state, together with his fine spirit of brotherliness, which is coming to be more and more appreciated by the clergy of Vermont.

The assembly was fortunate in having as lecturers this year, Dr. J. L. Barton, a Vermonter by birth, who gave two vigorous addresses; Dr. W. A. Brown of Union Seminary, who discussed the theme, "The Teaching of Religion," under three heads, "What to Teach," "Whom to Teach," and "How to Teach;" and Dr. O. S. Davis, another native of Vermont, President of Chicago Seminary, whose theme was "General Principles and Occasional Sermons," and whose wit and wisdom were alike enjoyable; and Malcolm Dana, Director of the Rural Work Department of the Home Missionary Society, who came to the convention fresh from the rural fields of the West to stir and inform the ministers of what is largely a rural church in Vermont, how best to restore the country church to its central position in every community of the Green Mountain State.

Rev. Hubert C. Herring, who has been with us in our Convocation in the past was sadly missed, and a memorial service of a very tender character was held to his memory. One of the incidental happenings of the Convocation was the message of greeting sent to Dr. C. H. Merrill of St. Johnsbury, who for many years has been the beloved state secretary. A gift of $50 from his ministerial friends was given to him on the occasion of his golden wedding which occurred at this time. F. E. D.

Summer Preachers at Bridgton

Bridgton's citizens and visitors have been especially fortunate this summer in hearing from Sabbath to Sabbath men of unusual ability in the pulpit of FIRST. They heard on Aug. 15, Rev. J. A. Richards, Winnetka, Ill.; Aug. 22, the Governor of Maine, Carl E. Milliken; Aug. 29, Rev. J. G. Lovell, Chelmsford, Mass.; and on Sept. 12, Rev. S. T. Livingstone, Thompson, Ct. The adult class of the Church school has taken the form of a forum, some one of the summer visitors giving an address which was followed by a question period. That these sermons and addresses were appreciated was evidenced by the size of the congregations. Rev. W. A. Richmond is pastor.

Personals

BAKER, E. P., Argyle, Minn., was given an extended vacation by his church, which he spent in Alaska and the Yukon Territory. He visited the chief towns in Southeastern Alaska and went into the interior as far as Dawson, Y. T. He returned Sept. 10 and was welcomed on the following Sunday by an unusually large church attendance.

CURTIS, J. S., who is on a four months' leave of absence from the pastorate of First, Somers, Ct., was recently remembered by eleven of the people of his church with a letter of appreciation and good wishes and with a check for $202. Illness has prevented Mr. Curtis from carrying on the work of his pastorate, but he is now fully recovered from his sickness.

JOB, P. A., pastor of People's, Providence, R. I., was married in his own church, Sept. 8, by Rev. G. A. Burgess. The bride, Miss Sarah C. Campbell, has long been a faithful worker among the young people of the Sunday school. Mr. and Mrs. Job left for a month of travel and visiting in Nova Scotia. On the Friday before the wedding friends gave a surprise to the couple in the vestry, and presented them with a purse of $150.

NORTH, W. H. and MRS. NORTH, Billings, Mont., were given a farewell reception on the eve of their departure for Chicago, which was also their 23d wedding anniversary. Sterling silver knives, forks, and spoons were given them by the congregation. Farewell dinners were given by the Y. M. C. A. and by the Commercial and Rotary Clubs. Many sincere tributes were paid to Mr. and Mrs. North for their personal and public services in the city of Billings. The relation of pastor and people has long been intimate and more than usual regret was felt at the departure of the family.

BUTCHER—On September 14, at Leavenworth, Kan., Mrs. Sybil Wheeler Butcher, wife of Rev. Stephen Butcher, minister of the First Congregational Church, in the fifty-fifth year of her age. She is survived by her husband and daughter Alice.

MRS. MARY ADELAIDE (PARKER) BEARD

At her childhood home in Montville, Ct., on the ancestral acres where not only she was born and married, but her mother as well, Mrs. Mary Adelaide Beard, widow of Rev. Wiliam Henry Beard, entered into rest at sunset, Aug. 12, 1920.

Though in failing health for some time, her condition was not considered immediately critical until a week prior to her death. The disease seemed to be of a paralytic nature which was localized in the spine and consequently the nerve centers.

The best of New England stock gave her being and training. Her ancesters, having the names of Parker, Fellowes, Alden, Comstock, Chester, Coffin, not only laid the foundations of Eastern Connecticut, but left an ineffaceable mark on the life of Massachusetts and New Hampshire as well. The fathers were farmers, physicians, jurists, clergymen, and all of our Congregational order. Their wives were women who combined the spiritual insight of a Mary with the practical wisdom of a Martha.

Her parents were Abishai Alden and Caroline Fellowes Parker. For forty years an uncle, Augustus A. Parker, who was in himself a whole school of religious pedagogy, presided as superintendent over the Sunday school in which her Christian training was commenced. Another uncle, Hon. Francis Fellowes of Hartford, Ct., an eminent lawyer and judge, was one of the first if not the first President of the Connecticut Peace Society.

Mrs. Beard in her own achievements was true to her lineage. She was a noble exemplification of the Pilgrim ideals. Training at Abbott Academy, Andover, Mass., and some years of teaching in the public schools were as stuff on which to try the soul.

In 1869 she was married to Rev. William Henry Beard of Andover, Mass., son of Rev. Spencer Field Beard. With her husband she shared his work at Freedom, Me., Harwich, Mass., and for the quarter century service at South Killingly, Ct., where is "the little white church on the hilltop," where Mr. Beard fell asleep.

When her eldest son was called to Durham, N. H., she accompanied him, though the later years were spent with her other sons in Flushing, N. Y.

A brother and sister survive her, also her three sons: Morris L. Beard, assistant manager of the advertising department of Colgates; Edward C. Beard, sales manager in New York City of the Beacon Falls Rubber Shoe Company, and Rev. William S. Beard, secretary of Promotion of the Congregational Home Missionary Society. Three other men of considerable affairs in the business world in Chicago and New York have always paid tribute to her training by calling themselves her foster sons.

During the days at Durham she was a leader in the intellectual life of the community. Finding the burial place of Major General John Sullivan, of Revolutionary fame, in a state of neglect, she raised a fund for its restoration, and then another whose income should provide perpetual care.

But her crowning work was in South Killingly. In this little parish of scarce 300 souls, more than a score of Christian men and women who became educators, clergymen, physicians, structural engineers, business men, reveal in effective living and Christian character her moulding touch. One can find them all the way from Florida to the Philippines and China. Not one has proved disobedient to the heavenly vision.

Three ministers, two church workers, two foreign missionaries came from that parish as a direct result of the work of Mrs. Beard and her husband.

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15, services were conducted in the old home by Rev. Charles S. Mukland, D. D., former president of the New Hampshire State College and for many years a warm friend, assisted by Rev. Edward P. Ayer, a son of the South Killingly church.

From New York and Massachusetts and Rhode Island came many friends of the earlier and the later time, among them one from Needham, Mass., who when a little girl was a member of Mrs. Beard's Sunday school class, and who still lives in the strength of the childhood days.

On Monday the interment occurred in the family lot in the Chapel Cemetery in Andover, Mass.

Her going was a wonderful release into a larger service and not even lonely hearts can be selfish enough to wish her back.

Scattered Beauty

By George Laurence Parker

My little boy was devoted to his Sunday school teacher.

"Tom," I asked him one day, "why do you love Miss Anderson so much?"

"She is so beautiful, father," answered Tom.

"Well, Tom, I never thought her very beautiful, although I know how good she is. Do you think her eyes are beautiful?"

"No, not very."

"Her nose, Tom, is that beautiful?"

"No, I don't think so, father," Tom answered, evidently puzzled now.

"Is it her mouth, Tom, or her complexion?" Again Tom answered, "No."

"Well, then, what is beautiful about her, Tom?" For I saw he had not yielded his contention.

"I don't know, father. There is something beautiful about Miss Anderson." Then Tom's eyes lighted up, "It isn't in her eyes, nor her complexion, nor anywhere else; it's just scattered all over her!"

Beauty scattered all over her, yet not a single beautiful feature! I saw what Tom meant. He was right. I had been blind. The only true beauty is after all that which cannot be said to be in any part but is scattered all over us. True fragrance is that which goes "over all the house," as it did from Mary's alabaster box.

And this is the beauty of Christian character. We are not perfectly good, nor perfectly true always, nor perfect in prayer, nor complete in holiness—but every real Christian has about him or her a beauty like Miss Anderson's, "scattered all over us."

said, Get thee behind me, Satan, you are a stumbling block for you don't think like God, you think like men. But not only did Jesus say, Peter, when you think that because I am a Son of God, I can escape the cross, and suffering, and sacrifice, you are thinking about life as men think and not as God thinks, but in the very next sentence he applied exactly the same thing to all of us when he said, "If any man would come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." Mark 8:34. Jesus held the same ideal for his followers that he held for himself. There was one standard for him and for them.

Can anyone miss Jesus' idea of the Christian as one who has that new spirit, purpose and attitude of love or good will which makes him one in spirit and purpose with God and makes the will of God the law of his life, just as it was the law of Jesus' life. There is hardly an external rule in all the teaching of Jesus. He sought to smash externalism and legalism. It was a new inner fountain of life he desired. In Jesus' conception of Christianity, infallible external rules by which to guide life were worse than useless, and Paul said, "Why do ye subject yourselves to ordinances, handle not, nor taste, nor touch?" Jesus just taught one universal, all-inclusive principle of love to God and man. Love was to be the spring anl guide of all action. All Jesus' teaching and his life simply illustrated what love does under varying conditions and circumstances.

With Jesus' idea of Christianity and the Christian in mind, we have a more adequate approach to the interpretation of the Bible. The final value of the various parts can be tested by the teaching and spirit of the Master. We shall begin this next week. Suggestions and questions are welcomed.

The Minister's Financial Problems

Investing for the Rainy Day

By Herbert H. Smith

Of course the most pressing problem with many ministers, perhaps with most pastors, is that of paying necessary debts. There are a number of reasons, however, why every minister should not only live within his income, but should save something for the education of his children and for protection in old age. The pension plans for ministers of most denominations will do much to care for old age, but every clergyman desires to feel that he is not living from hand to mouth, and has something in a safe place for emergencies.

Where is this "Safe Place"?

Because the amount of money which pastors have to invest is comparatively small, the desire to have as large a return as possible is more than natural. The unfortunate fact that ministers have usually little acquaintance with business makes their desire for large returns spell disaster in many cases. The investment opportunities which advertise largest returns are able to do this because the promises are based on hopes of the promoters rather than on established facts.

"I have just received cash for some shares in the local building and loan association. Shall I invest the matured shares in cheap land in Minnesota?" This question in substance came to me recently. The man had two pieces of property in mind. One was near his present charge where land was selling at $200 an acre. Several hundred miles away he could get land for $20 an acre. He was inclined to get as much of the earth's surface as possible with the capital available. He had not taken into consideration the fact that he might need to sell the land some day, and that the higher priced and near at hand might in that day be the best investment. Ownership of land is to be commended if all conditions are favorable.

There is a minister in a New York suburb who asked what to do with the house and five acres he had there. He had borrowed money to obtain it and now cannot get a second mortgage necessary to pay special assessments for paving, and other taxes. He appealed for suggestions. He said he could not rent the property for enough to pay the taxes, and no one wished to purchase it. Possibly a good real estate man would be able to dispose of the property if the price was made low enough. But a low price might mean that the sale would not realize enough to cover the first mortgage, which was very large. This man had more land than he desired.

A pastor in Oregon was in the same situation. He had bought a farm when land was cheaper and a boom was on. For several years things went well. He made a comfortable living, although every year the interest on the mortgage ate into the profits. Then came the slump. People who could moved away. Expenses for irrigation called for large additional investment. He had no capital. He could not sell. He, too, was land hungry.

Many pastors have been urged to buy lots in suburbs near growing cities. This may prove a good investment. But if the trend of population goes another way the taxes will be just as large and the collection officials come around every year. Ordinarily no one in moderate circumstances is justified in buying unimproved city property with the expectation of holding it for a raise. If the purchase is for the purpose of building a home soon, the complexion of the matter changes, but lots in distant cities ought to be looked at carefully before more money is invested than can be lost without serious inconvenience.

Unsafe Investments

"I am thinking of buying several shares of the Blank Motor Company stock. The officers say that with present plans they can begin selling cars this spring and clear $50,000 the first year." Preachers have read of the big fortunes made by the manufacturers of automobiles. Why not get some money too? But the stories of those who have lost money on industrial stocks are never told. Some automobile companies are making money, more hope to. No company, however, of whatever nature should it be, will make as much money as is promised by the officers who are seeking to sell stock. A rule established by many financiers who invest trust funds is not to buy stock in a company until it has paid fair dividends for five consecutive years. If a minister desires to speculate, or to gamble (!) then the stock of newly formed companies is the best possible field in which to lose money.

"I have $4,000 insurance maturing in four months. I wish to make careful plans to get as large an income as possible consistent with safety." The man who writes like this is watching for his truest interests. He is not carried away by large promises of what companies expect to do, nor is he induced to buy stock in a rolling-pin factory because a set of books is given with each ten shares.

Money at six per cent. compound interest will double itself in about twelve years. Hetty Green bought more mortgages on land than she bought land. Put these two statements together. Buy mortgages; they usually bear six per cent.; then invest the interest in the same manner.

CONSULT LOCAL BANKERS

The man who asks this question probably has additional insurance. Let us hope it is on the continuous premium full life plan. His family in case of death is well cared for. He desires to have his endowment insurance invested. He might buy a home for himself, if he is reasonably sure of staying in his present charge, or if the property is in a growing neighborhood so that he could sell if necessary. In this case the interest he otherwise would get on his money would go for rent. If he wished to be free to move about and not have his money tied to one spot he could with safety invest in bonds or real estate mortgages. The questions regarding both are large, and local bankers ought to be consulted before anything is done. Bonds are of many kinds, and suitable for different sorts of investors. Many ministers are following the lead of the life insurance companies and are investing largely in real estate mortgages, preferring those placed on good farm land.

Such securities, when obtained through reliable brokers, are as safe as one can hope to have his money on this earth, and the income is usually around six per cent. If the inquirer divided his sum and placed a mortgage in Kansas and one in North Dakota or Texas he would have reasonable certainty that crop failure would not hamper the owner of the land in making payments, and he would receive $240 a year. This in turn could immediately be invested in a smaller mortgage and the next year the income would be $254.40 from both mortgages. If in the meantime the pastor had saved $60 additional, $5 a month, the income would be still greater.

RISIBLES

He—Reggie's girl has money to burn.

She—Yes, I hear she's looking for a match. —Princeton Tiger.

"Why did Wilkins decide to stay in the army?" "He didn't see any other way of getting an overcoat this winter."—The Home Sector.

Mother: "Poor boy how did you hurt your finger so?" Little Son: "With a hammer." "When?" "A good while ago." "I didn't hear you cry." "I thought you were out."—Pearson's Weekly.

"Doctor, I've just received your bill for the operation you performed on me. Would you cut anything off for cash?"

"Yes, my dear sir, anything—an arm or a leg, or what else you may wish removed."—Detroit Free Press.

A man who had been very ill told a pious friend that Dr. Jones had brought him through.

"No," said his friend, "Providence brought you through, not the doctor."

"Well, maybe he did, but the doctor will charge for it."—Doctor's Leisure Hour.

In Glasgow they tell of a resourceful clergyman who is never at a loss for a retort. He was once called to the bedside of a very wealthy but stingy man. "If," he gasped to the clergyman, "if I leave several thousands to the church, will my salvation be assured?" Whereupon the divine responded, "I wouldn't like to be too positive, but it's well worth trying."—Tit-Bits.

Sir John Gorst dearly liked amusing stories, and among his favorites was a reply given by a child to a question in an examination paper on physiology: "The body is divided into three parts—your head where the brains are placed, if you have any; the chest, which is a large box, your heart and something else—I forget what; and your stomach where the vowels are —they are a, e, i, o, u, and sometimes w and why."—From Mrs. Barnett's biography of her husband.

Ministers should always edit their announcements, for the pitfalls are many. For instance, a minister in Vermont announced in his local paper:

"On Sunday the pastor will speak on 'The Way to Emmaus'"; but he was fortunate as compared with the pastor of a well-known Baptist church in Boston, who announced through the Transcript: "Dr. —— will speak. Subject, The Slaughter of the Innocents. Selections by Miss Babb."

A member of the Chicago bar tells the following story of the coolest man he ever knew. This man was awakened one night by burglars. He got up and went downstairs, and as he entered the dining room, where the thieves were engaged in wrapping up the silver plate, they covered him with their revolvers. This, however, did not disconcert the householder at all. "Pardon me for disturbing you, gentlemen," said he, "but I should like you to do me a favor. If it is not too much to ask, will you be so good as to post this letter for me? It must go tonight. It's the premium for my burglary insurance."—Harper's.

"Not all the poets," observed a frequenter of cosmopolitan society, "have the gift of uttering quick, light-winged, magical nothings in society."

"I knew of one poet, greatly in vogue in Paris some years ago, who was not exactly a fluent dispenser of epigram. He was invited to the house of a great lady of the Faubourg St. Germain, and as soon as he entered he became the center of a circle of admirers, who waited vainly for some subtle or poetic conceit. The poet remained silent, ill at ease, red in the face and uneasy of feet.

"'Come, my dear poet,' the hostess finally begged, 'say something to us!'

"'Have you observed—duchess,' he faltered, desperately, 'that—this—year's pawn-tickets are pink?'"—Tit-Bits.

Program for the coming year to include Missionary Education, Stewardship, and a Financial Campaign in behalf of our denominational work.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

What Is Your Church Doing To Emphasize the Pilgrim Tercentenary?

Thousands of dollars have been appropriated; many eminent men and women are devoting much valuable time to definite plans; state and national governments have appointed commissions; all for the proper observance of the Tercentenary of the Landing of the Pilgrims.

They do this because they believe that the principles for which the Pilgrims stood need emphasis in this critical period of history.

New England in the Life of the World

HOWARD A. BRIDGMAN

Editor of The Congregationalist and Advance

The book assembles material never brought together before within the compass of a single volume. It specifies in detail the exact part which men and women of New England stock had in founding and developing great commonwealths like Ohio, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Oregon, California and other Western and Far Western states. It sets forth the impact of New England upon the Near East, the Far East and the Hawaiian Islands. It describes the share New Englanders had in initiating and carrying forward far-reaching movements in education, reform, philanthropy and religion. The style is animated rather than technical and a series of original charts adds to the usefulness of the book. The early beginnings are graphically sketched, but quite as much emphasis is placed upon present evidences in customs, institutions and laws of the New England seed-sowing.

CONGREGATIONAL WORLD MOVEMENT NUMBER

The Great Need of the Hour

IF one thing is becoming more and more evident to the business men of America it is that Religion holds the only solution to our political, commercial and industrial problems. The need of the hour is more Religion. · · · The business men of America should get behind the Congregational World Movement—and similar movements of other groups of churches—first, to extend missionary work, especially carrying to the churches such missionary intelligence as will create a greater interest in missions and education, and second, to inaugurate a tithing system of giving which will provide the wherewithal by which the work may be carried on. · · · I estimate that the income of our Congregational churchmen during the past year exceeded two billions of dollars. Ten per cent. would be two hundred millions, or forty times the meager five millions which Congregational churches are attempting to raise as their Tercentenary gift. The harvest truly is great but we are too anxious to eat the entire crop. We need to save more of it for seed. · · · America's future demands that we all become imbued with the spirit of service, and seek to do instead of to get; seek to give instead of to accumulate. —Roger W. Babson.

COX OR HARDING? by Dr. Maurer and President Thomas

A Special Message

to pastors and church officers on how to use this paper

THIS number of The Congregationalist and Advance goes to about 20,000 pastors and church officers besides those whose names are on the regular subscription list.

The preparation and distribution of this issue have involved considerable labor upon the part of those who have contributed the special articles, and not a little financial outlay.

In order that the best results may be realized through this number for the interests involved, may we suggest some of the ways in which a wise and helpful use may be made of it?

1st. DEVOTE a Sunday or mid-week service to the presentation and discussion of the contents.

2nd. Make one or more of the special articles the basis of a sermon or address.

3rd. Ask subscribers and others who receive a copy to pass it along to an individual or family not receiving it, with the request that they read it. Circles of readers might be made out and the paper passed around.

"I EARNESTLY hope that we may take hold together and support the Congregational World Movement in such a way as to meet the extraordinary needs of all our Boards."

The Talk of the Sanctum

GIFT COPIES OF THIS ISSUE

This issue of The Congregationalist and Advance is being sent to many members of our churches who are not now subscribers. We suggest that many readers will find satisfaction after careful perusal in keeping the paper for reference. Others will render a real service, by passing on the copy to some one who is likely to appreciate it, preferably to an active member of a Congregational church who does not take the paper. These gift copies are sent with the compliments of the CONGREGATIONAL WORLD MOVEMENT.

We call your attention to the interesting and informing articles relating to the various phases of the Movement. We hope you will read every word of them. We hope also that you will enjoy the other pages and that the acquaintance — new or renewal — which may begin this week may lead to lasting friendship between us.

Harding or Cox

We hope our readers may find some light and leading for election day in the excellent articles in this issue by President Thomas and Dr. Maurer on the candidates, and why each will vote for the one he favors. Such discussions from the Christian viewpoint, although the writers disagree, seem to us likely to be helpful in this confusing period of the campaign.

Pilgrim Sermon Topics

What are the ministers planning to preach about in connection with the Tercentenary anniversaries this autumn and winter? Our question is suggested by the fact that on page 400 of last week's issue appeared two suggestive lists, one from a minister in the Pacific Northwest and another from one who has of late been serving a Florida parish. These brethren evidently believe in taking time by the forelock and their specific themes arranged in a cumulative order should be suggestive to other preachers.

May we not have soon a little broadside of topics for sermons on the Pilgrims? Let those who have worked out their lists follow the example of these two brethren and send to this office at the earliest possible moment their lists.

"Indispensable"

A Wisconsin subscriber writes:

"I am sending you the names of several Congregationalists who ought to take The Congregationalist and Advance. I wish to tell you that it is indispensable to me, and that it has done much to increase my interest in the great work that all the churches are doing. It should be much more widely read. Have you made any effort to get the Christian Endeavorers to inaugurate a drive for subscriptions? If its subscription list could be doubled, trebled or quadrupled, what would it not mean for the advancement of righteousness in our country."

Dr. Edward Lincoln Smith of the American Board says: "Nothing more helpful can be done for the cultivation of our churches in spiritual truth, in acquaintance with our people and the activities of our denomination than to promote the circulation of The Congregationalist."

"If you care for my opinion with reference to your paper, I will say that I think it is one of the best denominational papers published. Perhaps you will appreciate this, coming from a Baptist."

Piedmont Begins a Campaign for Two Million Dollars

AMOUNT VOTED BY TRUSTEES; NOTHING LESS WILL DO

A Campaign, Not a Drive

It began October 1st and will continue until the full amount is secured

PRESENT RESOURCES:

Land, buildings and equipment, inventorying at a little over	$400,000
Endowment, a little over	100,000
Total,	$500,000

INCREASED RESOURCES DEMANDED:

Buildings and equipment	$ 500,000
Endowment	1,400,000
1920-21 budget, deficit and adjustments	100,000
Total,	$2,000,000

To the Many Friends of Piedmont College and Christian Education,

My dear Friends:

For years the financing of Piedmont College by securing donations has been my responsibility. The donations last year amounted to the interest, at endowment rates, on $1,500,000. To secure this amount has cost life-blood, and to continue this, with the constant increase of a growing college, is passing human possibilities. The Trustees, as well as myself, realize that this cannot go on forever. Piedmont must be endowed like other colleges, and endowed somewhat in proportion to the work it is doing. Most of its work is now done in extemporized buildings; but real college buildings are now imperative.

The above announcement shows what it is proposed to do.

The first effort will be to secure $100,000 with which to meet this year's budget, pay off the deficit and do the many things that need to be done to make our present equipment as effective as possible. Next, an administration building and two dormitory units will be sought; these with the small accessory buildings should cost about $250,000. Next will come the effort to secure the endowment, all the time keeping in mind the other buildings and the equipment needed.

Piedmont is a national enterprise of our churches, and the appeal will be nation-wide. The country has been divided into seven financial districts; and as soon as possible a representative will be placed in each. Rev. George W. Ray, with headquarters at 215 Manhattan Avenue, New York City; Dr. Dwight M. Pratt, 2041 East 96th Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, and Mrs. Gertrude M. Jones, 3812 North Crawford Avenue, Chicago, Illinois, are already at work, and representatives in the other districts will be placed as rapidly as possible. I shall issue from this office a small bi-monthly publication, called "The National Piedmontonian," through which will be given information as to the College, its field, the progress of the campaign and other pertinent matters of interest.

This is no sudden move, but has been under consideration for many months. The campaign will continue until the full amount is secured or I am dead, deposed or decadent; then someone else will take it up. The need and opportunity are unequaled anywhere in America whether the Nation or the Kingdom of God is considered.

Yours for a persistent pull with unanswerable arguments,

Frank E. Jenkins,
President, Piedmont College, Demorest, Georgia.

Do not forget that the first month's salaries of our teachers are now due. All receipts from October 1st will be counted as a part of the results of the campaign.

The Congregationalist and Advance

A Going Concern

GOD'S work in and through and for men is a "going concern"—to adopt for a moment the language of business. God's work proceeds day and night, summer and winter, in war and in peace. Sometimes through a spectacular demonstration or a nation-wide campaign, it attracts for the time being the attention of the populace. But for the most part it goes forward quietly, unostentatiously, like the operations of the sunshine and the rain.

A mother brings to bear the gentle pressure that in time shapes the character of the growing child. A teacher on the Lord's Day or on a week day, facing a row of bright, youthful faces, transmits the information and the vision that become the motive to right living. The social or civic reformer, the good citizen, like Jacob Schiff, attacks a long standing evil and by and by it begins to give way, or in spite of popular indifference, he undertakes and carries through measures looking toward the reconstruction of the present order. The man whose heart is warm with an abiding love for Christ speaks tenderly, pleadingly to a friend and neighbor, a business associate, and behold another soul is born into the kingdom.

In the midst of the materialism and strife of our age we forget about these noiseless activities in our Father's Kingdom. We say the church is torpid, that the young people are restless and worldly minded, that our world in these post-war days is stricken with fever, that it is cursed by the passion for pleasure and for gain.

But once in a while something happens which proves that we are wrong, or at least only partly right. A man comes out of Turkey. We may never have heard his name. He shows the marks of care and hardship, but his face lights up as he tells what he and his fellow workers have been accomplishing since 1914. We had thought that that part of the Near East was practically given over to rapine and bloodshed, that Mustapha's forces were engaged in cutting the throats of the Turks who take their orders from Constantinople, but here we have the first-hand tale of the going work of the kingdom all through these terrible years, how our brave American workers have brought together the scattered, intimidated Armenian children, massed them in orphanages, fed, clothed and instructed them, how these same missionaries and relief workers have stood everywhere for order and justice and for the allaying of racial and religious antipathies.

Or some worker in school and church comes up from the South and gives us a picture of a single cross-section of faithful and fruitful efforts being put forth in behalf of both races in the South. Or some pastor or educator from the West arrives, his heart burdened with the religious and educational needs of many groups of young men and women, and of communities still lacking the presence and the benefits of a Christian church.

Or one who has become an expert in the attractive and ever-expanding field of religious education claims a few moments of our time to tell of new and potent instrumentalities now being employed, of modern methods and programs, of conferences and institutes, of the eagerness of many churches and pastors for guidance in order that young life may not only be educated, but religiously educated in the truest sense of the term. Or still another appears, fired with the passion that justice in terms of an ample sustenance be afforded the spiritual leaders of the churches and honored seniors throughout our fellowship East and West. You begin to share his enthusiasm as he speaks of the response already being made to these and other movements designed to give a new stability and dignity to the Christian ministry and to exalt it before the eyes of young men now in college.

All this is convincing evidence of a vast and many-sided enterprise in actual and effective operation. The world may still be pretty bad, but something tremendously powerful is at work in it. Some seed still falls by the wayside and some on rocky ground and some among thorns, but you can see almost everywhere signs of an awakened conscience, of a sweeter and purer common life, of nobler standards of citizenship and public service, of a growing brotherhood the world over.

Here at the outset of the church year we should lift our eyes from the scenes that depress us and look with believing and expectant hearts over the wide world. How Paul's heart throbbed with joy as he wrote those glowing words about the gospel "bearing fruit in all the world!" Yet it had only made a little headway in his day. The Christian church had few of the resources in money, talent and consecration that are at its disposal today. But some of its members are awake and are doing things.

Who would be outside the lines when the campaign grows more intense? Who would lose the joy of being associated through our efforts, our sympathies and our gifts with God's growing kingdom? Much of man's work during these last five years has gone toward the devising and the production of implements of destruction, but God has not intermitted his work. He has been guiding our world in all its travail of soul. The Christian seed is still vital. It is bearing constant fruit for the help and healing of the nations.

As we work at our individual task, as we join with others in proved and tested common undertakings, we can be electrified by the thought that what we do, however small, is a real contribution to the greatest business on this earth.

WHAT THE CHRISTIAN WORLD IS DOING

Seventy Cities to Celebrate

A SERIES of celebrations of the Pilgrim Tercentenary is to be held in seventy cities of the United States from Nov. 15 to Nov. 26. Twelve teams, each of which will have with them a distinguished Englishman and an eminent American as the principal speakers, will hold mass meetings in practically all the large cities from coast to coast, coming to a climax in a meeting in New York City on Nov. 26. The teams are to be sent out under the auspices of the American Mayflower Council, which is composed of one hundred representative American men and women and of which Henry Churchill King is Chairman. The exact dates of all the meetings can be obtained from the American Mayflower Council, 111 Fifth Ave., New York City.

Foreign Pilgrim Delegations

STRONG delegations, English and Dutch and Canadian, are now in this country to take part in the tercentenary celebrations. From England come the Lord and Lady Rathcreedan; Admiral Wiliam Lowther Grant, K. C. B.; Sir Arthur E. Shipley; Sir John Henry; Prof. Frederick J. Foakes-Jackson; Colonel H. W. Edwards; John Blair MacAfee; Stanley Udale; George McKinley and Harry S. Perris. From Canada, Senator Raoul Dandurand, K. C.; Justice William Renwick Riddell; Colonel Charles Frederick Hamilton and C. H. Scannell. From Holland, Dr. W. H. de Beaufort, acting Minister from the Netherlands; Dr. A. J. Barnouw; Dr. D. H. Andrae, commercial attaché of the Netherlands Legation, and Dr. J. B. Hubrecht. All were present at yesterday's reception except Minister de Beaufort and Colonel Hamilton. This delegation has been enjoying the hospitable guidance of the American branch of the Sulgrave Institute last week, its members received the freedom of the city in New York, were banqueted and welcomed at a great popular meeting in Carnegie Hall at which the Mayflower Compact and the first legislative assembly in America, at Jamestown, Va., were jointly celebrated. This meeting was broken up by Irish disorder and adjourned for a more peaceable time.

Quakers in World Conference

THE Quaker faith must be thriving even if it is not making a great noise in the world when it can bring together, as it has recently done in London, 1,000 of its prominent adherents from all over the world. The gathering was called The All Friends Conference, and was the first of the kind since the 17th Century. America sent 350 Quakers and good delegations came also from South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, as well as from mission fields in China, Japan, India, Syria and Madagascar. The conference made for quiet and the forgetting of long-standing differences. Professor Rufus M. Jones of Haverford College, Pennsylvania, had a prominent part on the platform. Much interest was taken in efforts looking toward the reform of the existing order in industry. According to The Christian World of London discussion centered on these three subjects. (1) The need of maintaining a living silence—a silence full of events—in our meetings for worship. (2) The increase of social intercourse among the members of our meetings, irrespective of barriers of class or of opinion. (3) The extension of religious education.

Conditions in Armenia Slowly Improving

MR. Charles V. Vickrey, secretary of the Near East Relief, who has returned to America after a three months' tour of inspection of the region in which the organization is operating, reports some improvement in the general conditions. There is still very urgent need of relief. He says that throughout the Caucasus and Armenia the officials, premiers, governors, and mayors and others in authority agree that Armenia was saved last year by the food supplies sent from America. The people of Armenia in some areas are struggling bravely toward self-support, however. Although they are wholly without modern agricultural implements, are sadly deficient in oxen and have a woefully inadequate supply of seed wheat, they have succeeded in raising food supplies sufficient to meet their needs until midwinter. But at that time they will be face to face with starvation again unless America continues to save them from such a fate. Under the recently signed treaty with Turkey the Armenians are to be permitted to return to their villages from which they were deported by the Turks, but the terms of the treaty have not yet been made effective, and when they do become operative the refugees will discover their homes and farms in ruins. The orphanage at Alexandropol cares for about 10,000 children, the one at Kars about 6,000, and the one at Erivan about 3,000, while many smaller orphanages are maintained at other points throughout the Armenian area. The great value in this work lies in the fact that from these orphaned children of Armenia are to come the future leaders who will carry forward the development of the Armenian Republic.

Religious Education for English Congregational Students

THE Congregational Theological Colleges in England have just appointed their first Professor of Religious Education. Professor James W. Stevenson, Ph. D., begins his work there this fall. He will give courses to the students of the seven colleges. In some cases, as in London, students of two or more colleges will attend his classes at the same time. In other cases he will give courses in each college. Dr. Stevenson was born in the Orkneys, but at an early age came to Canada. There he was educated in the public schools and had a brilliant course in Manitoba University and in Manitoba Presbyterian Theological College from which institution he also received his B. D. degree. He had several Presbyterian congregations in Canada and then studied in the Hartford School of Religious Pedagogy, majoring under Professor A. J. William Myers in Religious Education and graduating with the degree of Doctor of Philosophy last spring. Dr. Stevenson is well trained for the important work to which he is called.

The Outreach into the Community

VISITATION in the parish on a large and systematic scale in the early autumn is a plan that is rapidly finding favor among the churches. A number of them this month and next are putting it into operation. It amounts practically to the Every Member Canvass, shorn of its financial objective. In some cases twenty-five per cent. of the members visit the other seventy-five per cent., but their calling has nothing to do with the presentation of a subscription blank. It is simply an expression of fellowship and of the desire on the part of the church at the beginning of the working year to mobilize all its strength and cement the ties of a common brotherhood in Christ. Usually the way for this approach is prepared by a written notification to the families who are to be visited, by sermons suited to the undertakings and by devoting preliminary prayer meetings to the task of instructing and inspiring those who are to do the work of visitation. They carry with them cards on which are listed the various kinds of Christian service in which church members may properly engage. Each person visited is asked to select the work most suited and congenial to him. With this effort to increase the number of active Christians and to make each responsible for some one thing goes the endeavor to enlist the interest of those who are now non-church members or non-attendants upon church in the services of worship and in the church as an institution. Commendable indeed is this fellowship canvass. It blesses both those who take part in it and those who are visited. It removes the too current misunderstanding to the effect that all the church wants of the public is money, money, money.

EDITORIAL

Harding versus Cox

Few readers will pass by the articles in this issue by two prominent Congregational ministers relating to the presidential campaign. President Thomas of Middlebury College and Dr. Maurer, pastor of the historic First Church in New Haven, are both well known and highly esteemed among the Congregational churches. Each was asked to declare what he intends to do at the polls and the reasons therefor. They have responded without hesitation or reservation. Both men are in the current of public affairs and both by virtue of war service unstintedly rendered had exceptional opportunity not only to know the common man, but to learn how currents of thought are moving with reference to national and international issues.

That two such high-minded men and careful observers of the signs of the times differ so radically in their view of the proper course for the Christian citizen to take at the next election illustrates the confused situation and the differences which we trust will prove only temporary between equally good friends and advocates of internationalism. Dr. Thomas has pointed out what he considers a defect in the League as it exists at present to which comparatively few of its opponents have called attention, though English Liberals of a certain school were quick to see and criticize it. The representative of the United States in the council is not an elected representative of the American people but an appointee of the President, as are our consuls and ambassadors. Whether this alleged defect vitiates the League as a whole or whether it can be obviated under our system of government are questions for experts, but that aside, it is interesting to notice that Dr. Thomas is no less eager than Dr. Maurer for some kind of an effective association of nations in which America shall bear her due share of responsibility. He is no "bitter ender," but he thinks that the quickest way to secure a league is through the election of Mr. Harding, and undoubtedly his conviction is shared by many other advocates even of the League substantially in its present form.

The whole issue is not so much the exact phrasing of a single article, even Article X or Article XI, as it is a question of the mood of the American people toward the central idea and the real disposition of the man soon to be entrusted with power and capable of making or marring a real league. Notwithstanding reaction in many quarters and the temporary dominance of intense party feeling, notwithstanding the anti-British wave that has swept over certain cities, we still believe, as we always have believed, that the American people, especially those who believe in Christian ideals and the possibility of Christianized international relations, want a genuine and active society of nations. They are not stampeded by the cry of "entangling alliances" or the citing of historic precedents.

Some, whose natural affiliations are with the Republican Party, and who would prefer for many reasons to entrust the direction of national affairs to it these coming four years, have reason to believe that Governor Coolidge stands with them in his adherence to the central ideal of the League. They are not quite so certain about Mr. Harding, and they wish they might know whether his fundamental convictions and his ardent desires are in line with the work and the ideals of such eminent Republicans as ex-President Taft and ex-Secretary Root, or with Senator Johnson, Senator Borah and Senator Lodge. Upon this alternative hangs the decision of some who are still doubtful. Whatever the outcome of the election, which it is increasingly clear will not be determined solely by the League of Nations issue, we have good hope that the League idea will survive and grow.

Why Do We Go to Church?

We must distinguish always between the church as the body of believers and the church as a place of worship and instruction. To go to church is not essentially to present yourself in a particular building at an appointed hour, it is to unite yourself with other believers for worship, communion, intercession and instruction. It was the popular confusion of these two entirely distinct ideas which made some our ecclesiastical forefathers insist upon separating the words and giving to the place of common gathering that name of "meeting-house," upon which the changes of humor have been so often rung but which is, when you come to consider it, so exactly expressive of a use and purpose.

Turning now from the thought of the Church, which is essentially a body of believers associated for the work of Christ, and only by accommodation the place in which they meet, it may be worth while for us to consider briefly one of the special uses of the gathering of those believers in an appointed place. In the Gospel story that place was at one time a large upper room where Christ met with his disciples. In Laodicea a church met in the house of Nymphas. In Scrooby, it was in the house of William Brewster. In Leyden the Pilgrim Church met in the house of John Robinson. These meetings, wherever they are held, are for many purposes, from consultation to sacramental communion. The place does not matter much, but the spirit of the meetings matters greatly.

To take a symbol from a familiar modern thing, perhaps we may best describe the gatherings of the church, that is, of the brotherhood, as a power house of spiritual energy. Worship is not an end in and of itself. We come together to renew and reinvigorate our powers in order to carry on the work of Christ. Except by way of witness, the uses of worship are mainly individual and personal. Unless the preacher gets hold of the attention of Tom, Dick and Harry individually and helps and inspires and makes them think, his sermon is a failure. We do not go to church out of mere loyalty, we go to be helped in the work which is given us to do for Christ and for our neighbors. And we have a right to expect that this communication of power will be provided for, though it may not come exactly on any one occasion in a form which we ourselves can assimilate and use. There are other images of this matter which are common enough in Scripture and in Christian talk. We go to be fed; to be comforted; to be encouraged; to be instructed; to be inspired. If there is none of this transmission of power a congregation will soon fall off. They can hear brilliant oratory and learn about various subjects of knowledge elsewhere. They come to church to gain spirtual help and power.

This is the point which Winfred Rhoades made in his article which we published in our number of Sept. 9, and which has awakened much attention. It was the story of a hungry man who went to church and was not helped. It was Milton's complaint over again against the church of his own time in Lycidas:

> "The hungry sheep look up and are not fed."

It was a fair arraignment of the churches which had not provided for the needs of the people the spiritual food, the spiritual power which it is the business of the ministers of the churches to supply, largely, it seemed to him, because they were so taken up with secondary aims and things. So far as this writer was concerned, in this time of his special need, he came to the power house and there was no current turned on for his need.

There is no necessary contradiction to this in the criticism which a correspondent makes of this article in another column. He says that it is the business of the man in the pew to give rather than to get. But we think this criticism fails to distinguish between the office and purpose of the gathering of the church for worship and instruction and the life of the church in the world. The worship of the church should bring spiritual power and help, but in order that it may be used. The one is in order to the other. We come to the table not merely to enjoy the food but that we may be strong to work. Christ's own image makes the whole relation clear. "Doth a man light a candle?"—that is the office of the church and the rightful claim of the individual worshiper—"to put it under a bushel measure?" We do not connect our house with the power house in order to turn the electricity off, but to turn it on.

The real point is that the help of worship is ordinarily needful to make the individual Christian as efficient a servant of Christ and of the world as he is capable of becoming. Most of us cannot get on without these renewals of our strength. And the first business of the church is to make provision for these renewals through its worship and its teaching. There is no mere self seeking here. The provision is as practical and as necessary as the work of the farmer's wife who provides food for her husband and his workers in the time of harvest.

It took a stack of cards ten miles high to record the population of the United States. We hope we are all happy, and especially all worthy, to have our name written there.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Cocoanut Cakes

I was not always aged, but was once young. And I sojourned in a School of the Prophets. And on the day before the Sabbath I rode every week Nineteen Miles that on the Sabbath Day I might speak the word of God to the people in a Little White Synagogue with a Tall Steeple. And on the day after the Sabbath I rode back again. And there were times when the Roads were bad, so that for every foot that my horse went forward, he sank in the mud unto the depth of an half of a foot; so I went down through Nine Miles and the half of a Mile of mud before I got there. But when I arrived then did the good people welcome me into warm homes and clean beds and set before me hot suppers.

For I boarded around among them.

And at the first place where I abode for a Sabbath, the good woman set before me Cocoanut Cake. And I ate plentifully thereof.

Now the women of the other homes inquired of her, saying, How didst thou like the Young Minister? And is he hard to entertain? And doth he cause thee much trouble? And is he fussy? And what doth he like to eat?

And she said, He is not fussy, and he keepeth out of the kitchen, and when he hath a book he doth not bother the hostess with Theology; and he said unto me that Cocoanut Cake is his Favorite Cake.

Now all the women told all the other women, saying, The Young Minister loveth Cocoanut Cake.

And they all knew how to make Cocoanut Cake, and they all made it. And wherever I went, there did they set before me Cocoanut Cake.

Now thou wilt surely think within thine heart that I got so much Cocoanut Cake that I abhorred it, and that I have never liked it since. But thou hast another Think coming. For thou knowest not what sort of Cocoanut Cake the women of that Parish make. Yea, for three years did I eat it with scarce ever a break in the record, save that there also they make Cake with Maple Sugar Frosting. And he that hath eaten that kind of Cake knoweth that that is about the best ever.

For there be some things of which no man can ever have too much. And when mine heart goeth back across the years, then do I remember the long rides, and the times that I drave up in the dark and the cold, and how they stabled mine horse knee-deep in clean straw, and put a sack of oats under the buggy-seat when I departed, and maybe also a Bushel of Potatoes or a Sack of Apples or a Can of Maple Syrup. And I know that I shall never have too much of any of the good things which they bestowed upon me, nor of the love that was in them all.

And now and then as the years go by, and one and another of those I loved is called unto his long home, then do they send for me to come and say a word of love before the dust returneth unto dust. And ever there is some good woman who hath a table set for me in her home; and there do I always find Cocoanut Cake.

And whenever I eat of Cocoanut Cake that is Unusually Nice, then do I remember the friends of my early Ministry as a Messenger of God, and I love them yet.

In Brief

Both the leading presidential candidates have now been in peril from railroad accident, both escaping without injury, we are thankful to say. We may be sure, therefore, that we shall have a President who has a fellow feeling for those who go by rail.

Possibly the reduction of prices by Mr. Ford will suggest to some parishes the possibility of presenting their minister with a next year's model car. We have the impression that the average pastor is not over particular about date and make. All cars look alike to him so long as he does not have any himself.

We are sorry that any woman should be found guilty of conspiring to evade the plain laws of the land. But the rather shameless treatment of law and the officials of law by Mrs. Bergdoll and her two sons and the publicity which has accompanied their plots and evasions will perhaps make a good object lesson in the conviction of all three of them. For they are not like ignorant people. They knew what they were doing and used all the resources of wealth to flout the law.

The interruptions of business for six Boston banks seem most of them to have arisen from lack of fluidity of funds, rather than from lack of resources. The whole business world lives on credit and confidence, we must so act as not to impair that confidence or we shall all suffer. But in spite of these unpleasant postponements for repayment of cash we are still of the opinion that any good savings bank or commercial bank is a much safer place for our reserve money than an old stocking or the bottom of a bureau drawer.

Dr. Francis E. Clarke, recently back from Europe and preaching in New York, makes a point of the contrasts of Paris life, with costly, pampered dogs in one house and starving babies just around the corner. That is the defect of the imagination behind which Brother Cain tried to hide when he asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" There is something too much like Cain's primitive selfishness in any indulgence just now in thoughtless and needless luxuries when little children are dying of hunger in many places round the world.

Among recent discoveries in the archives of Leyden concerning the Pilgrims is a signature of Pastor Robinson to an acknowledgment of indebtedness, signed also by Thomas Brewer, the printer, who was William Brewster's partner, and by William Jepson, and also a later acknowledgment of payment in full. Other entries show how soon after Robinson's death the fear of the Pilgrim leaders that their little company would be lost in the flood of Dutch life was justified. Another discovery was that of the will of Bridget Robinson, the Pastor's widow.

Few men have passed away with a wider public respect, affection and sorrow than the New York banker Jacob Schiff. He had been greatly influential in his profession and had contributed largely to America's progress and upbuilding. He was widely known for his contribution and personal services for good works, among his own fellow religionists first, and then in much wider fields of philanthropy. He is one of the best examples of men born and even educated in other lands who seem by nature and genius to be American and set an example of large-minded American thinking to the natives of our soil.

The London Christian World prints an interview with Dr. Clifford, the great and honored Baptist pastor who in his old age retains so much of the prophetic fire. Dr. Clifford began by expressing his surprise at the outcome of the Lambeth Conference.

To sum up his opinion the interviewer asked him whether he despaired of a greater church in the future, and Dr. Clifford answered:

> By no means! I count this Lambeth Conference Appeal as itself the most important contribution to the development of spiritual unity in the Churches that has been given for a century. It is a great achievement, and will do untold good; but there is no gain in ignoring the fact that it does not supply any practical guidance as to the method and means of creating unity in ecclesiastical form that our Churches can accept. Still, Christ, the Creator and the Head of the universal Church, leads, and in Him is our trust.

Why I Shall Vote for Harding

The Larger Promise of the Republican Ticket

By Pres. John M. Thomas

Middlebury College, Vermont

I dwell in a house by the side of the road and I try to understand and sympathize with the feelings and thoughts, the enthusiasms, passions and resentments of those who pass my door. I kindled my anger at the fires of their wrath against the German bayonets which impaled Belgian babies and I forced my way alike into their suffering and their eagerness as they sent their sons to France for vengeance. It is good to be close to the heart of this brave, honest, fair-minded, justice-loving people. I shall vote for Senator Harding in order that I may claim fellowship with the great masses of the nation in their feelings of disappointment and indignation at President Wilson's management of the peace negotiations, both abroad and at home, from the day of the armistice until now.

Those feelings are justified. The soldier did his job magnificently, but the statesman who represented him at the peace table made a sorry mess of things. He turned admiration for American valor into contempt for American intelligence. Read Keynes' "Economic Consequences of the Peace," or any other inside story of the Versailles Conference, and you are forced to admit it. Mr. Wilson changed the good will of Europe toward us into scorn and hatred. He forfeited absolutely the position of moral leadership which America had gained. He staked everything on a crude and ill-digested plan for permanent peace, which there is no evidence he had ever thought of until a few weeks before he left for Paris, and failed even to accomplish immediate peace. When he landed in France the whole world was eager for a just and permanent settlement; when he departed a score of wars had flamed up and many of them are raging still. The gathering at Versailles was the most disappointing conference in which great nations ever participated, and the man most responsible for the failure was President Wilson. The coming election is the first opportunity of the citizenry of America to register their judgment whether they were justly represented at the Peace Conference, and for the honor and good name of my country I want to be among those who vote that they were not.

Objections to the Wilson League

I shall vote for Senator Harding because I believe in a League of Nations. Mr. Wilson's league is dead. Europe takes that for granted and is fighting its wars as if no league had ever been proposed. Even the election of Mr. Cox would not put life into that league nor bring about American participation in it. There would still be the Senate to reckon with.

Now I do not find all of my church and college friends doing justice to the Senate objections to Mr. Wilson's league. In this matter the people as a whole are nearer right than the "intellectuals." The fundamental difficulty with Mr. Wilson's league is not the voting power of the British colonies, nor the inadequate safeguarding of the Monroe Doctrine, nor any similar detail, serious as those questions may be. The great objection to it is that it violates the fundamental principle of American government, which is that power may be exercised in the name of the people only by those chosen to represent them. Under Mr. Wilson's league plan some individual whom no citizen has voted for, who would be entirely beyond the reach and control of any elective body, would have full power and authority to commit this nation on all matters of foreign policy, on questions of the largest conceivable importance, and the country would be absolutely bound to the consequences of his decisions. Read the League Covenant and see if that is not true.

Warren G. Harding
Republican Nominee for President

The Ways and Means Are Wrong

England can consent to such an arrangement, because she has a "government" subject to recall the moment that any representative, such as her league delegate, loses the confidence of the people. But under our system there is no such possibility, as we elect our President for a definite term and for specific duties, which do not include many matters which would come before our league representative for decision. I do not believe that the American people will ever consent—or ever ought to consent—to commit the determination of their relations to all other peoples of the world to some one person in whose selection they have no choice and over whose acts they can exercise no control. That would be to abandon democracy. The instinct of the rank and file to hold back from such abandonment of their constitutional right to act through their representatives is wiser than the impulse of the few in church and college to plunge into this league because it is announced in the name of idealism and world peace.

The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light, and one of the frequent follies of the children of light is to follow blindly some leader with a pious vocabulary. The local paper in my town, when the first dispatches came from Paris, came out with the flaring announcement—"The League of Nations is Right!" The idea of it is grandly right, but the ways and means are decidedly wrong and absolutely un-American. They are opposed to the counsels of Washington, the principles of Jefferson, and the doctrine of Lincoln at Gettysburg. The more carefully I consider the fundamental principles of government involved in Mr. Wilson's league the more convinced I am that the growing opposition to it has been based upon sound judgment.

An Effective League

On the other hand I do not understand that a Republican vote is an abandonment of the ideal of "the parliament of man, the federation of the world." Senator Harding is committed by his platform to an "agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world," he is pledged to "an international association based on international justice—which shall secure instant and general international conference whenever peace shall be threatened." The way to an effective league is to sustain him in carrying out this pledge. If we are to have a league at all, it must be "without depriving the people of the United States in advance of the right to determine for themselves what is just and fair when the occasion arises."

The quotations are from the Republican Platform, which is not a denial of American responsibility in world affairs, nor a boast of American selfish isolation, but a clear and forceful declaration of what American foreign policy should be, and which includes explicit commitment to an international organization consistent with the American principle of government by the people.

A Safer Man

I shall vote for Senator Harding because his election promises relief from the intolerable burdens heaped upon the American people through administrative waste and inequitable taxation; because I believe he will gather about him counselors and administrative assistants competent to manage the business of the country; because I think he is a safer man than his opponent to appoint successors to the four Justices of the Supreme Court who are expected to retire within the next Presidential term; and because there is good ground for expectation that he will check the dangerous tendency to predominance of executive authority and put an end to autocracy in making the world safe for democracy.

I shall vote against Senator Cox because he was the candidate of the "wets" in Ohio, and of Tammany at San Francisco, and because a man who isn't good enough for a confirmed Democrat like Mr. William Jennings Bryan isn't good enough for a Vermont Republican. I shall vote for Senator Harding because he is a sound, straight-forward, honest-dealing American citizen, of ripe experience in public affairs, and a man who has singularly won the confidence of those who have had best chance to know him.

Lastly and most joyously I shall vote for Senator Harding in order that I may vote also for the man of keenest mind, of greatest courage, and of largest promise in American public life today—Calvin Coolidge of Vermont and Massachusetts.

Why I Shall Vote for Cox

In Support of the League of Nations

By Rev. Oscar E. Maurer, D.D.

First Church, New Haven, Ct.

As an Independent I expect to vote for Governor Cox, for the following reasons:

1. I am in favor of the League of Nations, which in my humble opinion is the supreme issue in the present campaign. Quite naturally I shall vote for the candidate who stands squarely for the League. The Democratic platform declares for the League. So does Governor Cox. In his New Haven speech he devoted most of his time to a discussion of our international obligations, and, if I can understand plain English, he believes that the United States is in honor bound to enter the League without further delay. He is in favor of progressive disarmament. He feels that America will be none the less American for taking her place willingly and whole-heartedly in the family of nations and assuming the responsibilities of such a relation. The problems which are now vexing Europe are not primarily national but international, and are therefore bound to affect us. We cannot isolate ourselves from them. Sooner or later we must face them, just as we finally entered the great war after an earnest but unsuccessful effort to maintain neutrality. The question is, shall we face these international problems from without or from within the League? Governor Cox says clearly, "From within."

The Republican Contrast

In strong contrast to this the Republican platform is vague and evasive on the question of the League as well as on other points. As for Senator Harding, with due respect for his toga, I am puzzled to know just where he stands, although I have read his various utterances with a sincere desire to grasp his point of view. Before becoming a candidate he voted for the ratification of the League with reservations. In his speech of acceptance, subsequently, he said explicitly that he is opposed to the League on the ground that our national isolation is an asset of proven worth and should be maintained. Later he said that while he is opposed to the League which Mr. Wilson helped make, he is in favor of an association of nations constituting a world court, such as Republican Mr. Root is at present helping organize—under the League of Nations. Still later Mr. Wickersham issued a statement to the effect that Mr. Harding is not entirely opposed to the idea of the League after all.

The most that I can make out of all this is that Senator Harding would prefer no League at all, thus coinciding with Senators Borah, Brandegee and Johnson. But if a League is the thing to have, it must be one of American make, thus appeasing Senator Lodge and his confrères. The thing must not be rushed, for conditions have changed since the signing of the Armistice. Plenty of time must be given to the conception and organization of the new association of nations, so as to avoid the mistakes and pitfalls of the present instrument. Meanwhile, let us make a separate peace with Germany without reference to the Versailles treaty, restore conditions as nearly as possible to normal, and put up our sign, "Business as usual," leaving our late associates in the war to settle their problems by themselves.

James M. Cox
Democratic Nominee for President

For one, I cannot follow this line of reasoning to its logical conclusion with any peace of mind or conscience, and retain any confidence in American Christianity, which put itself eloquently on record as to its motives for grasping the sword. For it either means that we did not go into the war to fight for democracy but went in to save our own skins, as has been publicly stated by the Republican governor of a New England state; or else it means that having gone in with lofty motives we are unwilling to plow the furrow to the end. Senator Harding's attitude is that of an intense and reactionary nationalism which in its desire to safeguard its own is suspicious of its late associates in the war, indifferent to the sufferings of Armenia and frankly hostile to the nations of the Farther East. That kind of nationalism is simply the state-philosophy of Prussia in another form, and it does not change its essential character by calling itself Americanism and claiming the Stars and Stripes as its emblem. It was the doom of Germany. From the days of Constantine down it has been a constant curse upon the Christian state, the Christian church and the Kingdom of God.

Law Enforcement

2. I like the attitude of Governor Cox toward law enforcement and am favorably impressed by his record. He is accused of being in sympathy with the liquor element. I find that as governor of Ohio there are several appointments made by him which may fairly be called "wet" appointments. These are more than offset by the fact that under his administration the laws have been vigorously enforced, and for this statement we have the testimony of his bitterest enemies in Ohio. He really closed the saloons on Sunday, not only in the rural districts and smaller cities of Ohio, but in Cincinnati, where he threatened to remove a reluctant mayor unless the closing laws were enforced to the letter.

I am free to admit that both candidates suffer because of their political bedfellows. I don't like Mr. Cox's associations with Tammany. But on the other hand I find Mr. Harding tied up to men like Penrose whom I like even less. Governor Cox has on more than one occasion proven his independence. When I vote for a President of the United States I prefer to vote for a man with decision of character rather than for a man whose record in the Senate shows that he consistently votes, abstains from voting, or changes his vote with his political crowd. I feel that the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and its attendant legislation is safer in the hands of a man of the former type than in those of one of the latter.

Progressive Leadership

3. In this time of reconstruction we need leadership which is constructive and progressive. Governor Cox, both as a congressman and as a governor, has a record of such leadership to his credit. Even his political enemies admit that he has brought about more helpful and progressive social legislation during his three terms of office, than was adopted in Ohio from the time of the original constitution down to his assumption of office.

On the other hand, a study of Senator Harding's legislative record reveals the fact that his position has been consistently that of the traditional and conservative reactionary with reference to the great problems of industry and society. I fail to find anything in the Republican platform or in his recent utterances which mitigates this record or gives any great measures of hope for the future. And yet America, as never before, needs a President who is alive to the demands and opportunities of a new age, and who can approach his great task with at least a few ideas extending beyond those coined and issued by the Senate oligarchy.

Important as the second and third reasons are, they weigh less with me than does the first. This election is a referendum. Senator Lodge and President Wilson have both appealed to the country, and the supreme issue, the issue which if lost America may not again face in a thousand years, is the League of Nations. With our European associates we fought the war and we ought to finish the job. With this solemn and profound conviction I shall cast my vote for Governor Cox and the League of Nations.

The Moderator's Message

By Henry Churchill King

Moderator, National Council of Congregational Churches.

Many words should not be needed to commend the Congregational World Movement to our churches. No one, it would seem, who has been in close touch with "The Congregational World Movement," under our able Commission of One Hundred, can doubt the great value to the Denomination of that Movement. All aspects of the work of the Denomination have profited by it. The dire need to maintain at least the standard of giving now reached is unmistakable. The high cost of living and inequalities in exchange, as in China for example, in many cases demand the new scale of giving, if our missionary and educational work is even barely to hold its own, to say nothing of significant advance.

It should be clearly understood that the giving up of the Interchurch World Movement does not affect at all the desirability of our own World Movement going on. Our own program was a wholly reasonable and moderate one—distinctly less than had been proposed at the National Council—that ought to be fully maintained. Our machinery, too, is already fully set up.

It should be borne in mind also, in estimating the value of our World Movement, that it plans to go vigorously forward with the promotion of missionary education and stewardship—the only solid foundations for permanently increased giving.

The Fine Art of Giving

A Guide to a Joyful Habit

By Dean Charles R. Brown, D.D.

Outlet as well as intake is imperative if we are not to become green, scummy, stagnant pools. Fine impulses within the heart are worse than useless except they find prompt and wholesome expression in finer forms of effort. Retained they wither and die, poisoning the springs of action. The most direct mode of expression is to be found in giving—in giving time, money, strength and interest to needy lives and to worthy causes.

The call for gifts of money is loud and shrill. The whole world has been torn to pieces politically, industrially, socially, by the ravages of war. The cost of repair must of necessity be met by those who have not made the supreme sacrifice. The High Cost of Living leaves nothing untouched and the expense of carrying forward the charitable and missionary enterprises already organized into nation-wide and world-wide usefulness shares in the common advance. We have to give more generously than we gave before the war to achieve the ends in view.

Glad Privilege

The right mood for giving is one of great, glad privilege. When ye sacrifice, in order to give, be not of a sad countenance. Anoint your head and wash your face and smile. Let it all be done with the air of gladness for the Lord blesseth the cheerful giver! When the population of a beehive becomes congested the bees swarm. A great company of them under the leadership of a new queen moves out. They leave their home and the stock of honey they helped to make, going forth empty handed to find a new home and make a fresh start. And they enter upon that self-sacrifice with a song—bees are never so friendly as at the time when they swarm.

"When the burnt offerings began the song of the Lord began also with trumpets." Not in gloomy silence as if they were performing some disagreeable duty from which they would have been glad to escape but with a burst of music the people of Israel gave of their best to the God they served. They covered the self-denial they practiced with the radiant joy they felt in doing the will of the Most High. And the One who looketh not merely upon the outward appearance of a gift but upon its heart was well pleased.

Proportionate and Systematic

The giving had best be proportionate and systematic. The man of method has the wind and the tide with him. Other things being equal he will win out every day in the week and in all kinds of weather over the man who works by rule of thumb or entrusts valued interests to the care of mood and impulse. It is significant that the two most methodical concerns on earth—the Roman Catholic Church and the Standard Oil Company—are both "going concerns."

How much the leading apostle in the early Church had to say about giving! He was forever passing the plate! He furnished more good texts for sermons on generosity than all the other apostles put together. He preserved to us those fine words of our Lord which are nowhere else reported—"It is more blessed to give than to receive." He showed us the exalted nature of giving when he passed over without even letting his voice fall from his glorious hymn of immortal life in the fifteenth chapter of Corinthians to the need of an offering in the first words of the sixteenth chapter—"Now concerning the collection, let every one on the first day of the week lay by him in store."

Dean Charles R. Brown

He would make all giving intelligent and methodical. He would have our "love abound in knowledge and in all judgment." Men are to be prepared to make generous response by a sympathetic knowledge of the facts. He would have each gift the expression not of the purse alone nor of the heart alone—he would have heart and mind, purse and will enlist together in generous action.

But there must be system. "Upon the first day of the week" when the returns from the week of productive effort would all be in, "let each one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him." It was not all to be left to a sudden appeal which the apostle might make when he came; they were to be ready before he arrived. Paul had rare success in promoting the spirit and habit of systematic giving but he never aspired to the rôle of the skillful story-teller who undertakes to "lift" money out of the pockets of the stingy where it seems to be buried beyond the hope of a resurrection.

A Fixed Percentage

My own conviction and practice favor the habit of giving steadily a certain percentage of one's income. The old scriptural rule of giving a tenth to the work of religion and charity has stood the test of experience. The Jews were blessed in basket and in store, in heart and in soul, by their practice of tithing. The Mormon Church, whatever theological and moral limitations attach to some of its positions, has been able by its system of tithes to send forth an army of missionaries and to care for the needy with an admirable thoroughness.

The giving of the tenth need not be made a hard and fast rule to be enforced universally. This would mean a lack of equity. The man with an income of two thousand a year and the man with twenty thousand are not equally generous when they both practice tithing. The rule of the tenth would not call forth an adequate measure of generosity from Mr. Rockefeller while it would take too much from some humble toiler whose meager wages barely suffice for his needs. There is a certain "irreducible minimum" of necessary expenditure in the maintenance of a family which is much the same everywhere. The millionaire eats no more than the hod carrier. When this necessary outlay has been made it leaves a much wider margin for the man of generous means than it does for the man whose earnings barely provide a decent livelihood.

But let there be some definite percentage which mind and conscience can approve! Let people everywhere give as they live. If they are compelled to live sparingly, let there be no reproach when they give sparingly. If they live bountifully let them give also bountifully. Where a man spends nine dollars, or saves nine dollars for investment, let him see to it that at least one dollar is given to interests quite outside the field of his own comfort.

Experience in Tithing

Thirty years ago I was induced by a thoughtful layman in my first pastorate to inaugurate the habit of giving a tenth. My salary was only a thousand dollars a year and to give away one hundred of it seemed to make a big hole in it. But when the decision was once made I was amazed to find how much more I could give and did give than was the case when it was all left to mood and impulse. The habit of strictly keeping the tenth account would reveal to many a narrow soul the meagerness of his own benevolent output. Were a complete record kept many who think that they are giving a great deal because they give often, here a little, there a little, would be amazed at the lack of proportion between their personal expenditures and accumulations and their benevolences.

In all these thirty years I have never seen the day when I was tempted for a moment to return to the old spasmodic, haphazard method of giving to the Lord. We too have been blessed temporarily and spiritually, in basket and in store, in mind and in heart, in this practice of systematic giving. There has seemed to be an overarching Providence all the way. When the tenth account would be running low because we had drawn upon it more freely in the face of some unusual need, then some windfall out of a clear sky, a generous wedding fee or an invitation to lecture or a commencement address with a very cheering "honorarium" attached, would come to our relief and we would thank God and go forward.

How the treasuries of our churches would be filled with the sinews of war for a more effective campaign against the forces of sin and want did all professing Christians who are not clearly exempt begin to practice tithing! How the needs of our missionary societies at home and abroad would be met, their arms lengthened and strengthened for a mightier service, by this adequate support! How the army of aged ministers who have been laying down their lives in the service of the Christian ideal with no comfortable Carnegie pensions awaiting them, could be maintained in self-respect and decency until God calls them home! How the heart of the Master himself would rejoice in witnessing the advance of a more generous service to the sick and the hungry, the orphaned and the imprisoned as an acceptable service to him!

MUST HAVE SOUND FINANCES

The work of religion like all good work must have a sound financial basis in order to exist. First that which is natural, physical, material, then that which is spiritual. And this necessity for money had best be not furtively hidden away behind a camouflage of apron sales and oyster suppers. Let the church stand out in the open frankly asking for funds to carry on work worthy of such investment! Then let every Christian know that if he would not find himself rejected of the Lord in the day when the books are opened there must be some rightful proportion between his scale of expenditure and of accumulation and his scale of giving! Freely we have received—freely may we give in heartfelt appreciation of those benefits which are ours.

The reckless extravagance of these recent months seems to have led many to cast overboard all serious thought of personal responsibility for Christian work. There are Christian families who spend more on the theater and the movies than they give to evangelize the world. There are women who come to church wearing hats costing forty dollars a piece and then give fifty cents or a dollar to Christianize their own country. When we look at the present disproportion in many a home between the amounts spent for luxury, pleasure, self-indulgence, and the amount contributed to make strong the work of Christ in the world we wonder if we are worthy to be called Christian.

HOW LONG SHALL WE CARRY THE WORK?

When I was in London I saw a clever device for collecting money for the charity hospitals. At all the stations of the underground railways and in hundreds of public places there was a clock face with a hand pointing to the seconds and a small nickel-in-the-slot device at the side. The machine was inscribed, "It costs a penny a second to maintain the charity hospitals in London. Will you not carry on this work for one second?" And when one dropped in his penny the second hand moved to indicate the length of time he had supported the hospitals of the city.

It cost last year in round numbers $1,850,000 a year to maintain the foreign missionary work of our denomination by the American Board, including the Women's Boards, and $2,068,400 a year to carry on in our own land the Christian activities sustained by our Home Societies, this amount being divided as follows:

Congregational Home Missionary Society	$723,400
American Missionary Association	494,000
Congregational Church Building Society	564,000
Congregational Sunday School Extension Society	42,000
Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief	125,000
Congregational Education Society	120,000

The total amount expended for our home and foreign work was, accordingly, $3,918,400.

If we reckoned up the year in days of ten hours each this would mean an outlay of 30 cents per second to carry forward the work of these societies.

There is not a boy or girl in any Christian home who could not undertake to carry on that work for one second. There are a great many people in our churches who could sustain it for one minute. There are others who could provide for its needs for a whole hour. Here and there are generous givers of large means who could undertake to carry forward that vast work for half a day. Why should not each one according to the measure of his ability drop in enough to start the music of praise and service and keep it resounding for the period appointed?

Our Job as a Denomination

The Responsibilities Now Before Us

By Charles Emerson Burton

The sum of all the responsibilities of all the churches and all their members might be considered the task of the denomination. Our topic restricts us, however, to those pieces of work which we do together. What are the outstanding elements involved in this job?

PROVOKING ONE ANOTHER TO GOOD WORKS

Fellowship in the National Council, the state conference, the local association, the city union, the Congregational clubs, the ministers' meetings and other groups provide contacts calculated to stimulate each to do his best.

Just now our particular provocation job relates to the urgent—even distressing—demand for increases in pastors' salaries. In the face of 100 per cent. rise in living costs, the average increase of Congregational ministers' salaries has amounted to 20 per cent. since 1914. In this no church liveth to itself. Is not one of our first jobs, therefore, to add not less than $2,000,000 to pastors' salaries? This would give an average increase of but fifty per cent. over the standard of 1914.

PROVISION FOR OUR COMMON NEEDS

For example, our churches require religious literature, especially religious education helps. This is provided through the Religious Education Boards.

The ranks of the ministry and of other Christian workers must be constantly recruited. There are 48 Christian colleges, academies, training schools and seminaries affiliated with the denomination and others vitally associated with us. These are the chief sources of our supply of ministers, missionaries and Christian workers. Recruiting, however, involves specific propaganda. This is carried on by the Education Society, by the field force of the Church Extension Boards and by each agency for its own needs.

The fact that in 1919 only 170 were ordained to the ministry, while our annual retirement list is approximately 250, shouts aloud the call for vigorous approach to this part of our task. Realizing the situation the National Council made this one of the important items in the program of the Congregational World Movement.

DISCHARGE OF COMMON DUTIES

The denomination recognizes its duty to provide for the old age of its ministry, and the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is a splendid testimony to this recognition.

Likewise the denomination recognizes its obligation to provide relief for needy ministers and their dependent widows and children. Steps are now being taken to increase the pittance which has heretofore been provided.

Not a few communities which once supported strong churches now need churches more than ever, while the support of those churches is almost wholly withdrawn. It is incumbent upon the fellowship to lend a hand to churches in the slums; for example, as in multitudes of communities made needy by numerous causes.

When a church must build in these days of high costs the burden is almost crushing. Two-thirds of our churches are now handicapped by inadequate equipment. Through the Building Society opportunity is offered to lend a hand to sister churches one after another.

BUILDING UP THE CHURCH IN AMERICA

Today the individual church is not equipped to found new churches and foster weak ones. In this particular as a denomination we were making splendid progress in the years preceding the war, reaching the number of 6,103 churches in 1915. The effect of the war in withdrawing resources of men and money has been to reduce that number to 5,959—a loss of 144 churches The annual net gain in membership had reached a total in 1915 of 17,232. This dropped in 1918 to a net loss of 292, and the insignificant gain in 1919 of 144. Perhaps the most important cause in this apparent slump was the loss o 351 home missionaries due to lack of financia resources through the depreciation of the dollar

It is our job, therefore, to accelerate the up ward curve which has begun all along the line In this the individual and the particular church can do something, but success can come only through team work. Adequate support of the ministry, consistent evangelistic endeavor, generous backing of the missionary agencies, these will give us the victory.

Aid in Solving the Problems of America

Two problems stand out: the race question and the immigrant question. The rule of martial law in Washington and in Chicago within the past year on account of race conflict writes that question in red. What more potent force could we employ as our part in solving that problem than the leavening influence of the 600 workers of the American Missionary Association in schools, churches, social work, etc.? These are providing Christian leadership for the black man in America.

Whether America can bear the burden of assimilating 15,000,000 aliens, or thereabouts, and of making their 20,000,000 children loyal citizens of a democracy is a question which remains to be answered. Civilizations greater than ours in many respects have given way under loads no heavier. This is a spiritual question much more vitally than it is political or industrial. Given the inculcation of Pilgrim principles in the hearts of new Americans and of old, and the country is safe. As a denomination we have set ourselves to this task. In addition to the regular service of all our churches we minister regularly in 23 different tongues to several hundred congregations of those born on foreign shores. In 1914 the number was 769. By loss of resources during the war it has been reduced to 554. Special attention should be given, and is being given, by the Home Missionary Society to this phase of our task. To guide us in it a man has been employed to give all of his time to the study of ways and means, and to interpreting American ideals to our new neighbors and of interpreting our new neighbors to us.

Leavening the Nations with the Gospel

Only one-third of the people of the earth live in Christian lands. Less than one-third of the residents of nominally Christian lands are Protestant. Evangelical Christianity faces the stupendous task of leavening non-Christian nations or of being submerged in the mighty tide of overwhelming numbers in this generation of crumbling barriers between the peoples of the earth.

Given the machinery, together with the electric current, a feeble hand can turn the switch and perform great tasks. As a denomination the machinery is set for us in our American Board. The current of God's mighty power is ready for the turning of the switch. The individual who would preach the gospel to non-Christian peoples may enlist his life through the denomination to accomplish wonders. The most ordinary Christian by the consecration of his means may set in motion instrumentalities animated by the divine Spirit, and calculated to turn the world upside down.

By agreement with other denominations 75,000,000 of the non-Christian peoples of the earth constitute our parish. Eight hundred trained American Christians have associated with themselves 6,000 native workers whom they have trained in turn, and these work in eighteen different countries as teachers, preachers, physicians, nurses, industrial workers, etc., seeking to leaven the total life of these millions of our brethren. To support them and to reinforce them in this day when the harvest is ripe is the high privilege of Congregationalists.

It Involves Millions of Dollars

For doing our job we have a fine group of well-organized agencies, closely knit together and controlled wholly by the denomination. For all this work—for home missions, for Sunday school extension, for church building, for education in home, church and school, for vital ministry to Negroes and special groups, for pensions and ministerial relief, for foreign missions in eighteen countries, for forty-eight educational institutions, and for meeting our common needs and obligations, some six and one-half millions of dollars is required annually. Of this about one and one-half millions is available from funds, legacies, etc., leaving in round numbers $5,000,000 to be provided by living donors. It is a big job; too big for a few of us, but none too big for all of us working together. It is the job of each because it is the job of all.

The Program

Plans for the Fall and Winter

By Rev. Herman F. Swartz, D.D.

General Secretary of the Congregational World Movement

The fall and winter program of the united Congregational agencies is simple and unostentatious, but fundamental and thorough-going. The chief elements are these:

Missionary Education

The unanimous voice of pastors, churches and benevolent agencies calls for a wholesome earnest movement to promote a widespread and continuous inculcation of the facts and the principles which bear upon the endeavor of the Christian church to fulfill the command, "Go ye," which also means "Grow ye."

The idea of missionary education is accepted in all quarters but the practice in the local church is general only in the organizations maintained in the name of the women.

Manifestly three things are necessary for Missionary Education:

(a) Materials for study, based on realities, and wisely suited to all ages and both sexes, and fitted to the full range of presentation from the pulpit on the one hand to the kindergarten on the other. There already exists a surprisingly fine body of texts available for much of this scope of presentation and study. Most people—even many pastors—do not realize how much commendable material can be had and at how small a price, and running, for example, from Dr. Stocking's perfectly delicious book for children, "Mr. Friend o' Man," to the most recondite documents such as the recent surveys which will reward the attention of scholarship.

The Congregational Education Society as one of the constituents of the Congregational World Movement is devoting the energies of its department on Missionary Education to the selection and production of the best materials to be obtained. It is the purpose of the Movement to make these materials known and easily available.

(b) Pedagogical Methods. There is much that we do not know as to the best methods of conducting the process of missionary education. Nevertheless there are some in our denomination who have made careful, experimental studies of the whole matter of presentation, giving full value to the circumstances affecting the program of the local church, including such considerations as the Church school, the local societies, the pulpit, etc. It is commonly admitted that, with occasional superb exceptions, our knowledge of sound, workable methods for the local church, is far ahead of our practice. Most pastors and other church leaders covet such knowledge and seek helpful co-operation in putting it into operation. The Movement does not for a moment deceive itself with the fancy that we can do much more this year than make a good sound start in the desired direction.

(c) Organization. In most local churches there now exist women's missionary societies, and it is safe to say that in the majority of churches these societies of women constitute the only continuing organization with any vivid consciousness of the place of missionary education in the Christian equipment. We desire to co-operate energetically with the women's societies. In addition we believe that there ought to be in every church a standing committee whose chief responsibility, year after year, is missionary education. This committee should and can rank in dignity and vigor with the board of trustees or the music committee or any other committee. The Movement hopes, wherever such a committee does not exist or where, if existing, it functions uncertainly, to awaken, by the time-honored Congregational process of "sweet reason," an effective desire for a vital organization of this character.

Stewardship

The second major element in our work is the promotion of the doctrine and practice of stewardship. By "stewardship" is meant the acceptance in thought and in practice of the truth that we are accountable to God for our economic resources and further that a definite and considerable part of our income should be regularly devoted to him in the form of contributions to religious and benevolent causes. All we possess is held in trust, to be used under divine control. This is true of our wealth used in trade, industry or farming as well as of the gifts to specifically religious and benevolent causes. None the less there is an essential spiritual difference between these two types of accountability. Resources used in business are intended with what other good they may do to yield a profit to the owner, whereas gifts to religious ends are primarily altruistic. This kind of stewardship, untouched by self-interest, is necessary for the maintenance of spiritual vitality. It is akin to prayer. It is not to pay bills but rather it is an exercise of the soul. Such giving does indeed pay the costs of religious and charitable endeavor. It is therefore an exercise which strengthens both him who practices it and the cause to which it goes out. This is stewardship.

The Movement plans to send a neighboring pastor, or some other judicious volunteer, to every church with this message of systematic and proportionate giving. The visitor will be equipped with a chart exhibiting the denominational benevolence record of the church for a generation, both as to total gifts and on a per capita basis, and further showing what will be asked of the church under the 1921 apportionment and what this apportionment means on the basis of systematic, proportionate giving. This chart will be left with the officers of the church for further use as may be desired.

Dean Charles R. Brown has written specially for this part of our work an article small in size but great in convincing power. This we plan to circulate by the hundred thousand.

We believe further that the time has come to crystallize the general conscientious sentiment concerning stewardship into definite decision. To this end we will continue the circulation of the Enrollment Card which proved so acceptable last spring.

Financial

There lies before the churches a great financial objective. This is the apportionment for 1921. It will be $5,000,000. The reasons for this figure are set forth in detail in the Survey, now in the printer's hands, to which the reader is referred.

The method of seeking to attain this goal is simple and devoid of artificial devices. It will not be by a drive. It is the purpose to rely upon the well-known Every Member Canvass, thoroughly organized and well informed and conducted by each church when it will. We will ask about five hundred experienced volunteers such as pastors, officers of women's societies, board secretaries and others to give an average of two weeks to visiting neighboring churches to tell the story of the survey, to afford, where needed, expert counsel and even active field service in "setting up" the canvass. The expenses of these field workers will ordinarily be paid by the Movement. For this canvass the Movement will supply certain helpful materials.

Evangelism

The National Council's Commission on Evangelism is one of the syndicated organizations constituting the Movement. The harvest period of our churches comes normally in the spring. The plans and helps toward evangelism will be announced as the season progresses.

The Calendar

Oct. 1 onward: Missionary Education.

Nov. 1–30: Stewardship, for churches making the apportionment canvass in December. For other churches a later date may be chosen.

Deccember to May: The Every Member Canvass. Date to be selected by the church.

Jan. 1 to May 1: Evangelism. Pastors' classes, etc.

Field Organization

The Movement is not a new national society, rather it is a union of our existing agencies for purposes common to them all. This appears clearly in the line-up of general leadership.

The country has been divided into regions and directors have been assigned to their leadership as follows:

Region, Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont. Director, Frank W. Hodgdon, of Ministerial Boards.

Region, Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Director, Rev. Cornelius H. Patton, D. D., of American Board.

Region, Connecticut and New York. Director, Rev. Charles E. Burton, D. D., of Extension Boards.

Region, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, Virginia and Porto Rico. Director, Rev. George L. Cady, D. D., of American Missionary Association.

Region, The Southeast. Director, Rev. L. H. Kellar of Home Missionary Society.

Region, Colored Churches of the South. Director, Rev. Alfred Lawless, Jr., of American Missionary Association.

Region, Ohio, Michigan and West Virginia. Director, not yet appointed.

Region, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa and probably Nebraska. Director, Rev. R. W. Gammon, D. D., of Education Society.

Region, Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota. Director, not yet appointed.

Region, Montana. Director, Rev. Elmer H. Johnson of Home Missionary Society.

Region, Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana. Director, Rev. W. W. Scudder, D. D., lately of National Council.

Region, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah and New Mexico. Director, Rev. W. J. Minchin of Home Missionary Society.

Region, Southern California and Arizona. Director, Rev. George L. Kenngott of Southern California Conference.

Region, Northern California and Nevada. Director, Rev. H. H. Kelsey, D. D., of American Board.

Region, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Alaska. Director, not yet appointed.

The Congregational World Movement Advances

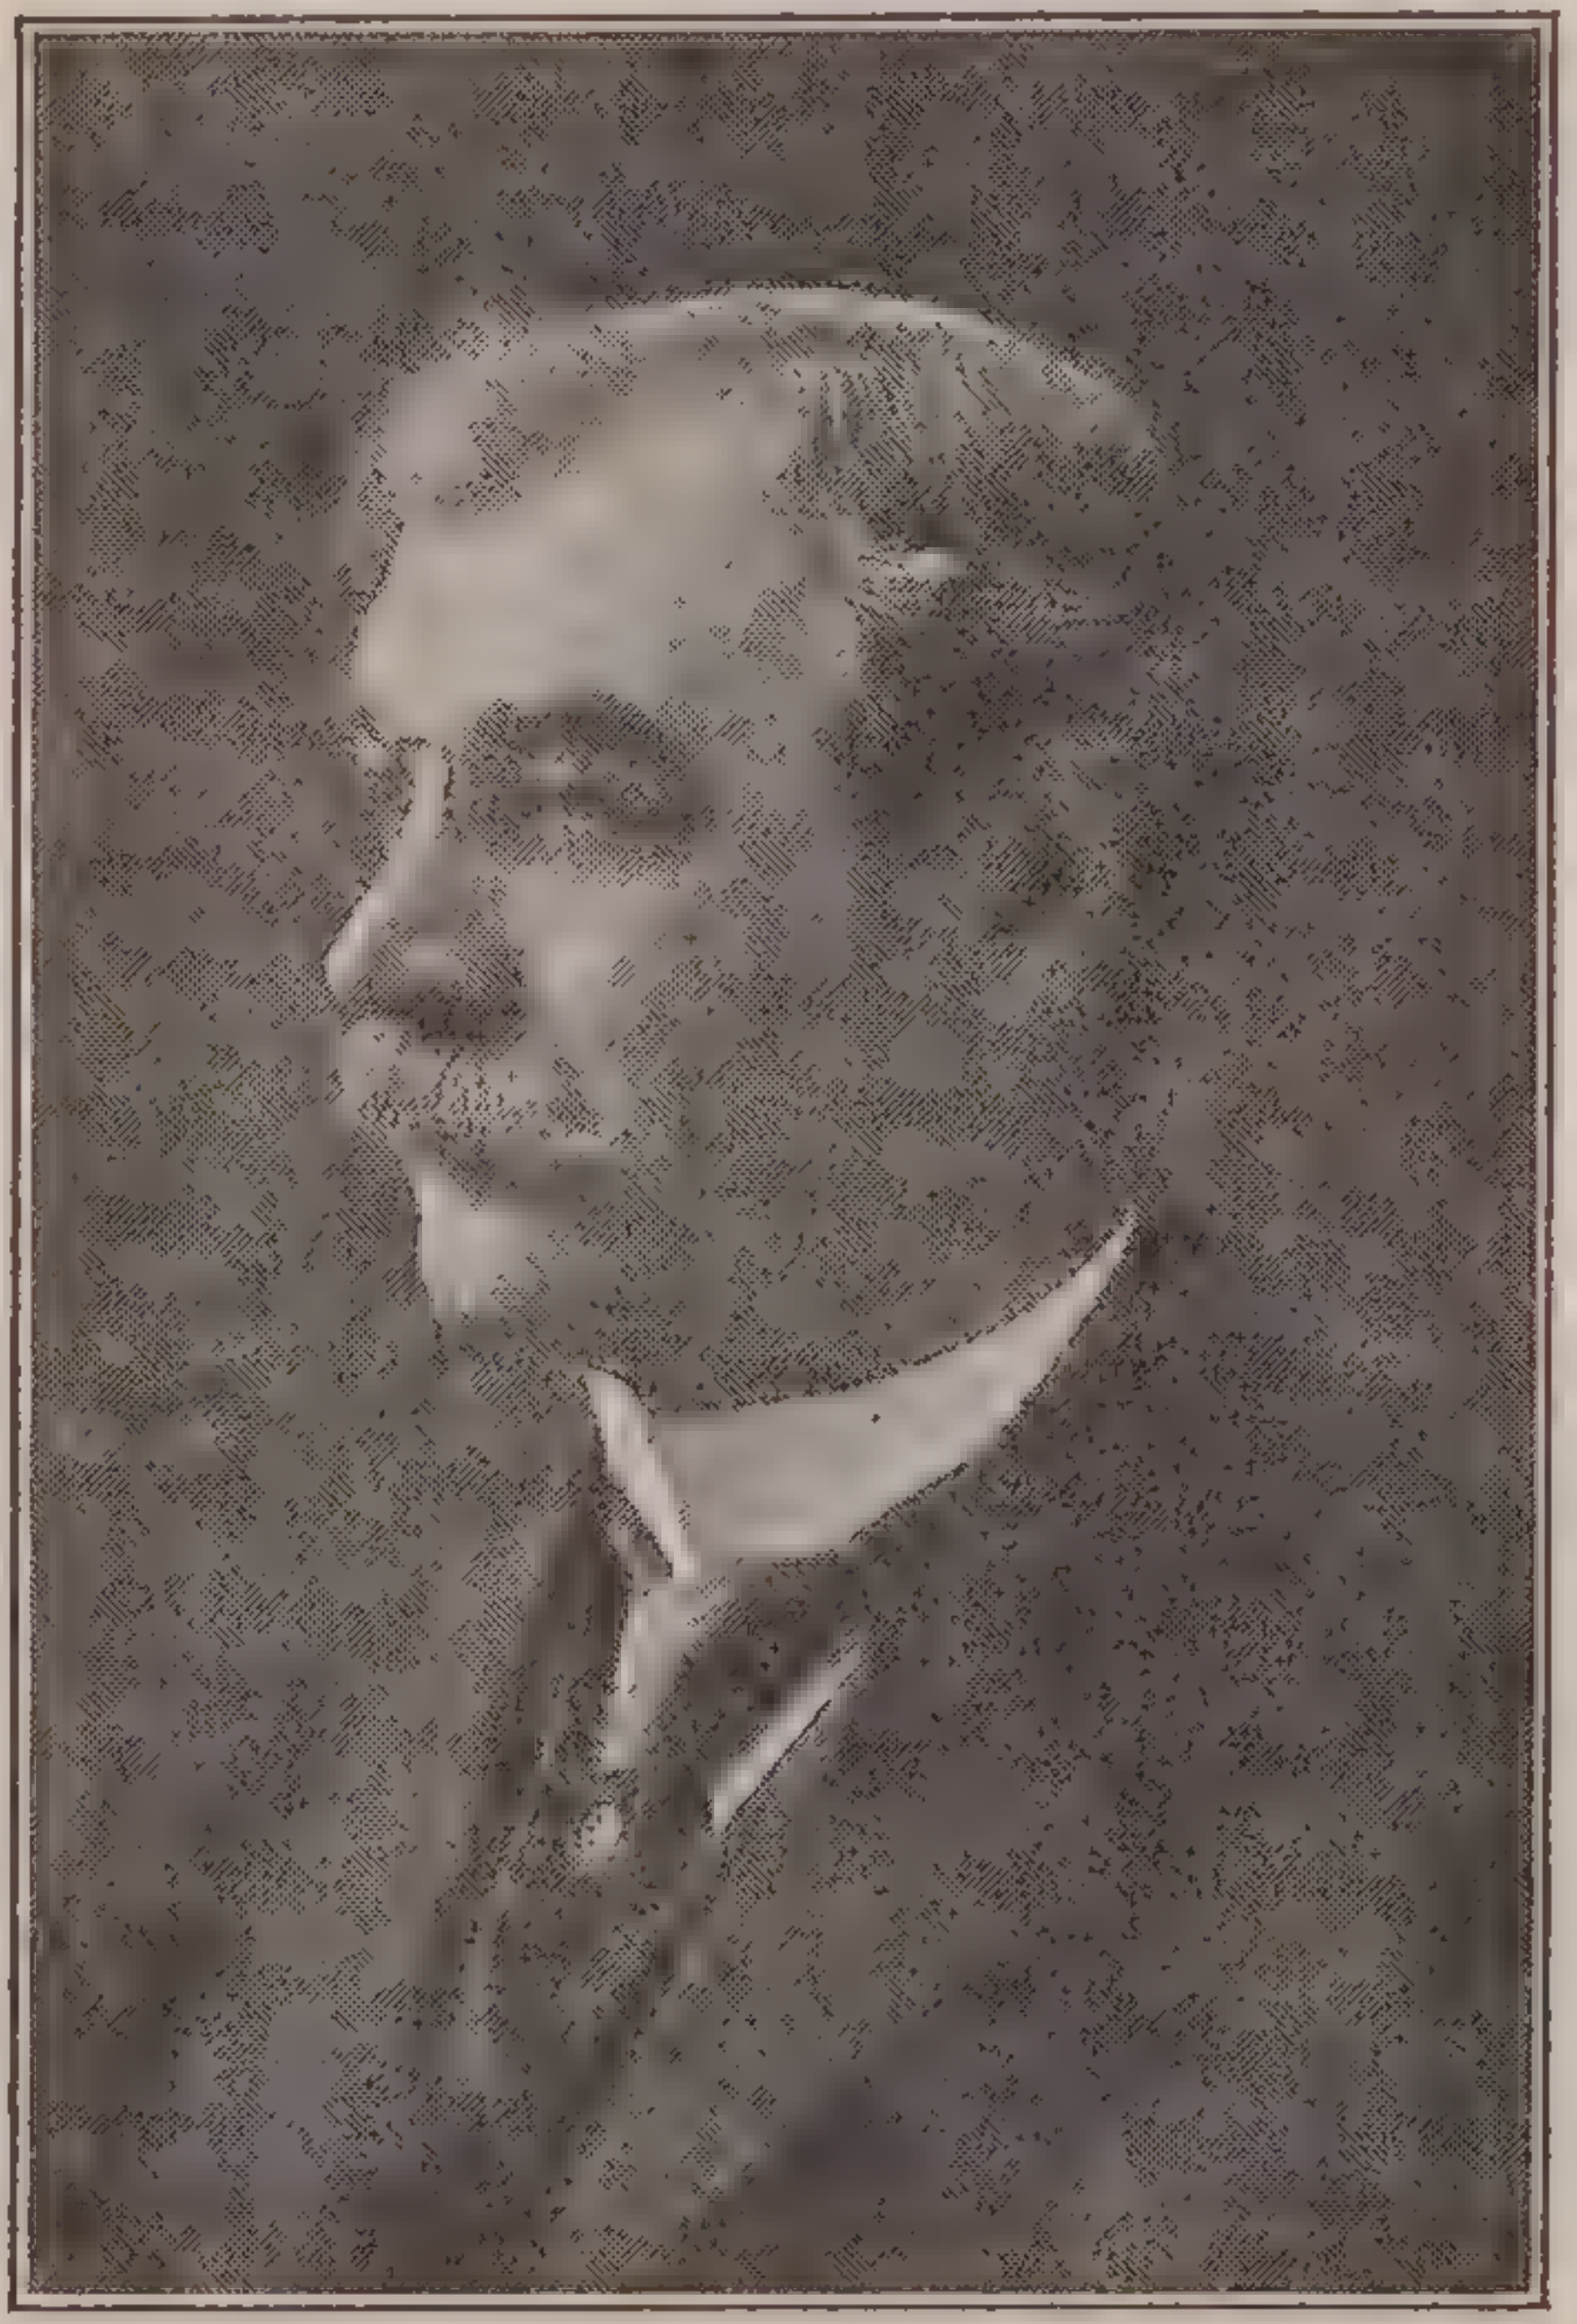
How We Are Affected by the Suspension of the Interchurch

By Rev. Cornelius H. Patton, D. D.

American Board of Foreign Missions

In view of the discontinuance of the Interchurch World Movement some of our Congregational people are asking if the Congregational World Movement has gone out of business. They are assuming that our denominational forward movement was so bound up in the Interchurch plans as to cease to function now that the federated movement is in trouble. One pastor writes that his people are thinking their subscriptions to the Emergency Fund of the Congregational World Movement, made last May, should be considered as canceled and the money collected returned to the donors. To all such inquiries we answer an emphatic NO.

The Congregational World Movement never was and is not now dependent upon the Interchurch for its plans and activities. It is a strictly denominational enterprise, having its own projects, its own treasurer, and looking to its own people for co-operation and help. The Interchurch was a syndicating of denominational forward movements for the purpose of making a common study of our task and of joining in common publicity. The studies are either completed, or in the way of being completed; but the joint publicity must be discontinued, unless some new agency takes it up. In no other respect are our plans affected. Unless the American Board, the Congregational Home Missionary Society, the American Missionary Association, our Congregational colleges and seminaries and our other missionary agencies go out of business during the next four years, the Congregational World Movement will continue to be one of the livest organizations on God's earth.



Rev. Cornelius H. Patton

A bit of history is in order. The National Council, at its meeting in 1919, inaugurated the Congregational World Movement as a continuance and development of the Tercentenary Commission, which had been authorized in 1915. The Tercentenary program had been so affected by war conditions as to call for revision and extension. We found ourselves living in a new world. The Tercentenary plans had been worked out by an able commission after prolonged debate and in the spirit of earnest waiting upon God. Five objectives were proposed: The inculcation of Pilgrim Principles, the adding of 500,000 new members to our churches, the recruiting of our ministry, the raising of the full annual apportionment of $2,000,000, and the securing of the $5,000,000 Pilgrim Memorial Fund for ministerial pensions.

Now that the Tercentenary period is nearing its end it is worth noting that of the above objectives three have been achieved, two have met partial success. In imparting to our churches the knowledge of Pilgrim history and ideals magnificent work has been done, and our people are educated today, as never before in matters pertaining to our glorious past. The apportionment for 1920, beyond peradventure, will be met, and for the first time our financial goal adopted in 1906 will be reached. The Pilgrim Memorial Fund has been a tremendous success, running considerably over $6,000,000. In evangelism and recruiting much good work has been done but we have fallen short of the large success we had hoped for.

The adoption of the five-year program has been justified beyond any question. Not the least valuable result has been the demonstration that, notwithstanding our independence, we can agree upon a goal and unite our forces to attain it. We have made noteworthy progress in fellowship the past five years.

The Success of Our Forward Movement

What then? At Grand Rapids the denomination discovered that just when the world was in chaos and making unprecedented demands upon the church, our missionary and educational agencies, through which we serve the world, were found to be in a perilous condition through lack of men and means. The very ongoings of our work at home and abroad were imperiled; several of our colleges in the United States were going on the rocks, and all were in distress.

This was the situation which led the National Council to substitute the Congregational World Movement for the Tercentenary Commission and to authorize an enlarged program, covering not only missionary finance but missionary education and every interest which we seek to promote by joint activity.

Coincident with this denominational situation there arose the Interchurch World Movement as a means of federating the forward movements of various denominations for mutual benefit. The federation was indorsed by the Council and we agreed to co-operate for one year as a try-out. The experiment was successful in a number of important respects, and its best ideals are bound to be conserved. It failed in other respects and the co-operative idea is in abeyance. To argue from this that Congregationalists must give up their well-laid plans for meeting their national and world obligations is unthinkable. On the contrary we shall go forward with more courage and wisdom because of the Interchurch experience.

In this connection it should be known that the Congregational underwritings of the Interchurch expenses have been paid, or are in the process of payment, the amount being $176,000. It is the opinion of those best qualified to know that the denomination has received from the Interchurch benefits far in excess of this amount; certainly without the united effort we would not have attempted to raise the Emergency Fund, which has been of such incalculable benefit to our work. Our underwritings were small compared with those of the other cooperating denominations.

Our Congregational World Movement has not been open to certain criticisms which have affected the Interchurch. We have never used the methods or the language of professional money raisers. We have not followed the lure of "big business." We did not seek a huge sum of money; we have not had an extravagant expense budget or a vast organization. The Committee of One Hundred, in charge of the Movement, is composed of pastors, laymen, college presidents and secretaries of large experience and balanced judgment. It has followed conservative judgments. Last spring, in view of the financial pressure upon our churches in connection with the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, they sought only for enough additional to conserve our work. The response of the churches all over the country was hearty and generous. The subscriptions are being paid, the societies and colleges are receiving monthly remittances, the day has been saved. The Congregational World Movement has already written a highly creditable chapter in our history. It offers the best possible opportunity for us to show that we are worthy descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers, whose deeds we have been celebrating of late.

Now for the great advance.

Boston, Mass.

Results of the Emergency Campaign

By Rev. James E. McConnell, D.D.

The financial outcome of last spring's Emergency campaign of the Congregational World Movement is fairly well understood—nearly $2,000,000 pledged for our missionary and educational work for the year of May 1, 1920 to May 1, 1921, with many churches which are expected to co-operate still unreported.

There are, however, some results of the campaign which are about as significant as is the amount of money which will be raised. The best way to indicate these results will be to refer to some concrete illustrations.

Dr. H. C. Herring attended the meeting of the Rhode Island Conference at Peace Dale last May. When he returned to New York this is what he said: "The boys in Rhode Island are exceedingly happy over the outcome for the World Movement in that state. It has demonstrated to them that they could really do a big thing when they went to work at it in the right way." Other state conferences as well as Rhode Island have had a new experience of denominational coherence and capacity as a result of the World Movement campaign.

I was permitted to be at the Missionary Education Conference, which was held in July at Ocean Park, Me. Nearly 50 representatives of Congregational churches were in attendance. Upon being asked as to the spiritual benefit accruing to the churches from participation in the World Movement campaign, practically all the delegates declared that the churches had felt an increased spiritual life and power as a consequence of such participation.

In the days immediately preceding and following the financial campaign of April 25-May 2, many communications, with checks, money orders or cash enclosed were received at our New York office, the letters reading substantially as follows: "Enclosed is ——— dollars. The ——— church has been dead for several years. But there are four or five of us here who desire to contribute to this good cause." These churches were evidently not as dead as they thought they were!

Rev. A. G. Axtell of Porto Rico wrote under date of May 14, 1920: "The Emergency Campaign was a good thing for our pastors and our people and it has been a revelation to us all."

A large and well-to-do church in a Western state made its first contribution, through the World Movement Fund, to our denominational benevolences. From this church we may expect regular and increasing gifts in the years to come. In many instances there has been an educational value in the campaign which, while it will assuredly increase our receipts for missionary purposes, nevertheless cannot be adequately measured in terms of dollars and cents.

A Colorado church was closed four years ago. A young working girl of sixteen urged that it be reopened, and she, with several associates, pledged a week's wages in addition to what they had already given. The church was really saved through the devotion of this young girl, who is now twenty years old and who subscribed fifty dollars to the Congregational World Movement.

The most impressive illustration of results in the instance of a large and influential church is supplied by the First Church of Montclair, N. J. Leadership, friendly rivalry, emphasis upon stewardship by the pastor, and support of the splendid ideal which was the heart of the Interchurch Movement, conspired to realize results for and through that church that have hardly been equaled, so far as reported, in any other church of our fellowship.

Expenses of the Congregational World Movement

By Lucien C. Warner

Chairman of the Commission of One Hundred

The task assigned to the Congregational World Movement last season was to secure an Emergency Fund from the Congregational churches of $3,000,000 in addition to their regular annual gifts of about $2,000,000. This task was made the more difficult because it immediately followed the canvass to raise $5,000,000 for the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, a canvass which resulted in a large over-subscription. Under these circumstances it was necessary to do much more than merely ask for an additional gift of $3,000,000. Facts had to be presented which would convince our 800,000 members that a real emergency existed and that this extra money was needed to meet the increased cost of conducting missionary operations and to save our present work from disaster.

The problem was even greater than this; it was an effort to lift the entire benevolence of our churches to a new level. The past contributions of our churches to the benevolent societies have been a little less than $3 per year per member, or six cents per week, and this was an effort to increase the amount to $7 per member, or 15 cents per week. It was a great undertaking worthy of the efforts of a great denomination. The time was ripe for such a movement, as nearly all the Protestant denominations of the country felt the same pressure upon them, and were engaged with us in this common enterprise.

The results of the effort have been eminently satisfactory. From present indications the receipts from the churches will be at least $2,000,000 and this has been given with a cheerfulness and enthusiasm which will mean much to the future of our denomination. The Interchurch World Movement rendered invaluable help in the surveys of the field and in much of its publicity work. Let us not forget this great service to the churches simply because it failed as a collecting agency for itself—a work which it should never have undertaken.

The National Council, in authorizing the Congregational World Movement, expressed the desire that their expenses should be kept within two per cent. of the amount asked for. This would allow $60,000 for the expenses of the Emergency Fund of $3,000,000 and this amount very nearly represents the expenses of the Movement up to the close of the canvass in May. In addition to this, there will be the pro rata share of the expenses of the Interchurch Movement ($176,000) which it was expected to meet from other sources, but even including this, the expenses are remarkably low considering the fact that in one year the Movement has doubled the aggregate benevolence of our churches. If, as we sincerely hope, this effort means that the annual contribution of our churches to our societies is hereafter to be $5,000,000, instead of barely $2,000,000, we shall look back upon the present year as the most important epoch in the history of our Congregational churches.

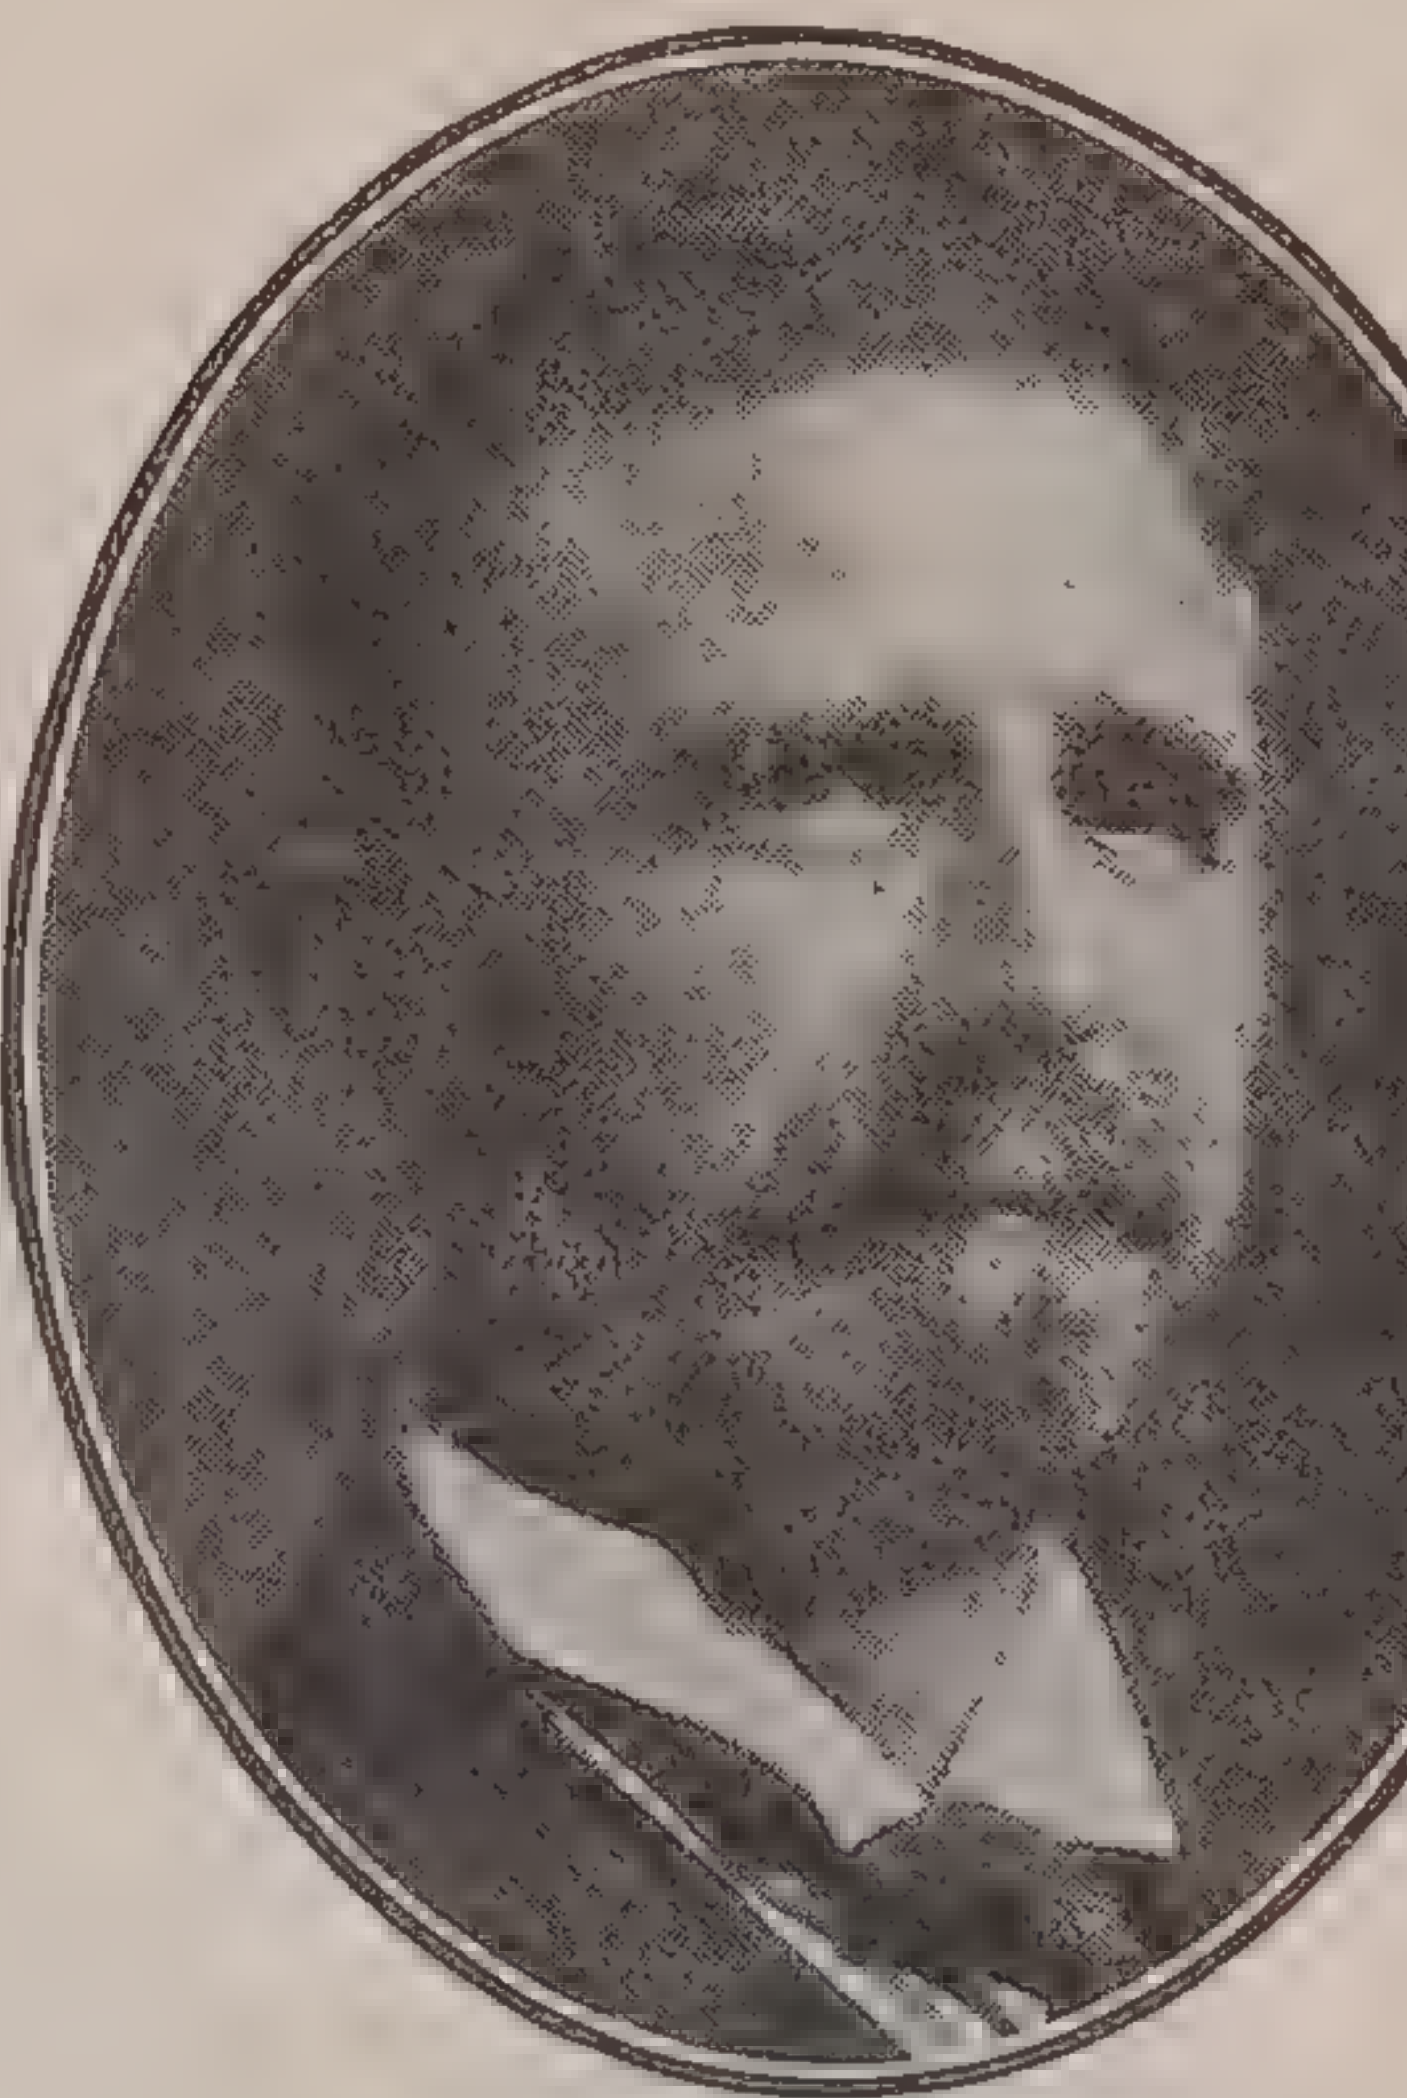
What Our Laymen Think About It

Religion the Need of the Hour

By Roger W. Babson

If one thing is becoming more and more evident to the business men of America, it is that religion holds the only solution to our political, commercial and industrial problems. Statistics teach that we have, during the past half century, been so keen about buildings, factories and railroads that we have forgotten from whence all these things came. We need to remember that American civilization owes its existence to the white-steepled churches of New England. These structures and the simple, praying people who filled them prepared the foundation upon which all the great industrial and commercial structures rest.

The need of the hour is more religion. Industry has got out of gear with religion. Our next great job, as captains of industry, is to have religion catch up with industry. Before adding more stories to our stores and factories, we should strengthen the religious foundation without which they would be unable to exist. Before adding more miles to our railroads and highways, we should be sure for what purpose they are to be used. Instead of seeking more land or more profit, we should seek to use rightly the property and power which we already have. Religion must catch up with industry and commerce. We cannot long burn the great social candle at both ends. We must once in a while charge the storage battery of life. The time has now come when we must get back upon the track.



Roger W. Babson

In view of this great need the business men of America should get behind the Congregational World Movement—and similar movements of other groups of churches—first; to extend missionary work, especially carrying to the churches such missionary intelligence as will create a greater interest in missions and education; and—second—to inaugurate a tithing system of giving which will provide the wherewithal by which the work may be carried on. I estimate that the income of our Congregational churchmen during the past year exceeded two billions of dollars ($2,000,000,000). Ten per cent. of this amount would be $200,000,000, or forty times the meager five millions ($5,000,000) which the Congregational churches are attempting to raise as their Pilgrim Tercentenary gift. The harvest truly is great; but we are too anxious to eat the entire crop. We need to save more of it for seed. A farmer who sells all his crops, or kills all his calves, or eats all his eggs is very short sighted. Yet this is what we business men are doing with the great sources of religion.

I think that we especially owe support to the Congregational churches as they blazed the trail for all the others. The Pilgrims who first landed at Plymouth and planted the seed of industry in America were Congregationalists. It was the integrity, thrift and homely virtues of these earnest New Englanders who gave America its start industrially and commercially. Furthermore the continued prosperity of every class and group depends upon encouraging that religion which today still teaches men to be honest, thrifty and industrious. America will not long survive if our political parties or social classes are content to fight over a redivision of what is already produced—even although a redivision may be needed. America's future demands that we all become imbued with the spirit of service and seek to do, instead of to get; seek to give, instead of to accumulate.

Woman's Part on the Foreign Field

By Mrs. C. H. Daniels

President of Woman's Board of Foreign Missions

By means of a widespread plant specifically designed for women and children in the fields of the American Board, the three Woman's Boards operate through 250 women evangelists, teachers doctors, nurses, social and industrial workers, assisted by a large corps of native helpers.

To bring this great ministering plant up to the high level of its possibilities in the face of new financial standards is the stimulating problem of the hour in Board counsels. As Providence would have it, at the very time when money grew hard opportunity grew easy. Larger numbers are applying for education, cities and villages offer their homes to the community visitor, governments become sympathetic and make larger grants if standards are kept at a high mark.

Acknowledgment should be gratefully made by these Boards for the loyal response of last spring, when the Congregational World Movement came forward with its Emergency budget. Gains in Branch gifts have repeatedly shown that Congregational women are sensitive to the strain under which their noble representatives toil and that a new sense of values is striking in to the very heart life. It remains for all pledges to the Congregational World Movement to be faithfully, promptly, fully redeemed and thus much of the pressure on the Boards will be lifted.

We need the Angela Morgans to ring in our ears the thrilling music inherent in this battlecry when applied to a campaign for Christless womanhood and childhood. Facing front, gathering funds and laying plans for the next momentous year, we can discover no path curving backward to the "day of small things."

Mrs. Charles H. Daniels

If a bonus to Japan missionaries for 1920 delivers them from debts incurred because they were obliged to eat, wear clothes and move about, a duty now faces us to forever prevent such humiliating disaster by giving respectable salaries and adequate support to carry the work in hand.

New Work? A pleasure in reserve for the future except for a wee bit by way of a Jubilee celebration. The sample is fascinating and rewarding but the new waits on the old until the measure fills.

The girls of mission lands have already made good by scores, as well-trained, inspiring leaders for their own people. But now the hundreds would hardly suffice to fill positions in mission and government schools, to curb and direct the awakening independence of their students, to bring in the New Order through home and community life.

Vellore Medical and Madras Colleges in India, Peking in China, union enterprises in which Congregational women share, are graduating creditable numbers to supply the demands, and colleges, boarding and normal schools work to this end, all limited, however, in their productiveness because they are limited in room, equipment and support.

Kobe College, Japan, a well-known example of our highest grade work is in a "time of crisis" because of all three limitations.

Fifty-six girls in the Dindigul, India, boarding school set up their dining room out of doors or, if it rains, on a small, narrow veranda.

Smyrna Collegiate Institute patiently holds its fair site overlooking the bay until buildings are provided into which its 300 and more girls can move from crowded quarters in the heart of the city.

Leaders to train leaders—a magnificent challenge to the girl who wants to "do things worth while."

Where needed exactly? Everywhere. In well-equipped hospitals such as Madura and Ahmedneggar, India, or Lintsing, China, to doctor, to operate, to nurse; in Barcelona, Spain, among attractive, intellectually keen girls; in wide-awake China to set the Christian stamp on education; in groping Africa where kraal barriers are down; yes, even in the far-off island world two sisters or friends to pick up the torch as it falls on Kusaie. Clear vision—large ideals—determined purpose—then Victory!

Woman's Part in the Congregational World Movement

By Mrs. Williston Walker

President of Congregational Woman's Home Missionary Federation

What part the women are to take in the plans of the Congregational World Movement is the question which is being asked by state and church organizations all over the country. How will the work which has been carried on heretofore be affected and how far can machinery which has been for years developing be used to advantage in this new effort? Our answer to this question is to insist that the women are to do the work they have always done, only more of it, and in close co-operation with the plans which will take in the whole church. In other words, the World Movement is simply extending to the whole church the kind of work which the women's organizations have all along been steadily pushing. We rejoice that a larger vision has come to our people and that we are now to have the entire church co-operating with us in the education of its members, men and women alike, that they may comprehend the greatness of the task and realize the responsibility of every Christian to work for a Christian world.

The first thing that the women of the churches should do is to examine the efficiency of their organization and be relentless in their criticism. It is hard for us to be honest with ourselves. Annual reports always sing the praises of our accomplishments when often it would be wiser to show how little we had done and how pitiful had been our response to the call to promote Christianity. As one visits our churches, big and little, one cannot help being discouraged with the really small results of years of missionary effort. There are so many strong women frankly unwilling to be touched by the Christian appeal, so many young women and girls who feel that there would be something queer in their make-up if they should pause to consider anything so "serious and depressing."

The challenge that the Congregational World Movement makes to the women of our churches is that they shall strengthen their efficiency along every line. We are to take hold of the same old tasks but with a new impulse. We are to co-operate in the educational program and put it over in the church so that no man or woman or child escapes. We are to bring to every woman in every church such an understanding of the task before Christian people that she will feel a compelling obligation to assume her share of responsibility. We are to get back of pastors and business committees and encourage the Every Member Canvass. We are to develop plans for kindling the interest of young people. We are to see to it that our societies are well organized, not with leaders who "sit on their jobs" but with good live women, who can and must be found, to put new energy into women's societies, making them a power in the whole church for promoting an understanding of missions and creating an enthusiasm and passion for bringing the spirit of Christ into this strangely selfish world. And above all we must give to great causes as we have never given before, measuring our needs against the cry of the world for help, our pleasures against the call for human betterment.

What Presbyterians Are Doing

The New Era Movement

By Rev. Robert E. Speer, D. D.

Secretary Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions

Rev. Robert E. Speer

The Forward Movement in the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America is known as the New Era Movement. It was somewhat reorganized by the General Assembly at its meeting in Philadelphia in May, 1920. It is administered by a committee made up of twelve representatives from the mission boards and agencies of the Church and twelve ministers and laymen chosen by the General Assembly from the Church at large. The last report of the Movement states that its objects are:

1. To develop family religion in the home, including Bible instruction for the children, and to promote the family altar.
2. To increase the amount of catechetical instruction given in the Sunday school.
3. To aid the pastors in the development of a larger number of communicant classes.
4. To teach groups of members in the churches how to use the Bible in personal evangelistic service, and to organize and assign them for service.
5. To urge concerted action on the part of all the churches in an intensive effort for a great ingathering at Easter as supplemental to the evangelistic work of the year.

It has departments of Social Service, Missionary Education, Stewardship and Publicity. Last year it laid before the churches a combined budget covering missionary and educational work of the Church amounting to approximately thirteen million dollars. Of this amount the New Era Movement reported to the General Assembly that the churches had given approximately eight millions. This year the total budget for which the New Era Movement is asking in behalf of all the missionary and educational activity of the Church through its boards and agencies is twenty-three million dollars, of which about thirty per cent. is for foreign missions, twenty-two per cent. for home missions, fourteen per cent. for education and the rest distributed over the other activities of the Church. The last report of the Presbyterian General Assembly states that the total gifts of the churches for all causes, including miscellaneous gifts and their own self-support, was $43,071,072, for the year 1920, as compared with $32,804,708 for the year 1919. What the New Era Movement is asking, accordingly, for the benevolences of the Church, is very little more than one-half of the total of the actual gift of the Church during this year. There can be no question of the abundant ability of the Presbyterian churches to provide the full amount needed.

A Pastor's Commendation

By Rev. Ernest Bourner Allen

My first word shall be one of frank commendation. When I think of the number of "drives" and special calls during the war period, the readjustments necessary in the face of continually rising costs of living, and the generous response made in the main by a great body of loyal givers in our churches, then I am the more proud of their acceptance of new and enlarged responsibilities. Upon this group I confidently "bank," certain that they will face the present need and obligation before our churches with the same courage and consecration as before. What these facts are the Congregational World Movement, through its surveys and the pastor, must adequately and frankly present.

The need for the present call is its primary indorsement. The "Macedonian Cry" was simply this: "Come over and help us!" When Jesus hung on the cross he looked down upon his mother and recalled her sorrow and homelessness. With perfect confidence he appealed to John, for John loved him, and he said: "Son, behold thy mother!" And the record tersely says, "from that hour the disciple took her unto his own home." Our national church missionary organizations are fulfilling a similar call and confidence of the Christ. We know that they act as our agents in ministering. We know how they would have failed in the critical year just behind us if it had not been for the Emergency Fund of our World Movement. Now here are the facts for our action in the next ministry in giving. Schools, hospitals, evangelistic endeavor, colleges, must all retrench, or go out of business, unless our Lord's sons and daughters take them into their own house, actually sharing their substance with them and so with the Christ!

Dr. Jowett said recently that the work of beneficence is "clamorously needful," and for three reasons: (1) because "we are apt to be gravely deceived about the extent of our beneficence and we vastly exaggerate the amount of money we give away. (2) There is a strangely paralyzing power about money, and it so restricts the heart that the more we get the less we are inclined to give. (3) Conscience in the matter of giving is apt to become less sensitive as the appeals come from the necessities of the soul." While American Christians may profitably consider all three of these reasons, the latter deserves special attention. Why should Christians give generously in response to a cry of material hunger and be numb to the cry of spiritual hunger? We neglect either at our peril. The churches must not forget the woe-cries of the human soul. More than one church has been revived by the summons to heroic giving for the purpose of meeting a great need.

Rev. Ernest Bourner Allen

While discussion of the exact time for making our canvass is proper, and in some localities more vital than others, let us not forget the major need. At some time the thing must be done, the money must be raised. Whether in December or April, let us plan to do our part. We dare not disappoint and discourage the workers who are looking to our churches for maintenance and backing. We dare not draw back in face of urgent needs which are our Lord's call to us to help. We dare not fail without trying. Let us put all the facts before every member, and trust the Christian conscience to meet the need.

Pilgrim Church,

The Congregational World Movement and Evangelism

By Rev. Frederick L. Fagley, D. D.

Executive Secretary National Commission on Evangelism

To the National Council's Commission on Evangelism has been committed the task of coordinating the various features of the work of the churches that have to do with recruiting new members and of constructing and promoting a program of parish evangelism which will assist the churches in this field of endeavor.

This work goes hand-in-hand with that committed to the World Movement in promoting Missionary Education, Stewardship and Giving. In fact all these features of the work of the Church must in the very nature of the case be correlated in the local church and all the way throughout our denominational life.

The Program of Evangelism has been built up with this thought in mind, that everything should be done to undergird the whole work of the church with effective prayer and to deepen the springs of spiritual life that we all may become more effective in service which is love in action.

There are many ways in which the evangelistic program knits into the general denominational program. The fall canvass for new people is of the greatest value to all features of church work as well as essential to the evangelistic program. The financial canvass opens the way for the evangelistic canvass for dedication of life.

The program of parish evangelism depends for its success upon the loyal co-operation of pastor and people in presenting the gospel appeal to every one in the community for which that church is spiritually responsible. The plan contemplates an ingathering in the fall following a church rally and a thoroughgoing visitation of the parish by the pastor and his helpers and an ingathering at or near Easter following a Lenten period given to the task of presenting Christ through pastors' training classes, the development of the prayer life through the use of the "Fellowship of Prayer," and the extension of the habit of personal work all contributing to the effectiveness of a series of meetings held by the pastor in the church during Holy Week when decisions are reached and new members are welcomed into the fellowship of the church.

A C. W. M. Catechism

1. What relation, if any, has the Congregational World Movement today to the Interchurch Movement?

None at the present time. The Congregational World Movement is devoting its entire attention to promoting Congregational causes.

2. Who are the men most responsible for the C. W. M. and what respective offices do they hold?

The chairman of the Commission of One Hundred is Dr. Lucien Warner of New York. The Executive Committee Chairman is William Knowles Cooper of Washington, D. C., Dr. Herman F. Swartz is Executive Secretary; Rev. James E. McConnell, D. D., Assistant Secretary; Rev. John Luther Kilbon is Financial Secretary; Walter E. Bell, Treasurer.

3. What official indorsement has the C. W. M. from the Congregational churches of the United States?

The mandate of the National Council at Grand Rapids in October, 1919.

4. What is the total of the financial objectives for 1921?

Five million dollars.

5. Why is so much money sought?

Because the cost of living has doubled and after-war reconstruction and new needs and opportunities require it or work for which Congregationalists are responsible must be abandoned.

6. How is the five million dollars to be divided?

On a percentage basis readapted from the Apportionment Plan so as to include needed help for educational institutions, ministerial insurance and several important miscellaneous items, in addition to our national missionary societies. The amounts appropriated in the $5,000,000 budget follow:

American Board	37½%	$1,875,000
Home Missionary Society	19 %	950,000
Church Building Society	8½%	425,000
Sunday School Extension Society	2 %	100,000
American Missionary Association	12½%	625,000
Education Society	4 %	200,000
Educational Institutions	11½%	575,000
Board of Ministerial Relief	2 %	100,000
Annuity Fund	2 %	100,000
Miscellaneous	1 %	50,000
	100 %	$5,000,000

7. When are the churches expected to make their pledges?

Whenever they please. The Commission of One Hundred has recommended about May first next spring, but many churches prefer to continue to have their Every Member Canvass the first Sunday in December and will make their Congregational World Movement pledges then.

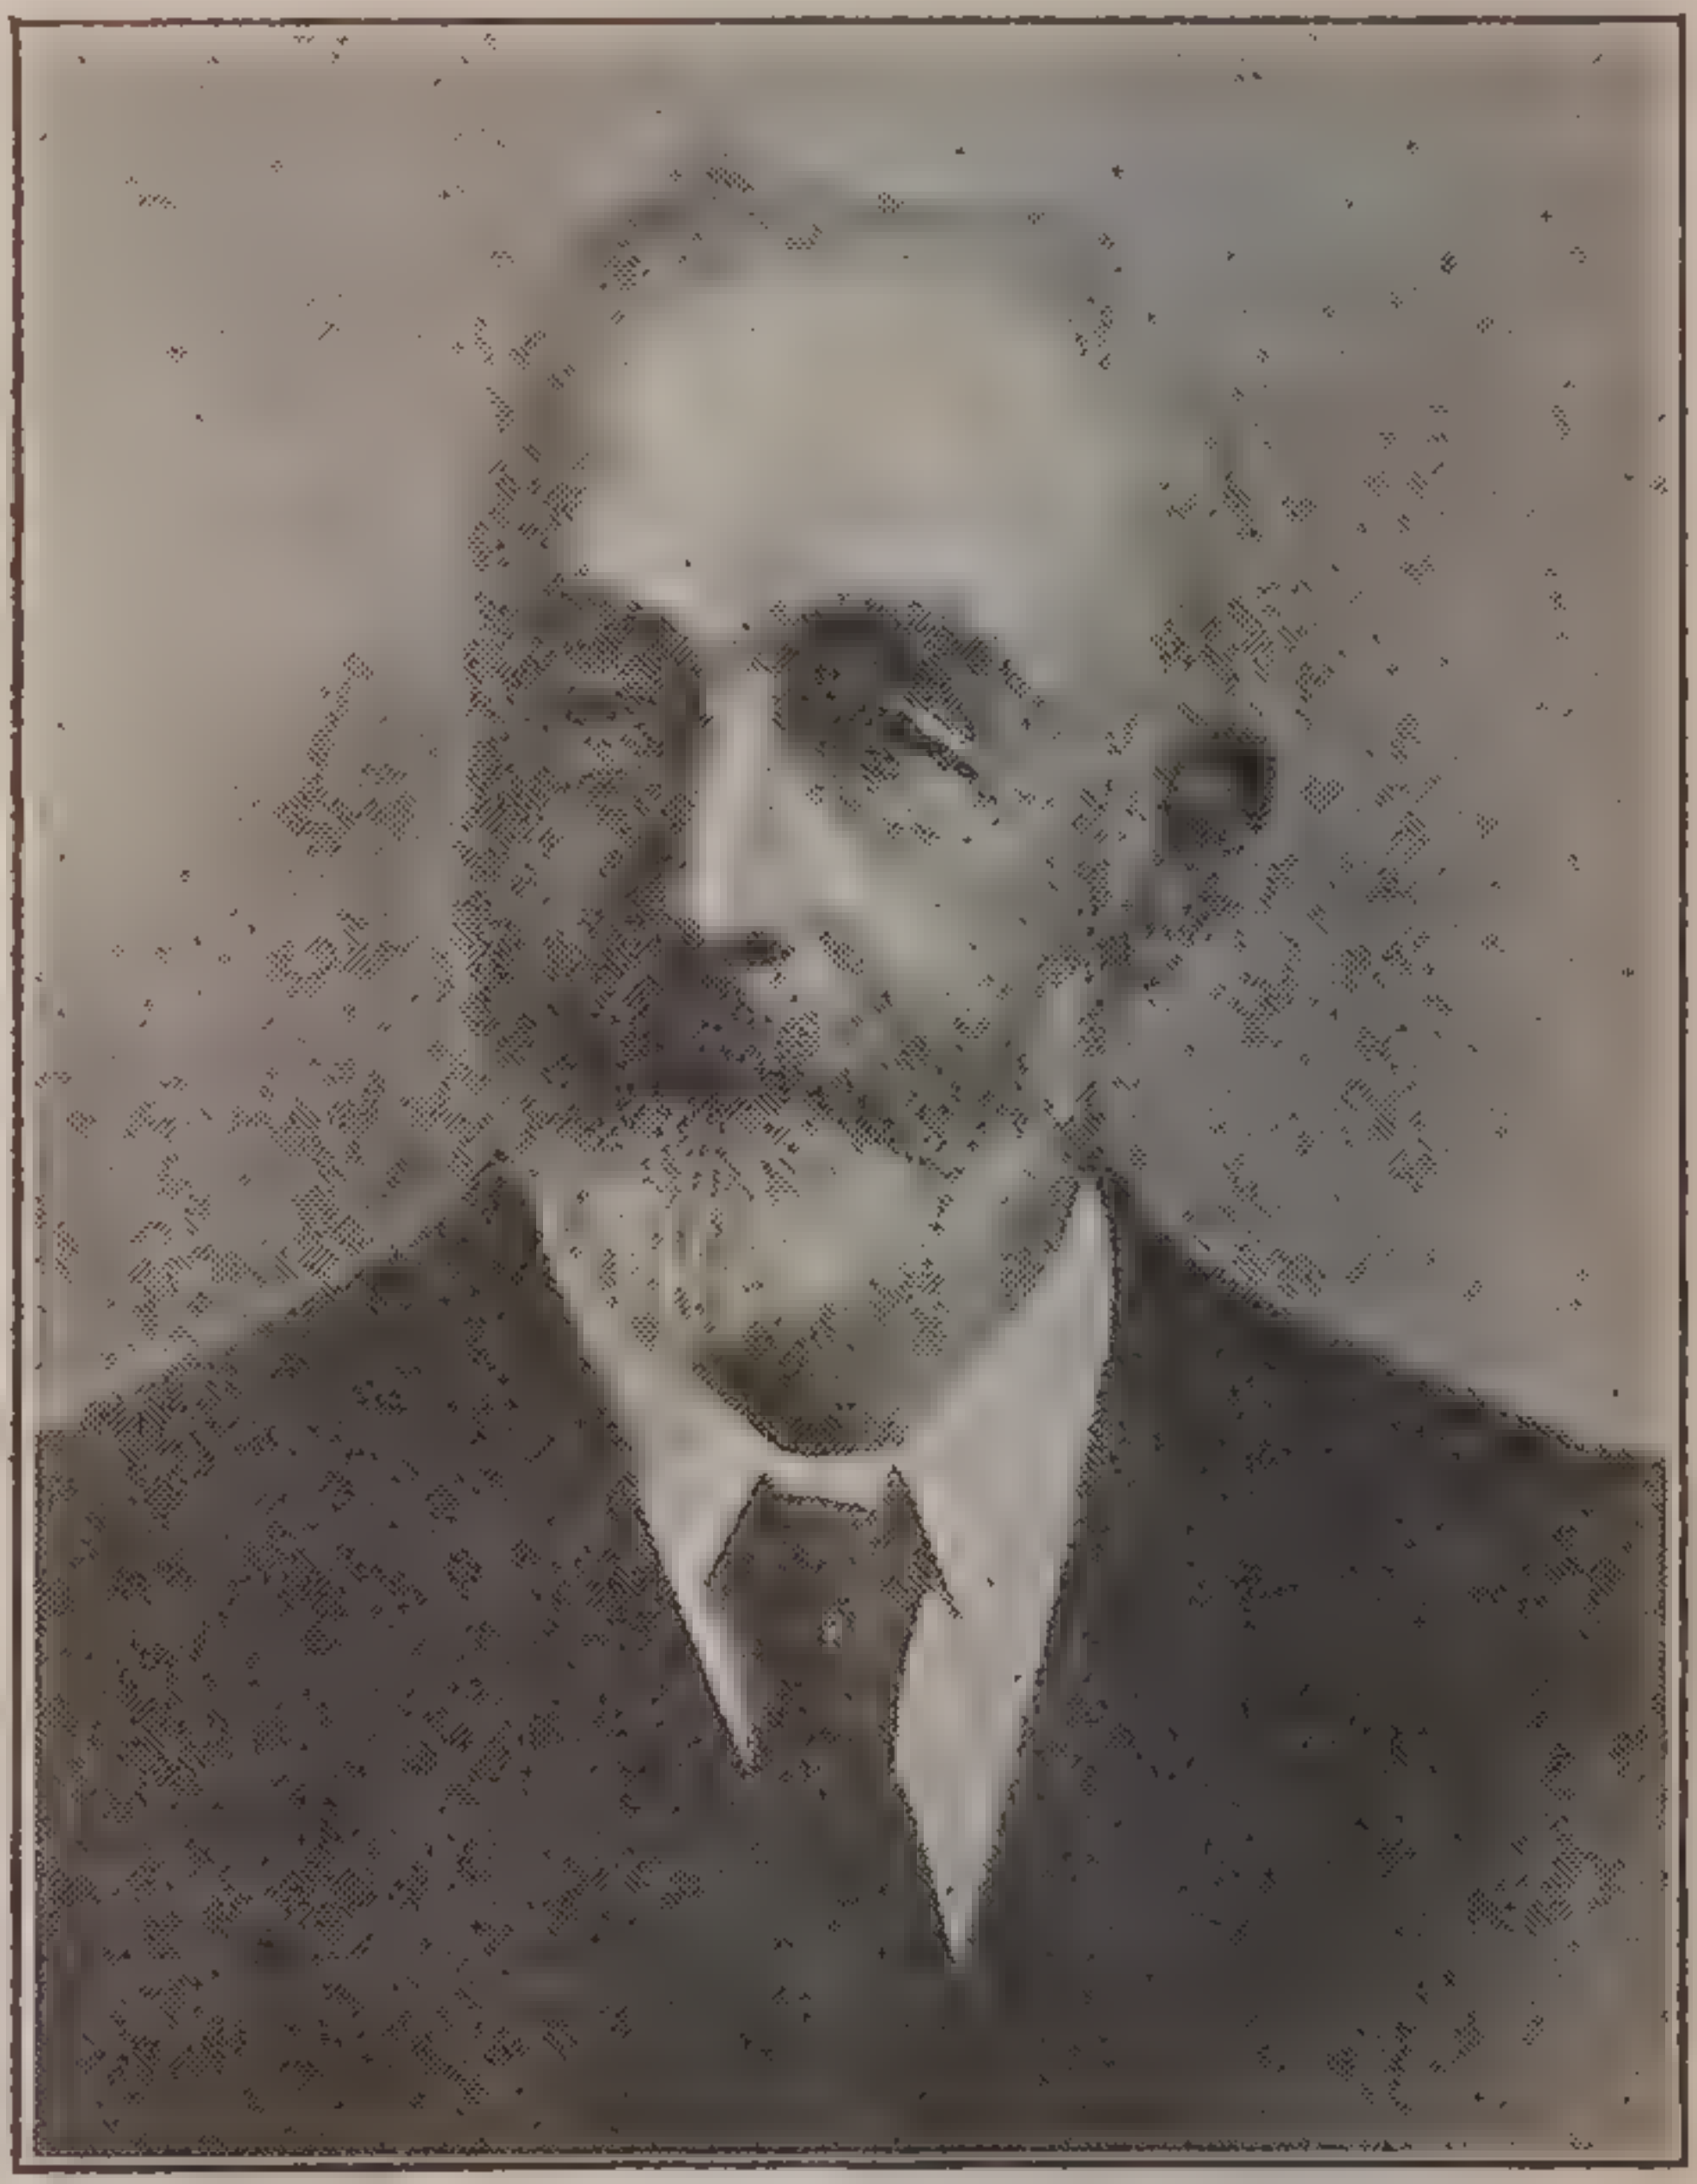
8. Is there any co-operation between the C. W. M. and similar movements in other denominations?

No special plan of co-operation this year, but the work promoted by the Movement will involve interdenominational co-operation.

Rev. T. Rhondda Williams at Newton, Mass.

Eliot Church in Newton, Mass., is a large church; but it was filled, with scarcely a seat to spare, on Sunday morning, Sept. 25, when Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, pastor of the Union Congregational Church at Brighton, England, was the preacher. It was a great congregation assembled to hear a great speaker. Known in England not only as an eloquent and fearless preacher and the author of many scholarly theological books, but also as a reformer in the forefront of every movement toward the bettering of social conditions, Mr. Williams is qualified to speak with authority. He is a man who has learned the secret of "keeping his windows open to heaven," the while he stands with his feet firm on the solid ground of everyday reality.

His sermon was one of rare dignity and beauty, marked with a robust idealism which suggested Browning even before the climax of his thought led him to quote at length from Abt Vogler, and delivered with the ease of one to whom the English language is a finely tempered, flexible instrument for the expression of thought.



Rev. Rhondda Williams

"I will give unto thee the land of thy sojournings for an everlasting possession," (Gen. 17:8). This was his text; but he did not treat it in its surface meaning, as an instance of the too prevalent disposition of nations to justify past wars of aggression and oppression by claiming the sanction of a divine command for their plunder and bloodshed. Instead he lifted the words into the realm of allegory. Living in a world of injustice and strife and meanness, a world where poverty and wealth stand constantly in ugly contrast, we are all privileged, at times, to glimpse another country where truth and beauty and goodness are the supreme values, where Christianity, the organization of life by love, becomes, not the religion of the byway alone, but the great governing principle of the highway. It is an experience involving suffering and heartache, this sojourning in Canaan while one is living in bondage in Egypt; but in man's ability to do this and to feel the full bitterness of the contrast lies the hope of the world. For a man's aims and aspirations, his goals, determine the man far more than his actual achievements; the "land of our sojournings" is after all our homeland, so long as we can keep Canaan in our hearts.

"All we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist;
Not its semblance, but itself; no beauty, nor good, nor power
Whose voice has gone forth, but each survives for the melodist
When eternity affirms the conception of an hour."

The Second International Versus
The Third International

By Arthur E. Holt, Ph. D.
Social Service Secretary

John Graham Brooks, in a recent and valuable book entitled "Labor's Challenge to the Social Order," makes the statement that democracy develops out of itself its own criticism. No better illustration of this can be found than the self-criticism which the Socialists and Communists offer upon each other.

The most recent illustration of this kind is the criticism of Lenin's program for Russia which has been formulated by the Socialists in their recent convention at Geneva, Switzerland. This meeting is reported in a recent number of The New Republic by Sidney Webb.

The Socialists' delegates present were largely the representatives of the Socialist groups in Great Britain, Germany, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark and Holland. A large number of the Socialists of Norway, Spain, and Italy have either withdrawn or are contemplating withdrawal from the Second International and affiliated themselves with Lenin's movement.

It was consequently incumbent on the convention at Geneva, if it was to hold the allegiance of the majority social group in Europe, to define how and why it differed from Lenin's communistic program.

It is at this point that the action becomes very interesting to all of us.

They define their divergence from Russian communism at the following points:

The Socialists of England and these other countries do not propose to do away with the parliamentary system of government built up upon geographical representation. They are willing to grant a place to occupational and vocational representation but this must function through some kind of parliamentary system. This is interesting, because it is practically what is working out in America in the coming to vigorous expression of the different non-partisan political leagues representing the churches, the chambers of commerce, and various farmer and labor groups, which, however, continue to make their demands of the old political parties and do not try to set up independent parties of their own.

In the next place, the Socialists of the Second International are for the gradual socialization of certain great industries. They deplore the confiscating of the property of the present owners, without remuneration. They have in mind the application of a plan something like the Plumb plan, for other industries besides the railroads. They are only suggesting that a few of the great industries be brought under this plan, scarcely a dozen in all.

In the third place, they give a very generous interpretation to the word "laborers." Henceforth, the working class is to officially include all workers, by hand or by brain. The narrow interpretation given by Lenin is not to obtain in this group of Socialists. This definition ought to make the Socialists more popular.

In all this, there is a very definite recognition that any movement toward industrial democracy, which is to win the support of the more highly developed democratic nations, must conserve much of the old individualism which Lenin has been willing to sacrifice.

Russians have a fondness for the community bath-tub; Englishmen have not. This fact has proved symbolical of future developments in economics.

Leaves Woman's Home Missionary Association

Mrs. Badger Succeeds Miss Noyes

Thirteen years ago a teacher left her schoolroom where she had spent happy years, and came, as she says, "with many a fear and many a doubt," to become Secretary of the Woman's Home Missionary Association. Miss Noyes' desire was to do her best in Christian service and how truly she has worked out that desire many can testify, for she has been in touch with a very large number of people.

The woman who came seeking work or advice for her own auxiliary never went away empty-handed but took with her a clear call to work for some particular minister and family on the Home Missionary field—or perhaps receive a vision of service and sacrifice made here in her homeland which sent her away thoughtful.

Miss Noyes has been sympathetic and helpful. Her alertness of mind and clearness of judgment have made her opinions most valuable, and her faithfulness in her work will long be in our minds. As editor of Work at Home, she has given the finest literary service.

Miss Noyes' successor is Mrs. Mabel S. Badger of Quincy, who comes to the Association with varied experience in war activities, women's clubs and church work.

His Plan

By Lillian Dolbeare Leach

It quivers from the poplars;
It calls from every tree—
"The God, who sends our buds each year, Shall make his children free."

It lingers on the daisy;
It mounts high with the bird—
"The God, who is Creator,
Our every cry has heard."

Why our anxious fretting?
Why our troubled days?
In love, he waits our coming
To his eternal ways.

OUR PILGRIM PULPIT
Nature a Sacrament

By John Andrew Holmes, D. D.

The heavens declare the glory of God.—Ps. 19.

Poets in all ages have discerned a soul in nature. Byron reports "interviews" with "the pathless woods" and "the lonely shore." Bryant, "seeking communion with earth's visible forms," hears "a various language."

It was not so with my old neighbor, Ed Butler. Ed had made a trip to Colorado, and had ascended Pike's Peak. Upon his return to our untraveled community, he was much besought to tell of his adventures. Especially was he besought by a certain young lady, whose being thrilled at the very name of the Peak.

"Oh, Mr. Butler," she exclaimed, "you have actually stood upon Pike's Peak! I have seen wonderful pictures of the sunrise from where you stood. In those pictures, the whole sky seemed aflame. Tell me, Mr. Butler, of your emotions that day. How did you feel when you stood on Pike's Peak?"

To all of which Ed replied in the utter simplicity of an unspoiled soul, "I felt all right. About as usual."

If you and I have been like Ed this summer, hearing nothing, seeing nothing, feeling nothing of what nature may have had to communicate, we cannot therefore dismiss the testimony of the nature poets as wholly the product of hallucination. No doubt certain great souls have learned strange things of God through the medium of earth and sky.

Yet the writings of nature are cut in hierogliphics. Even so great an interpreter as Alfred Tennyson, affirming that if he could understand the flower in the cranny he would know both God and man, did not put forth the claim that he knew that flower.

For most of us it is far from true that "one impulse from a vernal wood can teach us more than all the sages can." When a man tells me that he can learn more of God beside a brook on Sunday morning than the minister can teach him from the pulpit, and I find that his name is neither Wordsworth nor Coleridge, I break it gently to him that I am not impressed. You and I bring back more of religious verity from one hour spent with the truths of Scripture than from a whole vacation spent among the myriad voices of God in nature.

For the great majority of people, the most that nature does is give a review lesson on religious truths that have first been taught by others. I look upon nature as not so much a revelation as a sacrament.

If the elements of the Lord's Supper speak to us, so that no sooner do we look upon them than many of us are impressed beyond the power of words, it is because they have become freighted with precious meaning through the many addresses that have been spoken over them through the years. Likewise is it for most of us with what I call the sacrament of nature.

If the mountains show forth God's majesty, the sea his awfulness and infinity, the plains his boundless bounty, and "the heavens declare the glory of God," it is not so often by first revelation as by deepening impression.

Those who spend much of their time in hearing from prophets what God has taught them are able to find in the earth and sky the very body of all such teachings. It is they who are given to see the mountain "rising like a cloud of incense to the sky," they who can get "from the meanest flower that blows thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears." For them all nature may become a great high priestess, offering their prayer and administering holy communion.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Work and Wealth

What is the Christian View of Work and Wealth? (Association Press). From all over the United States, letters have come asking for a course of studies which might be used in discussion group classes in the modern Sunday school. Anticipating such a need, the social service secretaries of the various Protestant denominations in the United States and Canada met last spring and outlined a course of studies on the general theme, "What is the Christian View of Work and Wealth?" They had also the co-operation of a committee from the International Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations. As a result of the co-operative work of a committee appointed by this board of secretaries, there has just come from the press a course of studies designed for use in adult Bible classes.

The practical nature of these studies is revealed in the table of contents which tells the topics of the course of eleven lessons.

I. What Can a Family Do about the High Cost of Living?
II. Who Should Support the Family?
III. Who Should be Excused from Work?
IV. What is a Fair Return for a Fair Day's Work?
V. What is the Right Attitude toward Property and Income?
VI. What Should the Parties to Industry Do to Secure Their Rights?
VII. For Whom Should Industry be Run?
VIII. What Share Should Labor Have in the Management of Industry?
IX. What is the Christian Motive for Industry?
X. What Changes are Demanded by a Christian View of Work and Wealth?
XI. Suggested Devotional Material.

This book can soon be obtained from the Pilgrim Press and ought to serve the purpose of many discussion group classes just now organizing. Each lesson starts off with a list of very interesting questions. These questions are followed by judicious quotations from men and women representing every point of view on these subjects; and the class is encouraged, on the basis of these questions and quotations, to form its own judgment which is a very wholesome procedure at this time.

A. E. Holt.

On Religious Themes

The Hope of Man, by William Holden Hutton, D. D. (Macmillan). These studies in the literature of Religion and reconstruction were preached before the University of Oxford in 1917—1919. They are historical and theological in method, deeply rooted in the past and yet with an open outlook on the future and use the literature of the Christian ages freely. The point of view is that of the Anglican thought of Catholicity. Their outlook on the problems of today may be indicated by two quotations: "We see farther than Augustine saw. We see that the Church was not meant by her Founder to remain outside, and hostile to, society, but to permeate it, and, it even may be, in the end to absorb it." And again: "That peace will not be won by Socialism or by organized Labor, or by organized Capital, or even by reorganized Education. It can only be won by a body of which every individual member is pledged to give every power he possesses to the service of man in Christ, because we have one Father, even God."

The Cross, by Donald Hankey (Dutton). An essay of rare insight and inspiration.

Is Violence the Way Out? by John Haynes Holmes (Dodd, Mead). A strong argument for good will in industry, carrying the author's doctrine of non-resistance to political action with a view to achieving the goal of socialism.

Some Aspects of International Christianity, by John Kelman (Abingdon Press). Six lectures delivered in De Pauw University. They affirm convincingly that the Christian religion is the only solution of the great problems of the day. Strong arguments are presented in support of the League of Nations, and the author reveals inspiringly his international mind. It will be recalled that Dr. Kelman has but recently come from Scotland to the pastorate of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York, as the successor of Dr. Jowett.

Reconstructing the Church, by William Allen Harper (Revell). Discusses the problems of the times from the standpoint of a church layman and indicates the duty of the church today.

The Meaning of the War for Religious Education, by Robert Wells Veach (Revell). The training of youth is the real preparedness. The school teacher has been and is par excellence the drill master of the nation. The author lays down the new religious emphasis given to our young men by the war.

Biography and History

The Art of Biography, by William Roscoe Thayer (Scribners). A choice little volume containing three lectures written by one who is himself a master of the art which he describes. Biography in Antiquity, From Mediæval to Modern Biography, Biography in the Nineteenth Century, are the titles, indicating the historical arrangement of the material. The story of Joseph, Plutarch's Lives, Joinville's Charlemagne, Cavendish's Life of Cardinal Wolsey, Boswell's Johnson, Morley's Voltaire, Froude's Carlyle, Carlyle's Frederick the Great, Trevelyan's Macaulay, etc. are a few of the long list of leading works described. The volume is delightful reading and we warmly commend it to our readers.

The Reign of Patti, by Herman Klein (Century). The author, a musical critic, knew Adelina Patti all her life and from her family obtained letters, photographs and other biographical material used in this fascinating and authoritative volume. He describes her remarkable career from the time she was a girl in New York to the end in 1919. All lovers of music and especially those who remember the famous prima donna will read the volume with intense interest.

Political Thought in England from Locke to Bentham, by Harold J. Laski (Holt). A handy little volume in the Home University Library series, dealing largely with the English Revolution and the beginnings of the liberal movement in government, religion and industry. It is a scholarly, illuminating study of the philosophy, literature and statesmanship of liberalism in the seventeenth and more especially the eighteenth century, in England.

Modern China, by Sih-Gung Cheng (Oxford University Press). A political study of present-day China with special reference to her international relations and her need of protection against alleged Japanese aggression.

Duruy's History of France, by Victor Duruy (Crowell). This standard and excellent history of France appears in a revised edition, edited by J. Franklin Jameson from the translation by Cary; and their work is brought down to the year 1919 by Mabell S. C. Smith. Thus is included the period including the recent Great War and the story of France's distinguished and awful part in it. A glimpse of France in reconstruction is timely and significant. The more intimate relationships, which war brought, should make Americans the more eager to really know France, and this comprehensive and illuminating history will be of great service to that end. Many colored maps add to the value of the book.

Recent Fiction

Mac of Placid, by T. Morris Longstreth (Century). The author uses his intimate knowledge of the Adirondacks to provide a fine background for this piece of fictional biography. Mac is a boy born and raised in a country slum. No similiar city district provides more of physical and moral filth. Drunken father, vile mother and lewd companions are described with unblinking realism. Yet Mac rises above it all largely by his friendship with Robert Louis Stevenson. The first part of the story and the last part, with its rush of fierce adventure, would bear condensation. But the Stevenson episode is admirable, presenting the author as the whimsical, lovable character he must have been.

The Wall Between, by Sara Ware Bassett (Little, Brown). Appearing to be as much at home among the New Hampshire hills as on the shore of Massachusetts, the author presents a strong, well-constructed story. Her skill in character study is also in evidence. A relentless New England feud, carried on for generations, is at the center of events. It concerns a useless stone wall which ought to be repaired by one family or the other. Only the arrival of a young niece from the Far West reveals the absurdity of the situation. As there is already a marriageable man on the other side of the wall, the practiced reader spies a Romeo and Juliet affair. But it does not proceed along conventional lines. The solution is a surprise.

The Middle Passage, by L. Frank Tooker (Century). A boy adrift on a cake of ice is picked up by a slave ship and then begins an adventurous career, full of peril which he meets with daring spirit. The descriptions of storms at sea are thrilling and the story is a series of stirring experiences. The telling of it is admirable. A charming romance runs through the pages.

The Mask, by John Cournos (Doran). A vivid autobiographical story, uncompromising in its pictures of reality, which are sometimes disagreeable and immodest, but always powerful, dealing with a boyhood in Russia and a fight for a footing in life in Philadelphia.

Jane, by Anna Alice Chapin (Putnam). A young girl who has led a secluded life, suddenly runs away from home. She is both self-forgetful and philosophical. So when she finds herself accidentally provided with a prospective husband and a position as actress in "a fourth-rate traveling company," she placidly takes life as it comes. It is a strange world, revealed in its good points and its inevitable black shadows. Jane is a winsome character though she is too obliging and hardly deserves some of her lucky escapes from pitfalls.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

What Sort of Pleasure Should a Christian Allow?

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 10-16

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Lesson. Luke 7:31-35; Isa. 47: 1-11; 2 Tim. 3:1-5.

The Sources of Pleasure. We are to think of pleasure first as relaxation. It is not our main business in life—it even loses its power to please if we attempt to make it so. It is not a thing to give ourselves up to. The Revisers made that point clear when they translated the Apostle Paul's judgment in regard to certain widows: "But she that giveth herself to pleasure is dead while she liveth." This is no judgment of a stern and narrow Puritanism; it is the recognition of a fact which we see embodied often in our pleasure-loving age. Pleasure is a thing that grows from contrast. To enjoy to the full you must not be hunting enjoyment every moment, any more than to enjoy the pleasure of eating you must be at the table all day long. And Christianity is, in one view of it, the measurer and determiner of the proportions of what life holds, pleasure among them. There is an order of values in the soul and pleasure-seeking does not head the procession.

Pleasure as a Right of the Soul. I find nothing in the New Testament which denies that enjoyment is a normal thing. I see no reason why a Christian should go to his amusements with a resentful conscience, any more than a well-behaved child to its play. There is something unnatural in a life from which enjoyment is wholly barred. If we could see any way in which such a self-denial would help another we would not grudge the cost. But as a matter of experience it usually hinders by bearing false witness to our faith. Nor is our pleasure in God, the proper enjoyment of every child of his, of a kind to hinder innocent but lesser pleasures. God is not jealous of a game of golf, or an amusing book or a meditative ramble. We need variety of pleasure for our soul's health.

As a Peril to Godliness. On the other hand, the passion for pleasure is undoubtedly a peril to all high forms of godliness. That is a feverishness of the soul which is a symptom of disease. When one is so intent on pleasure that he cannot enjoy communion with God or find time for communion with his fellow Christians, that is a danger signal. There is always a call to self-restraint and self-denials. We are to use the world but not to the full.

Is Asceticism Necessary to Faith? Some great saints have found it so and if we do we may be called to follow their example. But most of the saints I have known have been genial people who were as ready for a laugh or a frolic as any child could wish. I cannot think, whatever special calls may come, that the childlike spirit which Christ demands is a fundamentally unplayful spirit.

Use and Abuse of the World. It all comes back to a question of distinctions and discriminations. And it becomes at last a problem of the right order in our life choices.

Closet and Altar

THE ABIDING TREASURE

The word of the Lord remaineth forever.

All that he had was outside of him. A man could get through the very stars of heaven if every one of them was a golden coin; a man could spend the sands upon the seashore if every sparkling atom was a silver coin! He could get through it all and be a pauper at the last! Who is he, then, who cannot spend all? A man who lives spiritually, a man of character, of purpose, of high conception, of noble sympathy, a man who knows truth and loves truth never can spend his fortune.—Joseph Parker.

Unwrap thy life of many wants and fine,
  He who with Christ will dine
Shall see no table curiously spread
  But fish and barley bread.
Where readest thou that Jesus bade us pray,
"Give us our sumptuous fare from day to day."

Why wilt thou take a castle on thy back
  When God gave but a pack?
With gown of honest wear, why wilt thou tease
  For braid and fripperies?
Learn thou with flowers to dress, with birds to feed,
And pinch thy large want to thy little need.
—Frederic Langbridge.

The best things abide and are beyond the power of decay or death. They are like gold, which the rust cannot touch or fire destroy. A pang sometimes strikes the heart as it looks on a fair flower and remembers that its beauty will soon be over; but the beauty of these invisible things never fades. A man gathers precious volumes or noble pictures and a shadow falls across them as he remembers that they can be his only for the brief years of his mortal life; but no such shadow falls on the spiritual elements which these things may have had some part in quickening in his mind and heart—treasures which, by the varied discipline of life, have slowly accumulated—treasures which are really ours, bound to us by ties which death is powerless to break.—W. Garrett Horder.

O thou who art the Source and Satisfaction of my heart and its chief good, let neither evil draw me away, nor the lesser joys of life hinder my joy in thee. Help me never to rest in a quick content which leads to poverty of soul, but to seek and find thee, who art not far from any one of us. Yet, Lord, since I for a little dwell at home among the little things of earth, grant me the experience of thy love even in these. May beauty and pleasure, and all the gifts that fill my hands speak to my heart of thy loving-kindness. Go thou with me wherever thou wilt have me go. So let me have eyes to see and wings of thought to rise into thy presence, hands to serve and feet to run at thy bidding; and may no gift of thine be spoiled in the experience of my soul by selfishness. In the name of Christ. Amen.
—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

Christianizing Our Politics

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 17-23

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Christian Principles in Politics. Luke 22:24-27. (Citizenship Meeting.)

Light from the Bible Passage

Even in the presence of the Master men quarreled. If these men were disciples, so much the worse. This quarrel was over the matter of rank. Jesus himself never took it into account. He had greater things to think of, and to impress upon his hearers. Social position would mean nothing to him. He compares such contention with heathen practices. It is not his way—that is, it is not Christian. His concern was not over a man's rank but a man's service to his fellows. High position in his mind meant humble and hearty readiness to help others. The real, high-rank citizen is not the selfish, helpless, good-liver, but one like the Master, one who always placed himself at the disposal of all men whom he could help. The Master was the ideal citizen. His politics were based on altruism and service.

Leads for the Leader

Many Endeavorers are not voting citizens. That is only an occasional way to express their politics. They are all living citizens. In the last word, citizens make a city, not roads, buildings, schools, or even churches. The city is known by its citizens, and their ideas of right citizenship are shaped by their ideas of government (politics). Here then is a subject full of significance for every Endeavorer.

Admitting that thoroughly Christian citizens are rather rare, is it worth while to be one and to be in the minority? Do minorities make any impression on the whole?

If your town or city politics are "dirty," how can the dirt be removed? Shall we try?

Is the Christian thought expressing itself in the present presidential campaign? Is that phase more important than platforms or parties?

What Christian principles can we hope to put into world politics?

Thoughts for Members

Christian citizenship is based on what one can give and not what he can get.

What place will malicious personalities and deliberate representation and corruption of voters have when Christian principles dominate our politics?

Roosevelt stands out as the type of politician who thought out his views and acted in the spirit of a Christian. Is it possible for others to do the same?

A Moment of Prayer

O God and Father of us all, who hath made us all to dwell upon the face of thy world, teach us, we pray, to entwine our love about the lives of others, to govern our affairs and our communities and our country with a wholesome spirit of service for others, that we may show anew the heart of our Master, thy Son. Amen.

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Jesus Begins His Ministry

International Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 17. Matt. 4:12–25.

It is a glorious spectacle to see any strong young man begin his life work. It is especially so if that work is a great devotion of life to the welfare of mankind. Jesus is the supreme example of a life dedicated to a great service.

1. The Time. Jesus did not rush into his work. He waited for the time to become ripe for his service to begin. The years of waiting at Nazareth and his self-control during John's ministry are significant of his clear-visioned patience and reserve. John's fearless work had caused him to cross the will of a wicked king and he was tasting the joys of a dungeon. This is the price that men generally pay for speaking out boldly in God's name. Jesus knew that the time had come for John's message and work to be completed by his. He came to fulfill not only the old law but also the mission of John. Thus every life work ought to fit into what has gone before, make its contribution to the generation, and pass into the future for its final realization.

2. The Place. Jesus was giving a religious message; his work was religious. Therefore he would most naturally have sought training at the accredited schools in Jerusalem, established his relations with the priests and teachers of the law, and in due time have entered into the regular service of the established church in the accustomed way. This is not the method that he pursued, however. In Galilee rather than in more "pious" Judea; in Capernaum rather than in the religious capital, Jerusalem; among the people of a commercial town instead of in the synagogues or the temple of a sacred city, Jesus began his work. What does this indicate as to the popular character of his ministry? What does it suggest concerning the tendencies in formal religious life?

3. The Message. Jesus proclaimed a great fact and a consequent duty. The fact was that the Kingdom of Heaven was close at hand, was coming immediately. The people understood by this term the reign of God in human life, sometimes called a "theocracy;" Jesus took the old words and filled them with new meaning. He meant, in brief, the reign of God in all human life through the mastery of man's purposes by the love of God. He meant that the two great commandments (love to God and neighbor) and the Golden Rule, were the great valid principles which could transform the world and would bring a new order of life to all mankind. He meant that he had come to give this principle a concrete expression in his own life and to transmit new power to men, so that they could realize this actually in their purposes and conduct. In view of this fact they must change their whole attitude toward life; this transformation consisted in a radical change of purpose issuing in a profound modification of life and was known as repentance. This was the first message or "sermon" of Jesus. Give as clear and forceful a modern interpretation of this as you can. Just what does it mean now?

4. The Method. If the message of Jesus was significant the method by which he proposed to carry on his work was still more so. We noted that he did not begin with the official places or leaders of popular religion. His methods also were his own. Instead of writing books or organizing a campaign of propaganda, Jesus quietly called around him a little group of disciples and spent his time actually impressing his message and spirit so deeply upon them that when he had finished they were living representatives of his spirit and program. This seems at first glance a futile method of bringing a new program or order of life to the world. But its wisdom and power is fully vindicated. The men whom Jesus made over went on to make the world over. This is the method of Jesus today. How does he call us to be his disciples now? What does it mean to learn Christ's lesson now?

5. The Results. They are summed up in the words: preaching, teaching, healing. Jesus gave men a message which was concerned with a new life; he taught the details of this message clearly and patiently; he applied the message to actual life in all its aspects, beginning with the physical body and ending with the transformed soul. From this followed not only a wide reputation but a growing following of eager disciples. What is the message of Jesus to our age? What does it mean to be a learner of Christ? Has Christ power now in the physical as well as the spiritual realm? How can we vitalize the experience of the first disciples in our own daily life?

Secretary of Missionary Education

Editors' Note.—Secretary Sheldon's series of articles on the Bible is interrupted this week to allow space for this article which has reference to the theme of this special number. The series on the Bible will continue next week.

The Congregational World Movement is to lay special emphasis upon missionary education in its campaign this fall, preparatory to the raising of funds by the churches for our world-wide Congregational work.

The expression of the Christian impulse in missionary service is not only essential to the full development of Christian personality and to spiritual strength and vigor in the church, but it underlies the possibility of any adequate ministry to the needs of the world.

Such a ministry calls for the generous and systematic support of all our missionary agencies and this support comes most surely as the result of sound knowledge of facts, the cultivation of vital human interests and the establishment of Christian attitudes toward all people, near at hand or far away.

The urgency of the appeal for money is justified by the needs, but to depend upon such appeal alone without laying the educational foundations is like harvesting the grain and neglecting to sow for the next harvest.

The Missionary Education Department, therefore, in co-operation with a committee representing the missionary societies, has outlined a program which it is hoped will commend itself to all the churches for earnest consideration and use. This program has been outlined more in detail in a series of articles which appeared in The Congregationalist for April 1 to May 20 inclusive. Its main features may here be summarized. They include:

1. The organization in every church of a strong and fully representative committee charged with the duty of effectively promoting missionary education in all departments of the church.
2. Systematic, graded mission study and training in missionary service as an integral part of the curriculum in every department of the church school.
3. Organized week-day activities and special groups and societies for the promotion of missionary education, of the types best adapted to the respective needs of children, boys and girls, young people and adults.
4. Promotion of the plan known as The Church School of Missions, by which the thought and attention of the whole church is concentrated for a given period of time upon mission study.
5. Cultivation of the habit of definite, persistent prayer for our missionaries and missionary interests.
6. Promotion of the principle and practice of stewardship.
7. Provision for the attendance of young people at missionary education conferences and institutes for the development of leaders.
8. The recruiting of young people for service on the missionary field at home and abroad.

The Missionary Education Department exists to serve the churches and all the mission boards in the realization of these objectives. A Manual of Principles and Methods of Missionary Education is in the press and will be distributed during this campaign. Pamphlets giving detailed suggestions for carrying out the graded program of missionary education in the local church are in preparation.

The Department is constantly gathering information regarding the work of the mission boards and the best methods in use by various churches. It issues a list of missionary topics suitable for use in the church prayer meeting and another for young people's societies, and publishes notes and comments on these in the church papers. It publishes many pamphlets and leaflets on special topics in missionary education in addition to those above mentioned.

All this information is made available to the churches through correspondence and personal interviews, addresses at conferences and institutes and in the churches, and through articles in The Congregationalist, the Church School, and the missionary periodicals.

The Department is a clearing house for the exchange of ideas and helpful suggestions in this field of work. Use it freely. Address the Secretary of Missionary Education, 14 Beacon Street, Boston 9, Mass.

Types of Work under
The American Missionary Association

1. The Light of a Whole City:

Charleston, S. C., has a Negro population of about 30,000, an orderly, thrifty and prosperous community, little disturbed by interracial troubles. The upper crust of this black city is composed of intelligent, self-respecting and educated colored folks who ardently desire for themselves and their children a place under the sun.

At the heart of that ambitious, intellectual and social life, stands an A. M. A. school known as Avery Normal Institute. Like other A. M. A. schools of its class, Avery offers a first-rate high school curriculum with additional normal work and teacher training. Its buildings, though well located and arranged and exquisitely neat, are old, shabby and in dire need of repair. But on the human side Avery is strong and beautiful. It has a fine faculty group including graduates of Talladega, Fisk, Howard and Atlanta; it has a student body of some four hundred eager young people who throng its classrooms to the last broken bench, while scores of applicants are turned away for lack of room. It graduates from thirty to forty students every year, a great proportion of whom go on to college. It has a large and loyal Alumni body who are devoted to the school.

The influence of Avery pervades the city. At the head of each of the three huge public schools stands an Avery graduate. Their teachers are all Avery graduates. It is indeed necessarily so. The law requires that colored public schools shall have only Negro teachers and there is no other source from which Negro teachers can be had. The so-called public high school stops with the eighth grade and there is no other high school within a radius of eighty miles.

Charleston has also scores of private schools for Negroes. These, too, are practically all conducted by Avery graduates. This great company of teachers, together with many other graduates, is carrying out to every corner of black Charleston the A. M. A. spirit and the A. M. A. ideals. No wonder that when a recent rumor shrilled through the town, to the effect that Avery might soon be closed, there instantly arose a sharp and agonized cry of protest. "To lose our school, our only open door to the higher life of the intellect; it would be an appalling calamity; it would be like plucking out our eyes."

2. The Precious Things of the Everlasting Hills:

In the Cumberland Plateau of eastern Tennessee, two thousand feet above sea level, we are building up a great Industrial School for mountain boys and girls. In this institution two of our schools are united, the old Pleasant Hill and Grand View, which is thus removed from its former location, thirty miles away to this, a much more favorable center for mountain work.

As with Avery so the New Pleasant Hill is very strong on the human side. The Principal, Rev. Edwin R. Wharton, has a genius for school management, especially for the building up of boys. His wife, "the Doctor Woman," is the good angel of the whole countryside, carrying her ministry of healing to hundreds of lonely cabins up and down the valleys. These two are supported by a fine staff of loyal teachers, but the great asset is the student body; splendid boys and girls, of pure American stock, with noble physique, bright faces and eager minds—genuine mountain products from the big hills come tramping in until they fill every nook and corner.

The graduates of these two schools, now united, have become the leaders of that whole region. Most of them teach for a while at least, many make teaching their permanent profession, others have become doctors, lawyers, legislators, ministers, besides many who occupy positions of influence in commercial and agricultural lines.

The Pleasant Hill buildings are shabby, outworn, and most of them unfit for further service. We are, however, about to begin the erection of a new plant for which some forty thousand dollars are in hand and which will require several times that amount for their completion. A wonderfully fruitful field is this; such work as we are doing is deeply needed and is highly prized by the neglected people of the southern mountains. It is capable of unlimited expansion and we greatly desire to be doing more for the American Highlander.

3. A Fruitful Church:

The Association, while it glories in its schools and colleges, would not for a moment have its churches forgotten. The most important of these spiritual children is the Negro group, 134 in number, which are scattered throughout the southern states. These churches present an ethical and intellectual type of religion contrasting sharply with the usual religious emotionalism of the Negro, while at the same time they cultivate a warm and tender evangelism. They have an influence out of all proportion to their size. Their pastors, men of stainless lives, liberal education and public spirit, are usually leaders in the community. The churches are growing steadily in size and numbers, they are making remarkable progress in the grace of giving. As a rule they have adopted the Tercentenary Plan in its entirety; have taken an enthusiastic part in the Congregational World Movement and were among the first to go over the top, and they are supporting one of their own men with his wife as missionaries in Africa under the American Board. Thirty-two colored Congregational churches in this land are self-supporting and many others are eagerly looking forward to the goal of self-support.

A fine example of an A. M. A. church is to be found in Raleigh, N. C., its minister, Rev. Perfect R. DeBerry. Within the present pastorate of some ten years, this church has increased its membership fivefold and its influence in the community at least tenfold. It now has some four hundred members. It has within this period bought and paid for an attractive house of worship, and it has moved far on toward self-support. It has also taken an active part in the great forward movements of the Congregational body and in local movements for social and civic advancement. In connection with this church the Association supplies a social worker who is immensely useful in effectively directing numerous clubs and classes and other provisions for the training and wholesome amusement of the young people in the neighborhood.

4. A Modern Siloam:

A great multitude of sick folks, the lame, the halt, the blind and those stricken by divers diseases—a hundred every day—come to the beautiful porch of the Ryder Memorial Hospital at Humacao, Porto Rico, that they may be healed. And while they are awaiting, each man his turn, to interview the good doctor, a simple religious service goes on at which many hear, for the first time, the wonderful words of life. Very impressive those words must be in such circumstances where preaching and healing go hand in hand as they used to do in early Christian days. The deaf hear, the lame walk, the blind receive their sight, the dying are restored to life and the poor have the gospel preached to them.

Conditions in Porto Rico are not so very unlike those of the ancient Galilean villages where the Master preached and healed; a semi-tropical climate, a dense rural population, food scarce and costly, a poor, neglected, illiterate peasantry, scantily clothed, half starved, miserably housed, the prey of fevers, tuberculosis, hook worm, blindness, dreadful venereal diseases and the other ailments that haunt the footsteps of poverty.

As was the case at old Capernaum, so here and now our Master must be moved with compassion at the sight of these unshepherded multitudes.

What a privilege to be doing for them, in His name and for His sake, the selfsame things He used to do!

These good folks of the Pilgrim faith are every-day illustrations of the sort of work that you, by your interest, your gifts, your prayers, are carrying on, through the agency of The American Missionary Association, in hundreds of needy places and for tens of thousands of needy souls under our common flag.

You will surely count it no small privilege to bear a faithful, generous part in undertakings so vast, so beneficent, so Christlike!

The American Board

Would have you know—

THAT the generosity of the Congregational people has saved the Board from the greatest financial disaster in its history. We report a debt for the year ending August 31 of $242,000—an unprecedented amount—but this is more than covered by subscriptions made to the Emergency Fund of the Congregational World Movement, and the debt will surely be canceled in the course of the next six months. But for payments already made through the Congregational World Movement, the debt would have been over $300,000. Let all who helped in the canvass last spring rejoice that the day has been saved!

THAT while the churches were busy attending to the Emergency call and to the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, they did not relinquish their efforts to maintain the regular income of the Board. It is highly gratifying to find that in such a year as that just closed the regular gifts of the churches to the American Board show a gain of $106,000, the largest single year gain in our history.

THAT during August over 2,000 friends all over the country sent direct to our treasury an extra gift, these totaling $49,000. The amounts varied from $1 to $1,000, and the accompanying letters greatly cheered our hearts. The Board never had so many devoted and intelligent friends.

THAT while the future presents many baffling problems in our widely scattered fields, we can and do face it courageously and hopefully in view of the strong backing we have at home. Let us all stand together in the support of this great world task.

THAT we shall have some extraordinarily interesting information to give out in coming days as to the needs of the work during the current year. Do not fail to read the American Board section in the SURVEY soon to be published by the Congregational World Movement. We never have sent out a more important or more interesting document. Use it in your churches as a textbook.

THAT the American Board occupies the most strategic fields in the world, and hence can offer superb opportunities for special investments on the part of individuals and churches. Why not support your own missionary or finance your own section of our work? Those who enter into such an arrangement gain great satisfaction. Write to the Home Department of the Board or to any of our District Officers.

THAT foreign missions have taken on tremendous significance of late. On every hand it is recognized that this enterprise is of first importance in composing and reconstructing the world. Statesmen, world economists, captains of industry and prominent educators unite in urging the Church to send its message of justice and good will to the ends of the earth. The foreign missionary is the true internationalist, the promoter of world peace, the guardian of the world's highest life. We must stand by him as never before.

THAT most of all this year we want to develop the spirit of prayer among the home folks. This is a religious enterprise and we must draw from the reservoirs of God if we are to have the power we need. We appeal for a revival of the monthly missionary prayer meeting, with fully one-third of the time spent in prayer. We appeal to all those friends who gave in August to follow the Prayer Calendar in our Year Book of Missions. Let us undergird this work with our prayers and we shall see a far greater year than the one just finished. As Livingston said, "Let us advance on our knees."

WITH THE CHILDREN

Dicky-bird and the Student

By Winifred M. Kirkland

Dicky-bird is five. He is the youngest member of the faculty except one, but that one is only a three-months baby, and a girl besides. Dicky-bird lives on Faculty Hill, which looks across the meadow land of the athletic field and the bit of wood beyond, to the other hill where the college stands. Over there live the students. He does not like students. He wishes there were no students, for then his father could play with him in the mornings instead of bolting his breakfast and skipping down the stone steps, running across the athletic field and then up again on the other side, to be in time to teach students at nine o'clock.

Dicky-bird could stand students if they would only let him alone, but they won't! They come trooping up the stone steps and past his yard, on their way to the road and country walks beyond. And always they stop to talk to Dicky-bird, playing—as if he had time to talk to students! There were no students in sight now, and Dicky-bird went into the house and brought out his tin soldiers, resolved to play Valley Forge near the road, beside which the tiniest of brooks runs down the hill.

Over at the college, in a room under the gables of Croft, Jean Dawson was in a pretty rage. Five minutes before, she had been cheery, whistling softly while she braided her hair and tugged on her sweater preparatory to an early game of hockey—but now, since the coming of the mail!

Jean had read the letter over ten times; she seemed to hear the ringing of his voice through it, and see the fire in his eyes. He was a dear boy—it was just that which made her angry with him—her tall twin brother, with the football hair, the tense lips, the changing eyes. But there lay the obstinate letter:

"Dear Jean: Your letter does not affect my decision in regard to the Christmas vacation. I shall spend it as I please. It's no use trying to tell you how sick I am of the city. To be here in Boston is bad enough, but you ask me to go to New York! To Aunt Lucile's house party, to theaters and dinners and parties—no sleep and no fresh air, and nothing but racket day and night! No, it's Cousin James' good old Vermont farm I'm going to, a hundred miles from a city, and five miles from anywhere, where I can breathe and tramp and ride and ski, and have a taste of woods and hills. Since you are so displeased with me, it is hardly necessary to say that I shall not keep to the plan of spending Thanksgiving with you. I had looked forward to having a bully time, but I don't feel much like coming now.

"Your aff. brother,
"ROBERT LYNN DAWSON."

Jean dashed off four separate replies, each shorter than the preceding. This was the last:

"Dear Rob: I certainly fail to understand. You have no right to disappoint me, after all I've done for you.

"I should think you'd get enough of solitude in camp in the summer, and that two weeks with me in New York at Christmas wouldn't hurt you.

"You are right not to come Thanksgiving. We'd both have a pretty poor sort of time.

"Your loving sister,
"JEAN DAWSON."

Jean sealed her letter, thrust the envelope up under her sweater, grabbed her hockey stick, and stormed out of the room, down stairs, and out of doors. She hurried to the athletic field, but when she got there she found herself too cross to play, and went on up the stone steps, and past Dicky's house, toward the road, and the country beyond. Striding along unseeing, she stepped over Dicky-bird, playing Valley Forge.

"Hi, there," he cried. "Keep off the Delaware!"

"Why?" the tone was as cross as Dicky's own.

"'Cause George Washington doesn't like students."

"Don't care—it's not his Delaware!" and stout shod as she was, Jean continued to walk on down the hill right in the Delaware.

"You'll be drowned," Dicky-bird called after her, gloomily, for he had stopped his play to watch her. This was a new sort of student. He didn't remember ever to have seen her before. Somehow her snappishness pleased him. He dropped George Washington, he pattered down the hill. The student faced about.

"Now who asked you to come along?" she asked, glaring at him.

"Nobody didn't." Dicky-bird was frightened, but charmed.

"I didn't, remember that," and the student turned on her way.

Dicky-bird trotted abreast, his blouse well protruded in front, hands thrust into his belt at the back. The student, in her white sweater and crimson skirt, had her hands behind her, too, dragging her hockey stick. The resolution expressed in both those square young backs would have been a study—if anybody had been there to see.

They trudged on, not speaking, making a great racket with the dead leaves. It was a wonderful wood road, arched by branches all crimson and gold. In the crisp air was a faint smell of autumn bonfires. It was very hard to stay cross as one fared on and on through such blue November weather. Once a squirrel, disturbed in his nutting, scolded at them loudly. Dicky-bird laughed.

"Crosspatch!" he said, pointing at the furry mite; "but then we bovvered him, didn't we?"

"Yes," said the student—she was not quite ready to talk.

On they went. Dicky-bird was enjoying him-

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

As I announced last week the winners in our "Beast, Bird and Fish Contest" are Comrades Dorothy Walters of Milwaukee, Wis., first prize, and Leonard Southby, Carthage, N. Y., second prize.

You will remember that the lists were to contain family names that suggest either a beast, a bird or a fish. I will give that offered by the first prize winner:

Beasts: Badger, Batts, Bear, Beaver, Bock, Bull, Catt, Coon, Deer, Doe, Fox, Hare, Hogg, Lyon, Mole, Mouse, Pigg, Roebuck, Seal, Spitz, Wolf—21.

Birds: Bunting, Bustard, Canary, Chicks, Coote, Crane, Crow, Dove, Drake, Finch, Heron, Jay, Kite, Mallard, Martin, Nightingale, Parrott, Peacock, Raven, Roller, Sparrow, Stork, Swallow, Swan, Swift, Teal, Woodcock, Wren—28.

Fish: Bass, Eels, Goldfish, Herring, Pike, Ray, Roach, Salmon, Sturgeon, Trout—10. Total 60.

This fine list entitles its maker to the first prize of two Thrift Stamps.

Comrade Leonard Southby's list contains fifty-two names. I will not give it in full, but he found thirteen "beasts" that are not in the above list. They are: Bull, Bullock, Campbell (This, of course, is camel.—Mr. A.), Cobb, Hart, Hind, Horsnail (Dictionary says this is a tadpole.—Mr. A.), Kerr (cur.—Mr. A.), Kidd, Leppard, (leopard?), Lamb, Morse, Squirrell.

He also has nine different "birds". Bird, Cox (cocks), Dove, Eagle, Hawkes, Partridge, Robbins, Starling; Taylor (tailor).

Then he found four "fishes" not discovered by Comrade Dorothy. They are: Perch, Skeats (skate?—Mr. A.), Spratt, Whiting.

Leonard draws a prize of one Thrift Stamp for his list. He got some of his names from England where he was born and lived for some years. I wish I had room to quote from his admirable letter.

Perhaps some of you Comrades would like to use these lists in a game at some Christian Endeavor social. You will probably be glad to have a few more names to add. Comrade Alice Goodwin of Hartford, Ct., sent in these that are not found above: Beasts: Rowe (roe), Stagg. Bird: Bulfinch. Colt is a "beast" given by another Hartford Comrade, S. F. Bell. I would add as a "fish," Culp.

You will enjoy a letter from one of our older Comrades, Rev. H. E. Partridge, of Norwalk, Cal.:

"Mr. Alden,

"Dear Sir: The church in Fremont, Ill., had as pastor when I was a boy, Rev. A. K. Fox and its two deacons at the same time were Swan and Partridge. (Rather dangerous position for the "fowls."—Mr. A.). Fox and Partridge went into the newspaper business at the county seat. Fox sold to another Partridge when the firm became Partridge Brothers and later the paper was sold to Coon."

I will take room this time for just one more letter, from Comrade Eleanor Smith of New Haven, Ct.:

"Dear Mr. Alden:

"I have been reading the Comrades' Corner for some time but have had nothing to contribute till this afternoon, when I was sitting on the piazza, a big truck went by and the name was so funny I thought you might like to add it to your queer names list. It was M. Papa and Sons."

That reminds me of a sign I saw on a truck once. It read:

THE WORLD DOES MOVE
SO DO WE TRUCKING ANYWHERE

We are going 'way over $25 on our Lunch Fund. Money is coming in a fast stream now. I will tell you about it next time.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

IN THE CONGREGATIONAL CIRCLE

How They Do It

An Exchange of Methods in Church Work

The "Extra" Sunday School Class

By Miss S. T. Payson

The problem of Sunday afternoon for the girls who were not able to get out in time for Sunday school had bothered us for some time. Girls who must help at home, girls who did housework, maids, waitresses, all of whom found it impossible to reach the Sunday school in time for the regular session, and yet who must be reached by the church. And we have evolved a scheme which seems to be the very thing to meet the need of these girls.

A few of us who had thought ourselves graduated from Sunday school work talked the matter over and decided to organize a Girls' Club, a branch of the Sunday school, yet not stopping at Sunday school work.

We meet at 4 o'clock on Sunday afternoon for Bible study, using the regular Sunday school lesson leaflets and papers, and making our offering regularly to the Sunday school funds. We have good music, our scheme having interested two accomplished musicians who had not before entered Sunday school work. Review work, prayer and memorized psalm or other passages of Scripture are then led by one of our volunteer workers. The lesson is taught by another. There is much singing and everything is carried on snappily so that at 5 o'clock we are ready for dismissal. Just then arrives a lady, another of our committee, with a covered basket and here follows an important part of our scheme. The lonely girls, the strangers, and those who live far away may stay to tea. The gas range comes into use and those who stay have two pleasant hours to read, play and sing and eat a leisurely tea before evening service. They may then attend evening service and after that we have our "Pleasant Sunday Evening" hour of song and social intercourse in the Sunday school room.

That finishes the day but not what we do for our girls during the week. Thursday evening is peculiarly their own. This is their party night and they may come as early as they wish and some one is always there to meet them. The fire is bright, the chairs are arranged as cosily as possible, the sewing machine and piano are both very much in evidence. We teach the girls to sew—none of us are trained dressmakers, but several of us are good sewers. The girls are thus learning to make their own simpler garments and even to make shirt-waists. They are also learning to crochet and knit. The piano is for the use of any one but during the evening we always have some of the best music and also a sing-song if they feel like it. Some prefer to play games. With many girls this is their only play time so when they feel like it we all join in. We read pleasant stories and an occasional graver book from our missionary library.

Our trained nurse gives instruction in simple nursing for emergencies, bandaging, etc. The girls love that and I expect several of the girls to graduate from home-workers into hospitals. We always have "refreshments," coffee or cocoa, sandwiches and cake at this meeting. The girls are going home, many of them to boarding houses, and they thoroughly enjoy the added comfort of the hot drink and the "eats." One can be so much more sociable when one is holding a cup of coffee or tea.

The last thing is a hymn and the Mizpah Benediction. We don't try to commence with any religious service, because the girls drop in at any time they can during the evening, but we have the quieting word at the end.

We have been "invited out" some evenings to hospitable homes in the congregation, but those were extra parties and did not interfere with our regular evenings. We also give parties of our own and invite the minister and the Sunday school superintendent and our own particular friends. We are taking an interest in the missionary work of the church and are going to help with the Christmas for the poor both by giving and working. We reach the very girls who otherwise would be without Sunday school privileges.

Laymen Conduct Services

During the vacation of Rev. W. E. Collins, pastor of JACKSONVILLE, ILL., the members conducted laymen's services that proved successful. Three people took part in each service. One conducted the opening exercises, another made "the long prayer," and a third gave the address which stood in lieu of a sermon. Good

Pastoral Calling

In making a call on a family the pastor should have in mind just what his object is. This may be outlined in part as follows: He represents the organized church in its worship and service, and his conversation, as well as his presence, should emphasize this fact. His conversation will naturally begin with the family, the members of the family, where they have employment, if they are progressing in their employment; what kinds of ambitions the different members may have; what sort of an ideal the mother has for the future of her children; what are the dominating interests in the family life; what interest there is in religion; what participation they have had in church life and work heretofore; the special needs of the family; in what manner the church may make a definite contribution, both to the family life and to the lives of the individuals, and to what specific tasks in the church they can be invited.

These are in brief some of the topics the pastor should have in mind as he directs his conversation. Of course it is understood that the pastor will be wise enough not to make this evident, but the visit should result in the pastor's coming away from that home with these items of information securely fixed in his own mind, and as soon as he reaches his study he should put on paper his impressions, the needs and the opportunities of this family. In this way he has before him the data upon which to base the campaign which he and the members of his church will carry through, the object of which is that the church shall minister to the needs of this family and shall win them to whole-hearted service in the church and fellowship of its worship. When one realizes the long and careful period of cultivation required to bring a family, not in touch with the church, into active participation in its worship and service, he will weigh very carefully the various elements of such a program and will appraise the introductory visit and analysis of conditions and opportunities very highly indeed. A parish visitation carried out along these lines will indicate to the church and its officers the possibilities for evangelistic service in the year's work.

The fall offers an especially opportune time for this careful visitation, as the rush of the various programs is not so pressing and the gathering of names early in the year affords more opportunities for cultivation than when the visitation is made later in the winter. If this work is not started and carried as far as possible in the fall, it adds much to the complexity of the after-Christmas or pre-Lenten program.

THE CHURCH EXTENSION BOARDS

$1,475,000 is asked by these Societies for 1921. WHY?

OUR PASTORS' 1919 SALARIES

29.4% received Starvation Salaries—Less than $1,000—47% Without Parsonages.
32.7% received Enervation Salaries—$1,000 to $1,499—24% Without Parsonages.
19.1% received Living Salaries—$1,500 to $1,999—34% Without Parsonages.
11.5% received Handicapped Salaries—$2,000 to $2,999—41% Without Parsonages.
7 % received Efficiency Salaries—$3,000 or more—64% Without Parsonages.

The Shortage of Pastors

There were 682 fewer ministers in charge of churches in 1919 than in 1914.
There were 1,331 pulpits vacant January 1st, 1920.
107 persons were ordained in 1909; about 250 retired from our ministry.
A western state shows 38 ministers serving churches and 41 not serving churches.

The New Day

A Layman's Commission on the Status of the Ministry was appointed by the National Council.
This Commission is actively seeking salary increases of 50% over the scale of 1914.
The Home Missionary Society is supporting this Commission with money and executive service.
$1,500 and a house is set as the minimum salary for fully equipped men.
Through the Pilgrim Memorial Fund the minister may be certain of income after retirement.
A man's job can now be assured the fully equipped minister.
$245,000 of the askings of the C. H. M. S. is for salary increases.

OUR CHURCH BUILDINGS

Property of 5,959 Churches in 1919

119 make no report.
462 report no property.
2,036 report property valued at less than $5,000.
1,119 report property valued at $5,000 but less than $10,000.
1,756 report property valued at $10,000 but less than $50,000.
296 report property valued at $50,000 but less than $100,000.
171 report property valued at $100,000 or over.

Two-thirds of our churches are handicapped in building equipment.
A survey church by church shows $6,700,000 needed from the Building Society within five years.
The full askings of the Building Society would make possible only half of this amount.

OUR CHURCH MOTHER

The Home Missionary Society is the mother of churches.
Fully four-fifths of all our churches have been aided by the Society.
2,352 churches have been organized within the last twenty years.

Sickness in the Church Family

47% of our churches failed to report a single addition on confession in 1919.
61% have fewer than 100 members; 39% have fewer than 50 members.
Churches under 100 members are losing ground.
The net gain in membership in 1915 was $17,232; in 1919, 144.

Deaths in the Church Family

There has been a net loss of 144 churches since 1915.
1,004 churches have been dropped in the last ten years.
Only 38 new churches were organized in 1919; 98 were dropped.
In 1919, 10,000 members died, and 30,000 were dropped.

The Medicine Needed

There are 50,000,000 in the United States over nine years of age not connected with any church—Home missionaries needed.

There are 27,000,000 under twenty-five years of age not in any Sunday School—Sunday School workers needed.

5,000 new churches are needed west of the Mississippi River—Church buildings needed.

There were 351 fewer home missionaries in 1919 than 1914, and 544 fewer missionary stations in 1919 than in 1918—Money needed.

The medicine needed is consecrated money. Re-employ the 351 dropped home missionaries, re-establish the 544 closed stations, commission Sunday School missionaries, build the sanctuary of God, give the pastors adequate wages, and the spirit of the Lord will heal our sickness.

music was furnished by volunteer singers. The Church school session was shortened and the church service was made brief in order that those who wanted to hear a real sermon could do so in some other church. The success of the plan was due in large part to the detail with which each service was worked out by the committee in charge. The leader on each occasion was furnished with a complete order of the exercises. The attendance was about two-thirds of the usual winter congregation which is very good considering the large school population.

Dr. Stephenson Addresses Boston Ministers

Australia, Its Economic and Religious Conditions, was the special topic at the Boston Ministers' Meeting, Sept. 27, when Rev. A. R. Stephenson of Melbourne was the speaker. The audience was delighted by the interesting address filled with useful information and characterized throughout by keen wit and delicious humor. No man can know his own country, Dr. Stephenson said, who knows no other country. He said that after traveling in America, he should return better satisfied with Australian railroads but should agitate for better highways there.

Education is free and compulsory in Australia. No dismissal of teachers is possible except for incapacity or misconduct. Ministers of religion may voluntarily teach one period a week in the public schools. The citizen is the first care of the Australian government. Birth benefits are paid and from the kindergarten through college and university the government provides such personal aid as is needed and in old age pays a pension. There are no Sunday papers but the Saturday papers print sermons which are actually read. The Congregationalist is the only American paper, Dr. Stephenson thinks, which rises to the height of Australian journalism. Wealth is widely distributed. There are not many millionaires but the average wealth is £245. Australia sends to America greeting and craves America's help for clean politics, noble social aspirations, pure religion, international friendship, and the federation of the world.

From Palmer to Westboro

After a successful three years' pastorate at Palmer, Rev. E. L. Moses on Sept. 1 began work as pastor of EVANGELICAL, WESTBORO. While in Palmer Mr. and Mrs. Moses entered into the community life and gave efficient leadership and service in many departments of civic welfare. As chairman of the civics committee of the Palmer Woman's Club, Mrs. Moses initiated a movement that resulted in a playground association and the maintenance of playgrounds with expert supervision. She was secretary of the association and Mr. Moses was a director. Mrs. Moses as local secretary was also active in the Red Cross. Mr. Moses was scoutmaster of the community troop of Boy Scouts, and was president of the Music Students' Club. His increased salary and the receipt of substantial gifts indicate the esteem in which he was held. Noteworthy among these was a gift last Easter time of $250 equally subscribed by ten representative men of the town. At a parting reception gifts of appreciation were received from the choir, Young People's Society and Boy Scouts, and personal expressions of townspeople, including Roman Catholics, indicated deep regret at his departure.

Mr. and Mrs. Moses have three daughters. Mr. Moses is a graduate of Carleton College and Hartford Seminary and his other pastorates have been in Middleton, Mass., and Walla Walla, Wash., with a short period as field secretary of Carleton College.

Mr. Loud New Pastor of Hopkinton

After nearly four years at Wilmington, Rev. H. H. Loud began work Sept. 1 at HOPKINTON. During his pastorate at Wilmington 54 members were added to the church, the church reorganized according to the six-department plan of the National Council, a debt of $700 canceled, the Y. P. S. C. E. brought to a high state of efficiency, the apportionment met for the first time and $2,000 pledged toward a fund for a new organ and special repairs.

Mr. Loud received a $300 increase in salary and at Christmas and the time of his departure substantial gifts were received from the church. He has had pastorates at Taunton and Lynnfield, and at Hampstead, N. H., and Lead, S. D.

Installation of Dr. Jones at Beverly

The installation of Rev. W. E. Jones, Ph. D., as pastor of DANE ST., BEVERLY, Sept. 15, called together the entire sisterhood of the Essex South Association of Churches and Ministers, with several individuals. Rev. A. V. House served as moderator and Rev. T. C. Craig as scribe.

Dr. Jones gave a good account of himself in the text of the paper he presented, and in his replies to the many questions asked him. The council's approval was unanimous and hearty.

The church royally entertained the council and its choir and organist presented musical parts that were a real aid to worship.

Dr. F. E. Emrich's sermon was rich in spiritual and Scriptural quality. Fellowship and reminder were appropriately expressed by Rev. E. A. Chase, and Rev. W. H. Spence respectively in their messages to the candidate; and the church and congregation were reminded of their duty and opportunity toward their pastor, in an address by Dr. A. E. Holt, that was as full of good sense as it was of intelligent Scripture allusion. Dr. A. A. Madsen offered the installing prayer and other pastors lent assistance in carrying out an order of service that was most worthy to introduce officially a pastorate that has already shown achievement. Dr. Jones, the pastor, will have with him a strong church and a sympathetic and co-operative association of churches, in his service at Dane St.

Splendid Service for United, Newport

Rev. C. E. Silcox has closed a pastorate of six years with United, Newport, in which he was ordained. The added responsibilities have been fully met and strong pulpit utterances have been furnished. Mr. Silcox for six months added to his duties the associate religious and educational secretaryship of the Naval Y. M. C. A. His patriotic interest enabled him to bring to Newport many speakers of national reputation, thus making a positive contribution to the war-time morale of the community. He recently organized and developed a Music Club of which he became president. His ten sermons, "From War to Peace," were printed by request in full for gratuitous distribution and dealt thoroughly with essential questions of wealth, industry and internationalism.

Rev. Claris E. Silcox

Mr. Silcox's ancestors were pioneer English and Huguenot families of Canada, where his college degree was taken. After three years at Brown University in post-graduate work and in the secretaryship of the college Y. M. C. A., one year as pastor's assistant in Boston, and graduation from Andover Seminary, he became pastor of United in June, 1914.

New furnaces, repairs on windows, grading of lot, reorganized finances, individual communion cups, important organizations among the youth, and many substantial gains, leave ample evidence of his able and faithful pastorate. He carries to his pastorate at Fairfield, Ct., the affection and appreciation of his associates in the ministry of the city and state. G. A. B.

NEW JERSEY

Dr. Merrill Assumes Hackensack Pastorate

After two years of service as secretary of the Southeast District for the Home Missionary Society, Dr. G. R. Merrill has undertaken an interesting piece of pioneer work, as pastor of Hackensack. Ten years ago this church was a union mission in what was practically a rural territory. Within recent years Hackensack has grown rapidly and the Fairmount district in which the church is located has been filled with thriving middle-class American homes, served by no other religious organization of any kind. Two years ago the mission was organized as a full-fledged Congregational church. The abnormal conditions of the war have hitherto prevented any vigorous and constructive prosecution of the enterprise. But now with Dr. Merrill on the field, both pastor and people are looking forward to an era of community service on broad lines, and of solid as well as rapid church growth, which will mean much for the Kingdom of God in the great metropolitan section of Northern New Jersey.

GEORGIA

Mr. Merrill Leaves Central, Atlanta

The brief but successful pastorate of Rev. G. P. Merrill, with Central, Atlanta, closed last month, the pastor accepting a unanimous call to the pastorate of First, Alexander, Minn. Mr. Merrill found Central Church in a discouraged condition and left it stronger in numbers and enthusiasms, with greatly increased financial resources. He inspired the church with a new purpose to fulfill its great mission in Atlanta and the Southeast. He had the love and respect of every member of the church and his resignation was accepted only because he found it absolutely necessary to change climates.

The pastoral work of Mr. Merrill was exceptionally strong, his pulpit appeals spiritual, his ideals of what the church should be, high. He was an able and wise leader in the finances of the church. His prayer meetings were well attended because they were helpful. At a largly attended farewell meeting there were many beautiful expressions of appreciation of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Merrill and their ideal home life.

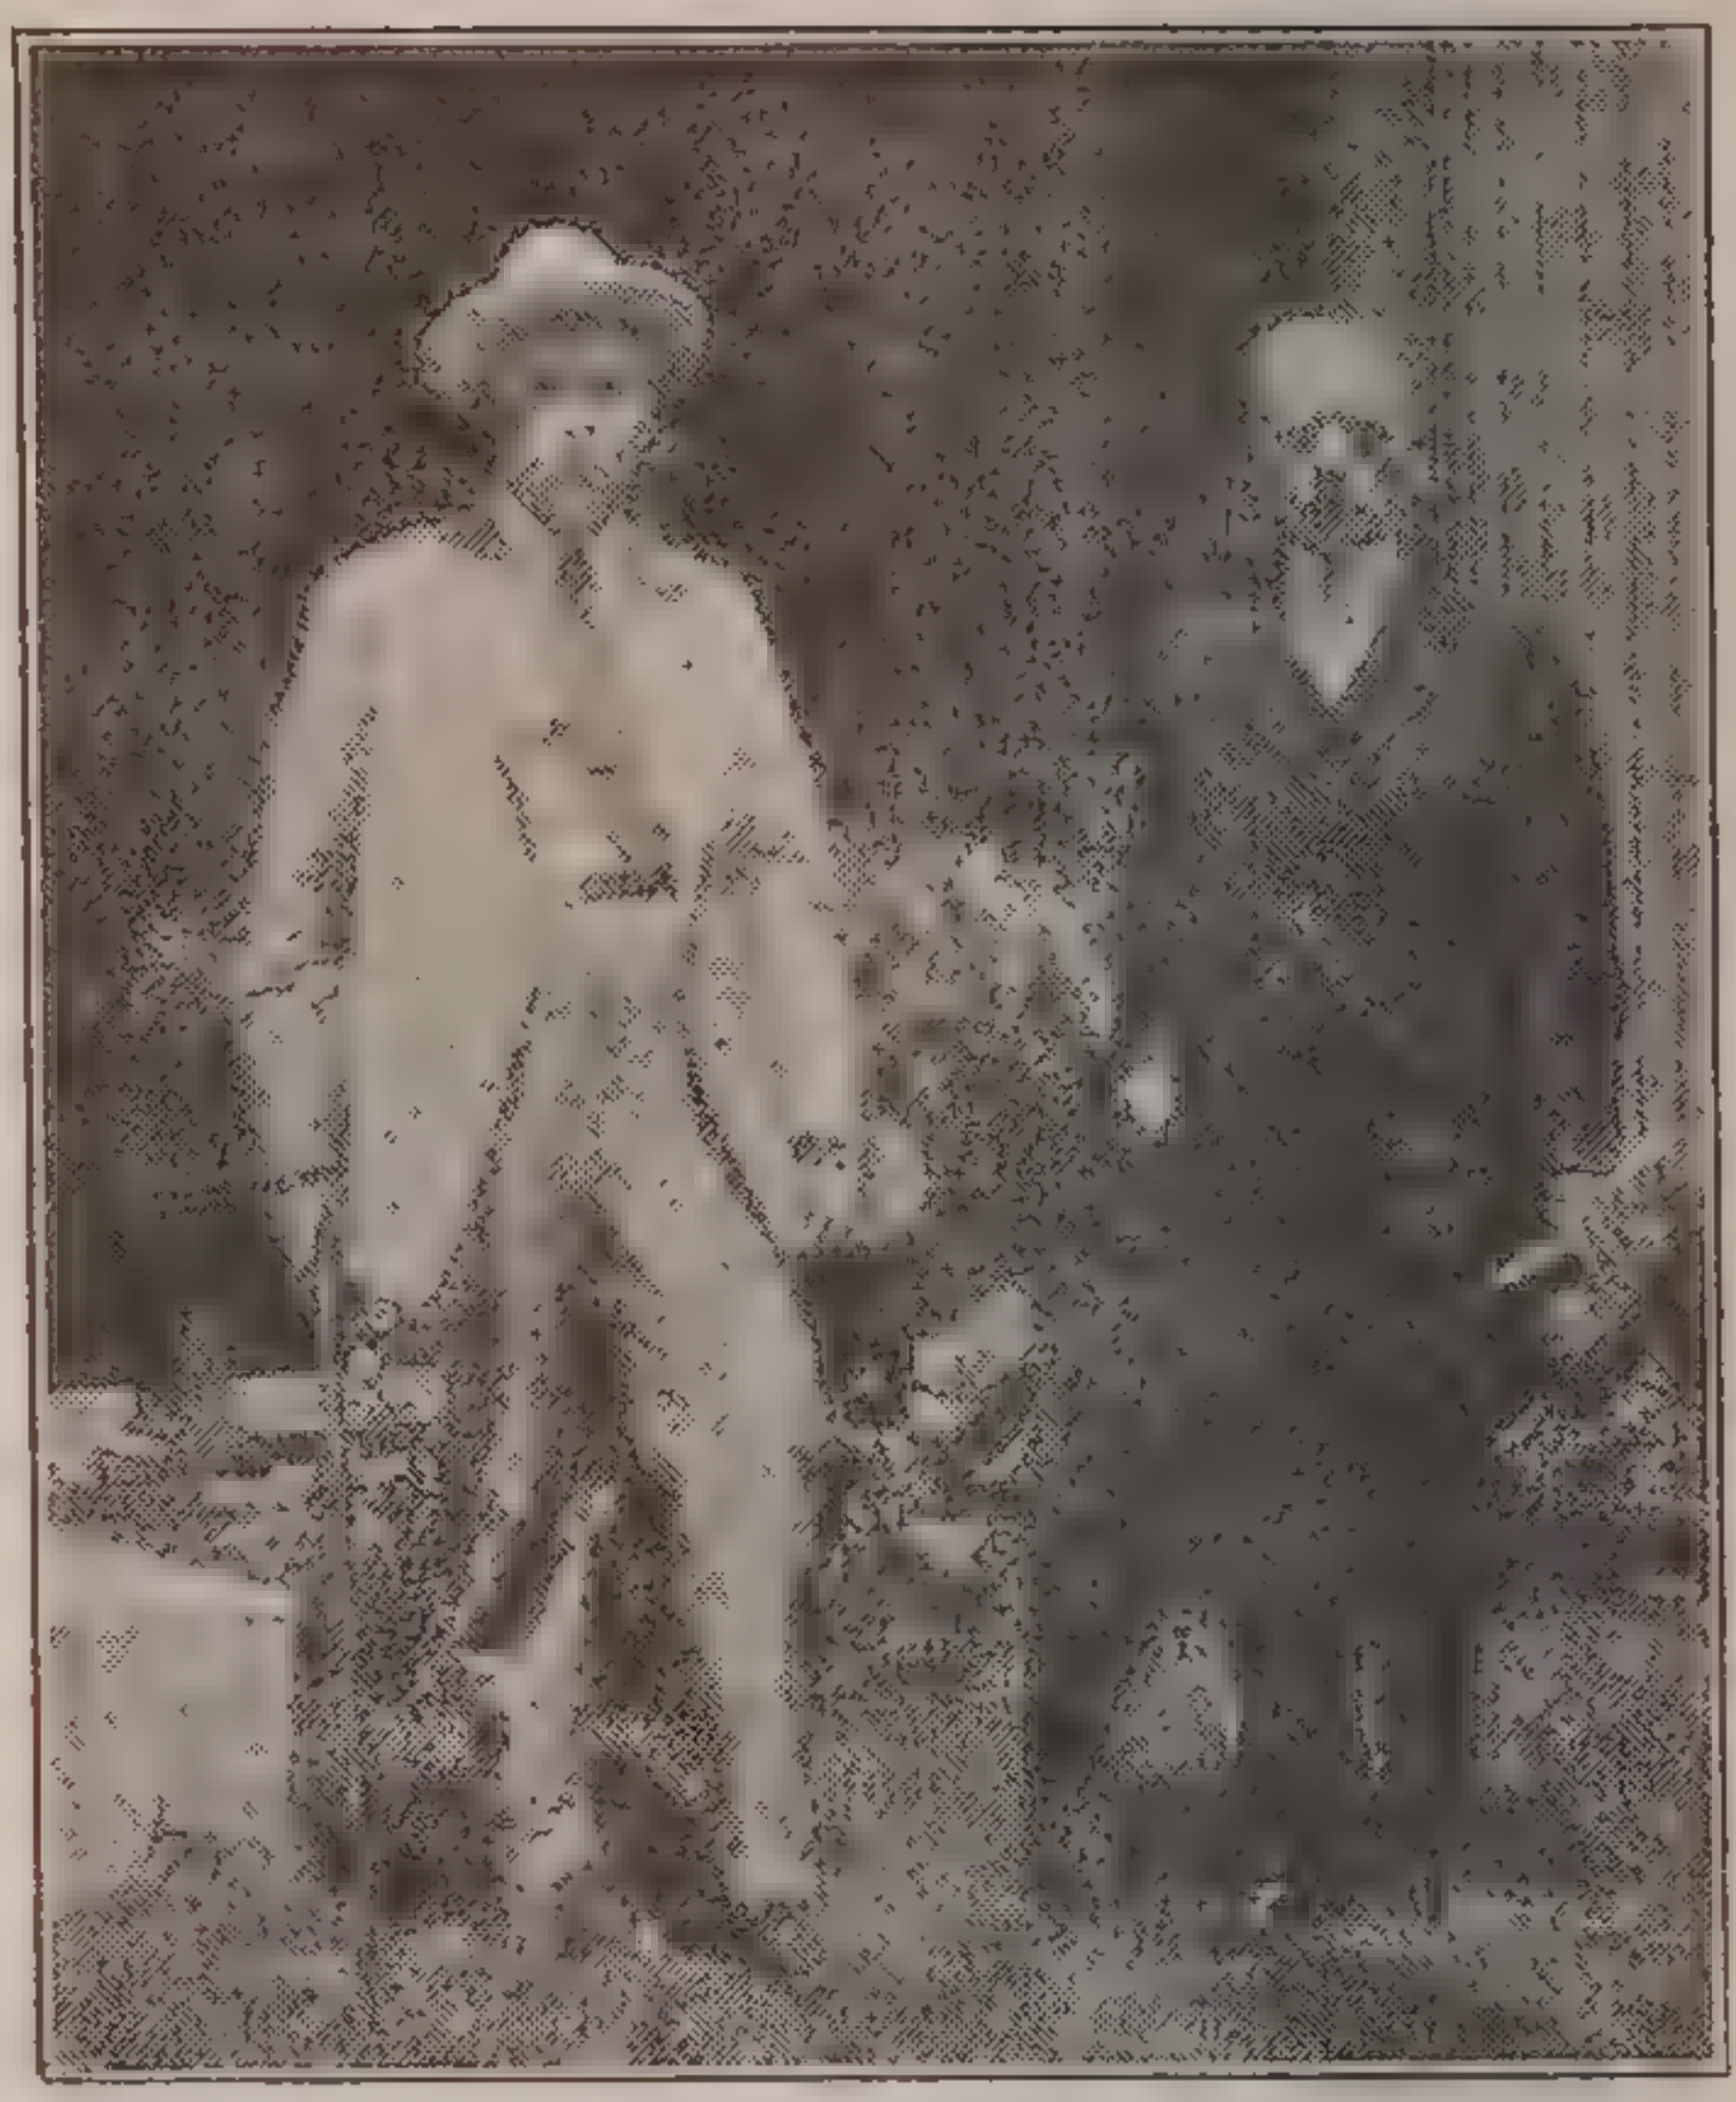
Many Years in Christian Service



COLONEL STEWARD AND DR. ABERNATHY

The men's class of PILGRIM, CHATTANOOGA, has the distinction of claiming among its membership two unusually interesting characters. Both of them were heroes of the Civil War. The gentleman standing to the left in the picture is Col. D. M. Steward, who is not only a member of the Pilgrim Church Men's Class, but is also Chaplain of the Tennessee Division of the Grand Army of the Republic. Colonel Steward proved himself a valiant soldier during the Civil War, entering the army as drillmaster for the Second Ohio Infantry of the Army of the Potomac. During his services in the Civil War, four bullet wounds and one crushed foot failed to put the Colonel out of business. Colonel Steward had the rare pleasure of meeting Pres. Abraham Lincoln personally, and stood by the side of General Grant at the Battle of Missionary Ridge.

Good American soldiers always make the best, the most enthusiastic and the most faithful soldiers for righteousness, and Colonel Steward, although now 78 years old, is rarely ever absent from the Men's Class of which he has been an active member since that church's organization. When the teacher of the men's class is unavoidably absent, Colonel Steward is always ready and willing to take his place, and his years of rich experience qualify him admirably for the place.

Dr. Y. L. Abernathy, who stands at the right in the picture, is 73 years old, and served in the Confederate Army during the Civil War, in the

Adequate Annuities for the Veterans

The Pilgrim Memorial Fund having been generously subscribed, the Trustees of The Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers ask for $100,000

To be used for the older men

WHY?

1. Because the entire net income of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund must be limited in its distribution as credit toward old age annuities to all members of The Annuity Fund. To divert it from the main objective in favor of the older men would leave the problem of protecting the minister's age still unsolved.
2. Because the provision of an adequate annuity requires payments over a series of years and those honored servants of our churches who are nearing sixty-five years of age will not be able to make the requisite accumulation in the comparatively short period of their payment.
3. Because the "accrued liabilities" to be met, if the full annuity in each case were to be provided, involve an amount vastly greater than the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, and impossible to secure.
4. Because the judicious distribution of this modest sum of $100,000 continued a few years, supplementing payments by the ministers and their churches, while not meeting these accrued liabilities in full, would enable many of these older men to provide an annuity approximately commensurate with what would have come to them if the plan had been inaugurated twenty years ago.
5. Because we owe this debt to those we now honor as veterans in the service of Christ and his church.

Charles S. Mills, D. D., General Secretary. William A. Rice, D. D., Associate Secretary.

This $100,000 is a part of the budget of the Congregational World Movement.

First Tennessee Cavalry, taking active part in the engagements in Kentucky and Eastern Tennessee. Dr. Abernathy is now surgeon for the N. B. Forrest Camp, which carries the rank of captain. Like Colonel Steward, Dr. Abernathy is still an active man and is a regular attendant, and takes an active part in the discussions of the Men's Class of Pilgrim Church. While Colonel Steward and Dr. Abernathy fought on opposing sides during the Civil War, they have for many years been fighting side by side as valiant soldiers for Jesus Christ, and although these two men have grown old in years, they believe in the progression of the churches—that they should meet the present day needs of the human family.

Kenosha Undergoes Redecoration

During August the trustees of KENOSHA, Rev. H. T. Sell, pastor, redecorated the church auditorium and did much other work to get the church plant into better shape. Last year the large assembly room and the dining room were redecorated. Inside and outside, the church now presents a fine appearance. About 80 new members have been received into fellowship during the last 18 months.

MINNESOTA

Appropiates More Money for Missions

FAIRMONT, Rev. L. M. Pierce, pastor, has had a steady advancement in the work of the church during the past year. Up to Aug. 1, 55 were received into fellowship, many of them heads of families and among the best citizens of the community. The church has accepted an increase of $1,000 on its missionary apportionment. A Christian Endeavor Society has been organized. There has been increased interest in the Sunday school on the part of the adult membership of the church and the men have become especially active in the men's forum. Present plans include the securing of a new parsonage in the near future. The membership of the church is now more than 300.

NEBRASKA

New Associate State Superintendent

Rev. W. A. Tyler of Crete has been elected by the State Conference Board to the newly created position of Associate Superintendent with Rev. S. I. Hanford. He has accepted and has moved to the headquarters at Lincoln.

Besides general cooperation with the Superintendent, Dr. Tyler will have definite responsibility for leadership in the Congregational World Movement in the state, and also for securing pastors for the churches.

Dr. Tyler is well fitted for this important position. He knows Nebraska, having lived in the state 25 years; he is also well acquainted with the problems of the church, having spent 22 years in the pastorate. He has served both small and large churches. He comes to his new work from a seven-year pastorate at Crete, which is closely connected with Doane College.

Dr. Tyler has always been active in state work. At present he is Chairman of the Commission on Religious Education and Young People's Work and is a trustee of Doane College Dr. Tyler's activity in the interest of the Christian World Movement last spring clearly demonstrated his special fitness for leadership.

MONTANA

Committee of Five Heads Broadview Church

COMMUNITY, BROADVIEW, has lately completed a period of six months under the efficient leadership of a committee of five while without a pastor. Each member of the committee was chairman of a sub-committee: Public Services, Membership and Publicity, Care of Building, Social Life, and Finance. The Church school has more than doubled its average attendance even through the summer and a large adult class has been carried on. Two public services a month have been conducted by local talent, and two by invited ministers. The church has been financed by subscriptions and a balance is left in the treasury after paying the full missionary apportionment. The interior of the church has been redecorated. Four socials have been held without charge to the guests or to the church treasury. A new committee of five has been elected to carry forward the arrangement and to secure a new pastor as soon as feasible.

CALIFORNIA

Pico Heights Church Rebuilt

A joyous sequel to the disastrous fire of July, 1919, occurred on Sept. 12, 1920, when the rebuilt PICO HEIGHTS, LOS ANGELES, was dedicated. The former edifice was ruthlessly and maliciously destroyed. Incendiary crime was believed to be part of the vengeance wrought by the criminal against whom the pastor, Rev. J. M. Schaefle, testified in a notable trial in Los Angeles. About the same time the home of Hon. Oscar Lawler, prosecuting attorney, was destroyed and his own life almost lost as a result. Because of the history of the destruction, more than usual interest was attached to the rebuilding of the new edifice.

New Pico Heights Church

With his characteristic perseverance and faithfulness, the pastor has labored these many months in raising funds and directing the work of construction. The attractive and commodious building constitutes a reward for his labors and the hearty congratulations of his many friends in Southern California added to his happiness on the eventful day of dedication.

Mr. Schaefle is unique in his record of the longest pastorate in this Conference, having served Pico Heights for 30 years.

Three dedicatory services were held Sept. 12, the formal act of dedication occurring in the morning, the afternoon being a musical and fellowship service and the evening a gathering of a more civic nature. Superintendent Kenngott presided at all three services. The pastor preached the sermon in the morning and at the evening service Dr. A. C. Smither, D. D., a former pastor of the Christian Church in the Pico Heights community, preached the sermon. In the evening, also, words of greeting and congratulation were brought by Hon. Oscar Lawler, Judge Lewis Myers, who tried the suit which was the underlying cause of the disaster, and ministers of other fellowships in the city.

About $4,200 was raised during the three services on Sunday, leaving an indebtedness of only $2,000 on the property. This does not include any aid from the Building Society, so that if a grant is made from that organization the plant will be entirely free of debt.

Second Church is now worshiping in the ballroom of the Hotel Nonotuck because the burned church has not yet been rebuilt and this is where Mr. Wicks is now preaching after his long absence from the pulpit.

Jesus would have us devote our lives to high service of all mankind in his name, and to allegiance to his kingdom. There are many today who put allegiance to their country or race above allegiance to humanity, which is his kingdom. But Christ took no thought of self. He never worried about defending himself. His chief allegiance was not to Jerusalem nor to the Jewish race. His only thought was the service of his brothers. His chief allegiance was to humanity. Above all nations was the kingdom. Surely he would have us follow him in a self-forgetful service. Surely he would have us love his kingdom first. What an opportunity to all brave souls to do what Christ would have us do!—Frederick Lynch.

Dr. Frank Crane says:
"The most essential element in any home is God, but we are willing to do almost anything for God except to use him. Yet the thought of God is the most practical of all thoughts. It solves problems, eases loads, unties hard knots, smooths out complications. The God thought is the most deeply educational for children. Plan your day so that you will have a little while with God. Once in twenty-four hours reach up and touch the Infinite. It is well to do this alone. It is better to do this with your family."
EVERY MORNING by Robert Cluett
Former President of Cluett, Peabody & Co.
EVERY MORNING is a new "Home Religion" book—for individual or family devotional use. There is a prayer a day for three months, in harmony with the Bible reading for that day. Not more than five minutes is required for each reading and prayer. The choice of topics is a happy one; their arrangement offers a pleasing variety; the prayers are of a high order. Each page of Every Morning is printed in large size, easily read type.
Mr. Cluett, a citizen of Troy, N. Y., has long been a leader in civic, religious, and philanthropic work. He is an elder of the Presbyterian Church, for many years was Superintendent of a Sunday School, and Teacher of an adult Bible Class. He has prepared this book of morning devotions with a degree of care and a knowledge of the use of Bible truths which warms the heart and quickens response.

BOWERS—Melvina E. Bowers, widow of Rev. Albert Bowers, and mother of Roy E. and Berta H. Bowers, died at the home of her son in Lakewood, O., Sept. 14, aged 80 years, eight months and 24 days. Burial beside her husband at Ashland, O.

CRAFTS—Mrs. Harriet Hale Crafts, wife of Harry G. Crafts, daughter of the late Rev. John Gardner Hale, and sister of Rev. Edson D. Hale, died at her home in Oakland, Cal., Sept. 17, aged 66 years. Mrs. Crafts was a talented musician and a devoted Christian wife and mother, and will be greatly missed in a wide circle of friends.

REV. DAVID R. ANDERSON

After a brief illness Rev. David R. Anderson died in Kenosha, Wis., Sept. 12. He would have been 80 years of age had he lived until Sept. 16. Mr. Anderson was ordained in 1876. For 40 years he served in the Congregational ministry, most of the time in Wisconsin pastorates. He had two pastorates with Oconomowoc, covering over 10 years and also held pastorates at Oak Creek, now South Milwaukee, First, Racine, Elkhorn, Second, Eau Claire, Shullsburg, Peshtigo, Two Rivers, Randolph, and with the Bristol and Paris church.

Mr. Anderson was remarkably cheerful and kindly; he was a manly, courteous Christian. Because of his brotherly consideration of others he was always surrounded by a multitude of warm friends.

MADAM BLAISDELL

A singularly beautiful and useful life came to its close in the passing on of Mrs. Susan Allen Blaisdell, widely and lovingly known, especially by two Christian college constituencies, Beloit, Wis., and Claremont, Cal., as Madam Blaisdell.

Her whole life furnished a rich background for the wonderfully interesting and impressive personality which she maintained to the last. Born in Lebanon, N. H., March 22, 1828, when few young women had the advantages of higher education, as a girl she was eager for the best, and was graduated from Mt. Holyoke College in 1847, under the direction of the great educator, Mary Lyon. She married Rev. James J. Blaisdell, a pastor in Cincinnati, O., but soon went to the growing young college at Beloit, where for 40 years they exerted a most beneficent influence, through the college and its ever-widening body of alumni. After the death of Dr. Blaisdell in 1896, her influence continued, through her home with her son, Dr. James A. Blaisdell. When he became President of Pomona College ten years ago, she entered with enthusiasm and rare charm into the new circle of friends in California.

When 89 years old, Madam Blaisdell attended the 70th anniversary of the graduation of her college class, her presence attracting much attention because of her youthful enthusiasm in the young life of the time.

Remarkable physical strength was retained by Madam Blaisdell until a fall caused a broken hip about a year ago, by which she was confined to the house. But her room became a sanctuary to many friends, where she still shed radiance by winsome words, rare humor at times, and the never-to-be-forgotten smile. After a few days of sinking, the end came on Sept. 13. A beautiful memorial service was held in Bridges Hall of Music, conducted by Dr. Henry Kingman. Dr. J. D. Eaton paid a tribute to the hallowed memory of Dr. and Mrs. Blaisdell, as related to his college days at Beloit in the sixties; and Prof. Victor E. Marriott recalled the later influence of Madam Blaisdell on the college community, in the home of her son, Dr. Blaisdell, in Beloit and Claremont. As the large company of choice friends, on leaving the hall, looked up at the lofty Sierra Madre Mountains towering above the beautiful Pomona campus, as they glowed in the setting sun, there seemed to be the sense of a joyful translation and the continuation of a triumphant life.

Madam Blaisdell's body will rest beside that of her honored husband, at Beloit, Wis. W. E.

REV. JAMES KIRK KIRKER

Called suddenly into the larger life as the result of an accident, James Kirk Kirker passed on into the other part of the Father's universe. Above all other things he was "a good minister of Jesus Christ." A graduate of Olivet College and Oberlin Seminary, he set his face steadfastly toward the foreign field. Such service being denied him, following summer student service during his theological course, he entered home missionary work in North Dakota immediately after graduation from Oberlin in 1907. In this capacity he did heroic work, caring for a number of small churches and preaching points. Following such service Mr. Kirker became pastor of a self-supporting church in a growing center in the same state, building up a strong parish and entering fully into the Congregational interests of the entire state.

In 1916 so as to be near his aged parents, Mr. Kirker accepted a call to Michigan, where in 1919, while in the midst of a happy pastorate, he was faced with a call to return to North Dakota and become one of the field workers of the Home Missionary Society and Sunday School Extension Society. It was a difficult matter to decide, but for him life spelled opportunity, and he decided that the highest purpose of his being called for a missionary consecration that meant devoting his life to field service in the state where he entered the ministry of the Gospel.

The end that came so suddenly means the closing of life while comparatively young.

In recognition of the life and service of the departed the Church Extension Boards passed the following vote:

That the members of the Executive Committee have heard with deep sorrow of the sudden death of Rev. James Kirk Kirker of North Dakota and desire to express their sympathy with Mrs. Kirker and the other members of the family, in the sad loss that has come to them; praying that the Heavenly Father's presence may be near to them during these days of loneliness.

As a Home Missionary Pastor, following his student days; as a minister identified with our Congregational work in a large and vital way;

Why is it that

Hymns of the Centuries

is used in hundreds of satisfied churches?

Because:

1. All the best of the old favorites are there, set to the right tunes.
2. The new hymns easily sing themselves into the hearts of the people.
3. The words are printed within the staff.
4. Each selection for Responsive Reading occupies one page and one only.

REV. CHARLES A. WHITE

Rev. Charles A. White, who died at his daughter's home in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Sunday, Sept. 5, was born in Wardsboro, Vt., Nov. 2, 1842. He joined the Congregational church at the age of seventeen, as the result of a deep religious experience which led him to decide upon the work of the Christian ministry. He responded to his country's call and enlisted in the Fourth Vermont Volunteer Regiment, from which he was honorably discharged on account of illness after nearly eighteen months' of service. As soon as he had recovered enough health to study he began to prepare himself for college, first at Leland and Gray Seminary, Townsend, Vt., then at Monson (Mass.) Academy, from which he graduated in 1866. In the following autumn he entered Williams College and graduated with the A. B. degree in 1870. He was president of his class throughout his college life. He was a stanch witness for Christ in college and with Rev. Burke Leavitt were the founders of the mission school which developed into the White Oaks Church. The following three years he spent at Andover Theological Seminary and was then pastor of the Congregational churches at successively, Templeton, Mass., Palmer, Mass., Hallowell, Me., Mechanics Falls, Me., and Princeton, Mass. This last pastorate included the charge of the East Princeton branch and consumed his devoted energies for nearly eighteen years. With advancing years he finally found this double charge too arduous and was obliged to resign it. After a few months rest, however, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian church at Milford, Pa., of which he remained the active pastor for seven more years of service, and the beloved pastor emeritus to the end of his life.

In June, 1873, Mr. White married Anna W. Nichols, who, with three out of the five children born to them, survive him. His married life for its more than forty-seven years was a singularly happy and hallowed example of the blending of two kindred souls in a common dedication to their Master. Mr. White, though a man of rare intellectual gifts, was to a peculiar degree free from worldly ambitions and desire of personal success. On account of the frail health of his wife he preferred to give his life to the service of country churches, where he was untiring in his loving devotion to the interests of each individual member of his flock. His former parishioners feel his passing from this life as a deep personal loss. His rare spirituality and sweetness of soul were so reflected in his face that a member of one of his parishes once said, "I never pass him on the street or see him smile without wanting to be a better man." His last coherent words were, "Jesus is mine and I am his." Those who stood by his bedside as he breathed his last, on a Sunday morning as the church bells were calling to service, said, "There is no death here."

OUR READERS' FORUM

The President's Proclamation

Dear Mr. Editor:

Is the United States of America a Godless nation? Is there any reference to God in the League of Nations? Or in the arguments for and against the same? I think I have once seen such a reference.

Was ever before such a proclamation by a President as that in The Congregationalist of Sept. 2, 1920, calling for a "special patriotic celebration" of the landing of these hardy and adventurous navigators and colonists," etc., utterly ignoring the one great purpose of those Pilgrim Fathers?

Alas for us as a nation or as individuals if we accept such a proclamation without protest against the utter godliness therein shown and advocated. K. A. M.

To Get or To Give—Which?

Dear Mr. Editor:

The article entitled "A Story and a Question," by Winfred Rhoades in the Congregationalist and Advance for Sept. 9 has aroused my interest.

I agree with Mr. Rhoades that the church is the place to have one's soul fed. It is the only institution dedicated to that purpose. I also agree that much church energy is spent in doing things which are of less importance than many things left undone. His criticism is thus far commendable.

Nevertheless, I think Mr. Rhoades' criticism is not justified. After all, what constitutes the church? Is it the building? Is it the minister? Is it the choir? No! It is the man in the pew. If the man in the pew constantly comes to church to get something, who is to give? Souls are not fed by absorbing spiritual energy. Spiritual growth comes by expression, not by impression. The man who comes to church to get something, is likely to be disappointed. The man who comes to church to give of himself is much more likely to have his soul fed.

The church is more than an institution which you attend once a week for your own spiritual growth. It is an institution through which you may serve the community. This is done, not by looking for something to get, it is done by entering heart and soul in devotion to God and by strengthening others. "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

If people do not go to church because their souls are not fed it is because they have not learned to feed others. Let him who has recovered from several months' sickness rejoice in his recovery and go out to strengthen others less fortunate than himself. He shall then have his soul fed, but it will be by feeding the souls of others. "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

WOMEN'S INTERESTS

The Old People in Our Homes

By Julia W. Wolfe

Nothing is more pathetic than the aged, who, having given the best of themselves to others, find themselves neglected at the journey's end. To those of us who have with us still the mother who has been our ever-present help in time of trouble, life has been good, and it is not possible for us to pay the debt.

We cannot be too tender of our loved ones when they have reached their declining years. Nothing is so hard as to feel oneself no longer of use in the work of the world after having lived a life filled with duties. Sometimes the feeling that they are no longer young reacts upon them in such a way as to make them most unhappy. We cannot give them back their strength, or youth, their vigor of mind or of body, but we can give them love, we can give them care and comfort, we can make them feel that they are dear to us. A woman who has a large family and many duties in speaking of her mother, who is nearly eighty years of age, said: "It is only recently that I have realized that my mother needs duties, just as I do, to make her happy. I used to find much fault with her because she was so constantly 'puttering about,' making work for herself and tiring herself out unnecessarily. But I have found that she is happier if she has something that she feels that she must do.

"I think my young daughter made the discovery for me. She is very tender of her grandmother and she found that she liked to run the ribbon in her lingerie. She always praised her grandmother for all the little things she did.

"Then one day she taught her grandmother to make mayonnaise and now whenever we have salad my mother makes the dressing. There are many things of this kind that any elderly person who is really well can do and will enjoy doing if appreciation is expressed. But unless we can give our appreciation for these tasks there will be no joy in the doing of them. For it is not because we want to get the work accomplished in this way but because we want to furnish pleasant employment for the busy hands that would otherwise be idle and restless."

But it is not what we do for our loved ones so much as how we do it—the spirit that is back of it. If we are actuated by love we may be very sure that we shall save them from much unhappiness. But if we do not put love and sympathy into their lives we cannot hope to make them happy.

Object for Intercession

For Lamed and Crippled Souls:

Lord, remember those who have passed through difficult places and who bear the marks of hard and disabling experience. Bless them with courage, both to endure and to go on. Stand at their side in all privations and go with them as they creep or hobble along their appointed way of pilgrimage. Assure those who reproach themselves with the thought that their troubles are the fruit of their own faults both of thy forgiveness and thy love. And may those who suffer from the faults of others be kept from all bitterness of heart. So turn all trial unto good and bring thy kingdom in. In the name of Christ.—R.

Tercentenary Correspondence Course

The granting of diplomas at the International Council to a large number of graduates of the Tercentenary Correspondence Course did not mark the termination of its work. Three hundred others, in different sections of the country, have done part of the work and as fast as they complete it, diplomas will be issued to them, to be presented in an appropriate manner at some service of the local church. In some cases the presentation will occur undoubtedly in connection with the Pilgrim celebrations this fall and winter.

The course is also open to those who wish to begin now. "Pilgrim Deeds and Duties," used as a textbook basis for the course, can be purchased from the Pilgrim Press. The Bulletins, containing the questions and supplementary information, can be obtained at three cents apiece form the chairman, at the address given below. He will also send questions for the examination and issue the certificates and diplomas, duly signed by officers of the National Council.

Chairman Correspondence Course Committee,

Dicky-bird and the Student

self immensely: he didn't know why. At last a sudden turn brought them on a vista of autumn landscape, corn-stacked fields, stretches of woodland, and beyond, blue, blue hill lines against the sky. The student stopped, threw back her head a little, drew a deep breath, and smiled.

"Oh, isn't it nice?" she said. "Aren't you glad we came?"

"Yes," said Dicky-bird. "Let's play babes in the wood; there's lots of leaves."

"Let's!" cried the student.

They turned from the road into the woods for a romp. They were the babes, the wicked murderers, the kindly robins, by turns, then they forgot the game in rolling over and over in the crisp brown leaves. Then, Dicky-bird, sitting in a piles of leaves, tousled and breathless and bright eyed, said suddenly:

"I was awful cross when we started."

"So was I," said the student.

Dicky-bird came a little nearer. "I like to play with you," he said. "Say, will you be my sister, if I ask my mother may you?"

"I'll have to ask my brother may I."

"'Cause he wants to play with you himself?"

"No, he doesn't want to play with me," said the student, suddenly gloomy again. She shook the leaves from her skirt. "We must go home now," she said.

The walk home was almost as silent as the other, only it was different, because now the student carried her hockey stick over one shoulder, and with the other hand grasped Dicky-bird's dirty little paw. On their way they made a circuit around by the village, stopping at Ebhart's to buy chestnuts and sweet chocolate. Arriving at Dicky's house they sat out on his steep piazza, tapping their heels against the lattice work while they ate.

Dicky-bird's little brain was still over busy. "I want you for my sister," he said, with emphasis, "I think you'd be most as nice as a muvver. But muvvers are nicest—muvvers—muvvers—" he was plainly struggling with his thought.

"Mothers understand boys?" suggested the student.

Dicky-bird beamed at her penetration. "Yes," he cried. "Do sisters understand boys?"

"I don't know," then gazing down at his intent little face, she added, "I think perhaps sisters could understand boys—if they wanted to—I think perhaps sisters can understand boys."

She jumped down lightly. "I must go home," she said; "I must write a letter to my brother."

"To ask him may you be my sister?"

"To ask him if he wants to play with me himself."

This was the letter Jean mailed that evening:

"Dearest Bobs boy: You do not mind my calling you mother's name for you? For you and I are going to understand each other. I think sisters can understand boys if they want to.

"You have a right to do as you please with your vacations. Never mind about my 'services.' Let's forget we talked like that. I don't want to give a boy things he wants just to make him do something I want.

"I'm a little afraid to suggest it—only you always have wanted me along—should I be very much in your way if I went with you to Cousin James'? You know I'm as tough to stand cold air and exercise as you are. May I go with you, and will you teach me to ski?

"You must come Thanksgiving. I want you to come and play with me. I'll let you play the way you want to. I won't bovver you.

"This letter is largely quotation; I'll explain at Thanksgiving. It is nineteen days until then.

"Always your loving,

"Twinnie."

Beginning of Anti-Saloon League

Dear Mr. Editor:

I note on page 60 of "The Handbook for 1920," this statement: "A Congregational minister, Dr. Russell, started that organization, etc." Without any desire to deflect the honor which has been ascribed to Ohio as the pioneer state in the Anti-Saloon League movement and certainly without any disposition to deflect from the just credit due to Dr. Russell in the whole after development, if you have interest in the real beginning of this instrumentality for the suppression of the saloon, I shall be glad to supply you with the documentary evidence that shows that Ohio, months if not more than a year after, adopted the plan of operation and organization which was in existence and operative in Massachusetts early in 1892 as The Massachusetts Anti-Saloon League, with Dr. A. H. Plumb as its secretary.

Of course, it does not matter much where the League began its great career nor by whom it was first promoted. The historical fact is as I have stated and I should be glad to supply the data referred to if you cared to avail of it.

A Birmingham mother, according to the Age-Herald, noted that her little Johnnie got through his bed-time prayer quickly and inquired about it. "Well, ma," he said, "it's this way. I didn't say the whole prayer, I got tired of using the same one over and over again, so I just said, 'God, you remember what I told you last night, Amen.'"

The meeting was interrupted by the entrance of one who made his way to the platform and whispered excitedly to the chairman. "Is Mr. Smith in the audience?" broke forth the presiding officer. "I am informed that his house is afire." Forty men sprang to their feet. "It is the house of Mr. John Smith," added the chairman. "Thank goodness!" fervently exclaimed one man, resuming his seat.—Everybody's Magazine.

A little Scotch lad greatly coveted a fine Jersey cow belonging to the minister of the local church.

"Do you believe in prayer?" said the good little boy to the minister.

"Most certainly I do," was the reply.

"But," insisted the questioner, "do you believe if I prayed hard enough God would give me a cow like yours?"

"Certainly, if you had equally good reasons for possessing a cow, and your faith was sufficiently strong."

"Then," came the immediate rejoinder, "you give me your cow, and you pray for another."—Success.

The Layman's Creed

I believe in the Church of Christ and in my particular church.

I believe that organized religion must have and hold its vital place in the affairs of men, else the people perish.

I believe that responsibilities of service attach to every religious man, and that the Church democratic is kept strong and efficient by the labors of many.

I believe that service at its best cannot be delegated, but is personal and immediate.

I realize that I should co-operate with my fellows in translating the Sermon on the Mount into good deeds for home and humanity.

I am persuaded that the opportunity close at hand is my opportunity.

My church offers me work to do. I cannot be indifferent to the call.

Feeling thus, I gladly choose my part and carry on.—George Rugg.

Another Pilgrim Tercentenary Gathering

The Congress of Religious Liberals

By Harry Foster Burns

The Pilgrim Tercentenary Meeting of the International Congress of Free Christians and Other Religious Liberals, held in Boston last week, proved a noteworthy gathering. This Congress had its origin in Boston about twenty years ago, under the leadership of men of this vicinity. Its second meeting was held in London. Its sessions were interrupted by the world war, but it very appropriately resumes its work in this Tercentenary year, and in the place of its birth, with the prospect of the next being again in London.

At the opening session a clear, strong prophetic note was sounded by two eminent speakers, Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, minister of Union Congregational Church, Brighton, England; and Dr. Samuel M. Crothers, Unitarian Church, Cambridge, Mass. "Religious Independency and Its Place in a Reconstructing World," was the theme to which Mr. Williams spoke with such power that, when he had finished, the chairman, Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, said, "Brethren of the Ministry, that is what I call great preaching." And so it was.

The address called for a modified glorification of the Pilgrims, who while they contended for religious liberty for themselves did not grant the same liberty to those who in turn dissented from the dissenters. Nevertheless, their achievement of freedom, in certain particulars, gave warrant and encouragement to others who asked for freedom at certain other points. And the speaker urged the need of that recognition of the principle of liberty in our attitude, if we would worthily commemorate the Pilgrim Fathers; calling attention to the fact that some who glorify the Pilgrims deny the right of freedom of thought in the field of religious interpretation; acquiesce in a governmental policy which keeps in prison men who at the command of conscience resisted the policy of their country during the war; and further complacently accept the limitations of speech determined by fear, and enforced by violence.

The speaker gave a splendid illustration of the function of preaching in his own setting forth of the primary truth, that in the conduct of the world, the man who is loyal to a few fundamental moral ideals, is a safer guide than the men who may be admitted to know more of the facts, but whose judgments are not guided by fidelity to these primary moral principles. We need to know the facts, but we need still more the will to do the right which the facts reveal, and to create that will in the hearts of men is the primary business of the preacher.

How well this eminent English preacher is doing that very work in his parish in Brighton, the writer who was privileged to occupy that pulpit one Sunday last August would like to witness. On the question of the League of Nations, for instance, in the Union Congregational Church there is enthusiasm for the ideal and an organization of four hundred persons studying the problem, with the purpose of serving the ideal. Outside Union Church, there is in Brighton but little enthusiasm for the cause.

Dr. Crothers clearly faced the crisis which is felt to be upon the Church and our civilization, and contended that the work of the liberal Christian, who believes that the world needs remaking, is neither with the program of the reactionary, nor yet with the radical. And the position of the religious liberal must be like that of the wise physician pointing out the ways in which business organizations and political institutions should mend their doings in order that they shall recover from their present serious illness. Here, again, was the clear indication of the direction the free churches must take in this day of world sickness.

Dr. Francis G. Peabody gave a characteristically thoughtful and discriminating address on "The Free Churches and the Task of Social Betterment." In this he called attention to the need of true democracy which is an attitude of the heart, rather than any form of organization. And he claimed that in the organization of labor today, as it gains political power, we are but exchanging one autocratic rule for another. Here again, was the call to the Church to plant democracy as a principle of life in the very hearts of men and women.

Hundreds of ministers and laymen journeyed to Plymouth, Mass., where in the old First Church (the Church of Scrooby, Leyden, and the Mayflower) a memorable communion service was held, in which these leaders of thought, and men of large affairs feeling the urgent need of our time, consecrated themselves anew to the ideals and the spirit of the Pilgrim Fathers who in simple devotion to the truth which God caused to break forth from his word, laid foundations of church and state, and builded more wisely than they knew. Out of such meetings for thought and prayer may we not hope for a rekindling of the fire of religious devotion and burning enthusiasms presaging a new world?

Two speakers Tuesday evening, in the church where a hundred years ago William Ellery Channing ministered, brought prophetic messages not unlike those which a century ago made this pulpit noted. Dr. A. C. McGiffert, of Union Theological Seminary, and Prof. Kirsopp Lake, of Harvard University, spoke on: "The Churches and the Task of a Prophetic Era." The burden of Dr. McGiffert's theme was the need of a Christian ideal that calls not for self-development, alone, but a Christianizing of the world, which ideal must lead to a closer and closer co-operation of denominations, and between nations. He called for such a reinterpretation of the doctrine of individual salvation as will include social salvation, and such reinterpretations of Americanism as will include internationalism.

Professor Lake, after calling attention to the fact that the most notable thing about the work of the Pilgrims was that it "lasted," said that the question is whether we are doing anything in the churches now that will last even half of three hundred years. People formerly went to church to gain heaven or escape hell. Now they know that most of us are "mixtures," partly worthy of continuation, and partly deserving of elimination. And it is the irony of history that the churches which have contributed most to this advance in thought should suffer most in lack of attendance. If they would continue they must make it clear that they have something to teach about life which will make it better here. This something Professor Lake found in the idea of the sovereignty of God, or the Ultimate Reality, with which the lives of men and nations must square, if they are to continue. He denied that this is a prophetic era, but rather one that calls for the prophet, whose experience ever is to be stoned, and in the next generation exalted. Claiming that the churches had laid aside their Christianity for a time in their espousal of the war, he declared that the people outside the churches whom we need to reach would not for some time forget this period of denudation.

It is helpful to sit in the councils where these crucial issues of our faith are faced honestly and fearlessly. It may fairly be said that the liberal churches have evidently arrived at the place where they are beginning to see that their right to exist, their power to continue, their worth to the world, depends upon their ability to make it clear that implied in religious faith is a view of life which can not be fulfilled without a thorough remaking of the world of practical interests, and their willingness to bear the cross which is always the portion of the bearer of a prophetic message

Wets Attempt to Nullify Prohibition

During the last session of the Massachusetts state legislature the liquor interests, aided by the Federation of Labor, filed an initiative petition containing the names of 20,000 voters asking for the enactment by the legislature of what became known as the 2.75 per cent. beer bill. This measure was passed but on May 6, was vetoed by Governor Coolidge.

In his veto message, the Governor characterized this measure as "legislative deception," and refused to jeopardize his oath of office by signing it. He asserted that it did not even pretend to be an act to enforce the 18th Amendment and asked, "Can Massachusetts afford to take any position which may turn out to be, which can anywhere be interpreted to be, an act of nullification?"

Governor Coolidge's ringing message clarified the atmosphere and the Massachusetts Senate voted to sustain the Governor's veto. The wets at the proper time filed a supplementary petition and the question of enacting the 2.75 per cent. beer bill will be found on the ballot at the November election. It is the identical bill which Governor Coolidge vetoed.

If this bill became law it would be unconstitutional and invalid. The Federal law is the supreme law of the land and the only possible reason the proponents of this measure can have for seeking its enactment is to create legal confusion and make it appear that Massachusetts does not approve of National Prohibition even although the legislature ratified the 18th Amendment by an overwhelming vote.

Clearly the issue is one of law and order. Every voter will be called upon either to sustain the Governor's veto or to favor legislation which places Massachusetts in the position of seeking to nullify, even to defy the Federal law.

The recently enfranchised women will have a splendid opportunity to help overthrow this vicious measure. Already they are organizing throughout the state with that end in view. If the beer advocates succeed in carrying this referendum, it will greatly hamper the temperance interests in their attempt to secure a state enforcement code which is in harmony with the Volstead Act and will mean that the general enforcement situation throughout the Commonwealth will be unsatisfactory for some time to come.

The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Issue

GRAHAM TAYLOR, whose illuminating review of the Interchurch Steel Strike Report begins this week, is head of Chicago Commons Settlement house, Professor of Social Economics in Chicago Theological Seminary and a leader in social and industrial reform.

ALBERT PEEL gives his impressions of America just as he returns to England after a visit among us, following the International Council at which he was a delegate and speaker. He is the brilliant young pastor of Great Harwood Congregational Church in England.

GAIUS GLENN ATKINS, author of impressions of England, is pastor of First Congregational Church, Detroit, a frequent contributor to The Congregationalist and a gifted writer on religious and international themes.

GEORGGE F. KENNGOTT is the successful superintendent of the Southern California Conference of Congregational churches and writes from local knowledge on the Japanese problem.

HARRY FOSTER BURNS, who reports the early sessions of the Liberals' Pilgrim Celebration, is pastor of the First Church in Dorchester, Mass. (Unitarian). He was formerly a Congregational minster.

JAMES L. BARTON, who discusses Near East Relief Problems, is Foreign Secretary of the American Board and Chairman of the Near East Relief Committee.

Cover Message

We always welcome lay participation in the preparation of the table which we try to set for our readers week by week. It has fallen to one of them this week, Mr. George Rugg, an Amherst college graduate, and one of Worcester's most respected schoolmasters, to furnish a kind of keynote for this particular number. His creed, printed on the cover, may well find reproduction on many a church calendar. Or it could properly be made the subject of some midweek meeting. If one thousand Congregational laymen would dedicate themselves to service this autumn in the spirit of this creed, the life of our churches would be immeasurably quickened.

Circulation Department

We're waiting—yes, hopefully waiting for the first name to start our New Honor Roll of Churches where all the deacons and other officers subscribe to The Congregationalist and Advance. Won't you help your church to be at the head of the list?

Perhaps it is too early in the year to expect immediate results. But we want to help you make this year the best in the life of your church. You will agree, we feel sure, that your leaders should have an intelligent appreciation of our denominational privileges and obligations. And their value to the church will be greatly increased if they have an intimate touch with the life and activities of the denomination. This desirable contact is ably supplied through the weekly messages in The Congregationalist and Advance, which are inspiring, informing and stimulating. Enthusiastic leaders make strong churches. Let us help your church grow stronger. Pastors, if you will send us a list of your key-men and women who are not subscribers to The Congregationalist and Advance, we will send them a sample copy, and a special invitation to come into our family of readers.

The Men and Women of Tomorrow

THE United States twenty-five years from now will be just what the boys and girls now growing up shall then determine. And they will be just what the churches, homes and schools are now making them. We name the schools last not because we think they are the least of the forces operating today upon young life, but rather in order that we may concentrate attention for the moment upon the relation of the good citizen and the good Christian to the educational institutions of the land.

They are opening again with all the good cheer, hope and promise that mark every new school year, and this in spite of the fact that many schools are short of teachers and some schoolhouses meagerly provided with coal. But in most cases the essential, if not all the desirable physical appliances are at hand; the human material is there in the person of millions of bright-faced, alert pupils and of patient, earnest and capable teachers. If we could only add to these assets the personal interest of every parent and every mature person in the community, what an increment of power and usefulness would be added to our schools!

The American habit—and we fear the habit is becoming more deeply seated—is to depend too much on organization to produce results or to shift responsibility to the other party. In the church the average member says, "Let the minister and the deacons do it." In many homes the father devolves upon the mother not only the household drudgery but responsibility for the moral and spiritual training of the children under the delusion that if he pays the bills his paternal duty is entirely discharged. When it comes to the school and the college, we rely upon the school committee and the trustees, the superintendent, principal, president and professors. If the boys and girls do not speedily blossom into students and saints, we are disposed to think that the school or the college is at fault.

But what are we doing to remedy their defects? Take the question of a sufficient salary for the teacher. The Russell Sage Foundation has recently issued a comprehensive and detailed report concerning the condition of public education in this country and embodies the results of careful study in the recommendation that the compensation of teachers be doubled. Such a consummation in the average city or town is not likely to come to pass in the case of the teacher any more than in the case of the minister unless public opinion is aroused to demand a considerable advance in the scale of salaries. Fortunately, the situation has already been bettered and we are glad to note an increase in attendance this autumn upon certain Normal Schools. This indicates that more young women are ready to consider teaching as a vocation. But the supply of teachers continues to be inadequate.

It takes the united effort of all parties to make and keep our educational institutions what they should be. They need the co-operative interest not only of paid employes but of the men and women who compose the citizenship of the country. A bright writer on the subject of education, Miss Julia Deane, says that the trouble with the schools is that the teachers are afraid of the superintendent and the superintendent is afraid of the school committee, and the school committee is afraid of the parents and the parents are afraid of the children. It is not right to have such a potentially valuable institution as a school or college surrounded by an endless circle of fear and inaction. This will not be the case when all who are partners in the undertaking cease passing on responsibility from one group to another and join hands in the splendid common task.

There is nothing more thrilling these autumn days than the sight of boys and girls, young men and young women, setting forth from home for the new year at school. It should mean a brighter and richer life for all of them. In some homes where children have been tenderly reared and sheltered, the parents may be for the moment of a divided mind when

> The little house says stay,
> But the little road says go.

Yet it is altogether best that children should move on from kindergarten to primary, from primary to grammar, from grammar to high, from high to college or technical school and thence out into the great busy working world. And there may be homes which rejoice in the ending of vacation and the beginning of school, chiefly because they are thereby relieved of the presence and the care of noisy or difficult children. But the best results will come when parents and teachers recognize their joint responsibilities, gladly assume them and bravely bear them.

The best brains of the world and millions of dollars are being employed just now in the task of reconstructing this torn and sorrowful world. But here is a constructive work right at our doors.

We ought to expect and demand more of our schools and colleges. They should develop in our youth a sense of responsibility for the welfare of the State and Church. At the same time we should give the school and college a better chance to do their work. We should guard them from insidious foes. We should take a vital interest and a just pride in what they are doing. For the American system of schools and colleges, with all its defects, has no superior in any part of the world, and it is the duty and should be the joy of all of us to make it better and more productive from year to year.

WHAT THE CHRISTIAN WORLD IS DOING

Chaplain's War Medal Awarded to President Wilson

PRESIDENT Wilson, the secretaries of War and of the Navy, Chief Chaplain Axton, U. S. A., and Chief Chaplain Frazier, U. S. N., are soon to receive the Chaplains' War Medal given by the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains of the Federal Council. The medal is of bronze, two and three-quarters inches in diameter. It is the work of Mrs. Laura Gardin Fraser of New York, one of the best known of American medalists. One side represents a Chaplain ministering to a wounded gunner. On the reverse the Navy is represented by a battleship, with the Chaplain's cross superimposed as the central feature. This side bears the inscription at the top: "Awarded to the Chaplains of the American Army and Navy," and below the battleship: "The General War-Time Commission of the Churches, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America." On the army side is the date, "1917—1918," the name of the designer and date of the award of the medal. Immediately following the presentation of the medal to the President, the Secretaries and the Chief Chaplains of the Army and Navy, the medal will be sent out from the offices of the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, in Washington, to all the Chaplains from the Protestant Churches who served in the World War. President Wilson, in reply to the notification of the award, sent an appreciative letter, speaking in the highest terms of the fine co-operation which the Federal Council gave to the Army and Navy Departments in the selection of chaplains, and of the devotion and sacrificial spirit with which the chaplains ministered to the troops.

Noted French General to Head Mayflower Delegation

THE Federal Council has received word from the French Government that it will send Gen. Robert George Nivelle, former Commander-in-Chief of the French Army, as one of its delegates to the Tercentenary Celebrations of the American Mayflower Council which will be held in seventy large American cities during November. General Nivelle succeeded General Pétain as the defender of Verdun and on Dec. 15, 1916, he was made Commander-in-Chief of the French Army, succeeding Marshall Joffre. Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, General Secretary of the Federal Council, who was in France during August, found the French people deeply interested in the Mayflower Tercentenary. Representatives of the Government arranged with him for the sending of an official delegation of which General Nivelle is the first whose appointment has been announced. General Nivelle's military career during the Great War, which he entered as Colonel of the Fifth Regiment, shows the most rapid rise of any general in the French Army. On Oct. 24, 1914, he was made a general of brigade and soon after was appointed commander of a division. On Dec. 23, 1915, he was made commander of an army corps and on Dec. 15, 1916, he succeeded Marshal Joffre as Commander-in-Chief of the French Army. It is of interest to many Americans that during the most critical year of the war, both the Commander-in-Chief of the French Army and Admiral Gaucher, head of the Navy, were of the Protestant faith.

Near East Relief Workers

GEORGE D. White, Jr., who sailed from New York recently for Asia Minor, with his wife and sister, is a native of Marsovan, Turkey, and the son of Rev. George E. White, D. D., for many years a missionary in that area. He came to this country from Marsovan when he was sixteen years old, and went to Grinnell, Io., where he entered Grinnell Academy, and later graduated from Grinnell College, and then went to Oberlin Seminary for his theological work. His wife and sister are also graduates of Grinnell College, and all are members of the Congregational Church. These three young people, who have an unusual equipment for work in Asia Minor, are to engage in the service of the Near East Relief among the Armenians and other needy peoples of that region.

Long Active in Christian Endeavor Movement

MR. AND MRS. GEORGE D. WHITE, JR.

Sailed for Asia Minor July 22, 1920, as workers in the service of the Near East Relief.

THE chairman of the World's Christian Endeavor Convention committee in charge of the great meetings to be held in New York next July, the fortieth anniversary of the Christian Endeavor Movement, is Hon. Frederick A. Wallis, United States Commissioner of Immigration, who is now welcoming some five thousand new arrivals at Ellis Island every day. Mr. Wallis, who was one of the most successful Insurance men of New York City, a few years ago was chosen as one of the Metropolitan Police Commissioners, and has recently been appointed to this exceedingly important post at the head of the Immigration Department. He is an elder in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York, and most active in all church affairs. When a young man, living in Kentucky and an ardent Endeavorer, he started the three societies in the Kentucky States Prison at Frankfort; one for white men, one for colored men and another for women. These societies have flourished ever since, and have resulted in hundreds of conversions and reformed, upright lives.

One More Revival

Revivals in religion are what all believers in the church want today. They differ only in the kind of revival they seek. One person wants more general and unyielding adherence to fundamental Christian truths. Another thinks religious education is the solution of the problem of ignorance and apathy in the church. A third would have a nation-wide evangelistic campaign. A fourth wants to see religion applied to business and industry.

We believe in these various types of revival when properly initiated and led, but we venture to propose another, and that is a revival of responsibility among actual church members for the work of the local church. To get men and women to be Sunday school superintendents or teachers, or leaders of young people and of boys and girls, to be deacons and deaconesses, and members of important committees, is almost a herculean task, under which many a pastor is staggering. Church members will give money but not themselves. They are caught by the new device or the spectacular campaign, but they shrink from the hard, patient, steady work that lies within the walls of the church or just outside of it Sundays and weekdays.

One of our big cities put on a campaign the other day to recruit several hundred scout-masters. It was projected because many groups of boys and young men in that metropolitan area were headed in the wrong direction simply because they lacked the touch and the influence of right-minded, friendly men. The situation is paralleled in its essentials in many a church. We sound a call for a revival of the sense of responsibility that should accompany membership in the Christian church.

Too bad that the fine old national game, the fever for which rages and will rage not only on the great historic fields of contest but in every back yard where scrub nines practice, should now be smirched by the wrong-doing fixed upon players who have been popular idols, especially in the eyes of youth. But, boys, remember that not all the famous pitchers and batmen are tainted with dishonor, and remember in the second place that it is still a splendid game to play, and in the third place that the good old Bible has no truer sentence than this: "The wages of sin is death"—or its equivalent, dishonor.

Dr. Mills' New Work

The thousands of Congregationalists who have had their part in pledging the more than eight million dollars that is to constitute the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, thus providing for the old age of Congregational ministers throughout the country, may be assured that its administation could have been placed in no more competent hands than those of Dr. Charles S. Mills, whose dismissal from his Montclair pastorate we chronicle in our news columns this week. No one has been more instrumental in bringing to pass this monumental denominational achievement or has conceived of it in a larger way or seen more clearly its bearing upon the stability and perpetuity of our Congregational ministry. The logic of the situation is that despite the reluctance of his Montclair church to yield him to the new task, he should now be the one to follow up the work of Dr. Lewis T. Reed, Dr. H. F. Swartz and others who in turn brought to the Fund the impetus of their strong personalities.

Dr. Mills is the kind of man that Congregationalism needs in the pastorate, but the need for wise and efficient handling of this great and increasing trust fund seems now paramount to that of any local church.

No one who knows Dr. Mills, his energetic nature and his ardent enthusiasm, will have any idea that in taking up this double secretaryship, which represents two phases of the same admirable project, he will become merely a routine office secretary. His strong voice will be heard in colleges, universities and academies urging young men to consider the claims of the Christian ministry. He will be, as heretofore, actively interested in all our national societies and common undertakings, and because he knows the joys and sorrows of the pastor's life, because he holds in such high esteem the work of the parish minister in all its phases, he will continue to be friend and brother to all who are bearing the heat and burden of the day in the local field.

We believe that this new association of Dr. Mills with the Pilgrim Memorial Fund and with the Annuity Fund, which aims to secure at least $100,000 for the older men in the ministry, will reinforce our denominational life at the center and throughout the fellowship.

In the "Duration" Period

Among the innumerable good stories relating to the gallant participation of our Negro brethren in the war, there is one that carries an admirable and timely lesson to people of all colors and races. On the day of the armistice a Negro soldier, the moment after the thrilling announcement ran up and down the lines, threw down his gun and started for the rear. Of course he was quickly halted by his sergeant, to whom he said, "I'se gwine back to Alabama. I 'listed for the duration of de war and now de war's over." Nothing short of arrest could detain him, and in view of the general jubilation his superior officers evidently thought it best to let him carry out his designs and see what would happen. In due time he made his way back to the rear, where he was forced to reckon with the commanding officer. To him the Negro made the same reply that he had made a number of times already: "I 'listed for the duration of de war. Now I'se gwine back to Alabama." The Colonel happened to be a man of wisdom and insight, especially into the psychological processes of this Alabama soldier, so instead of remanding him summarily to the guard-house, he explained to him that while the war was over, the "duration" part of it was still in evidence. This ingenious explanation completely changed the Negro's point of view, and he went back contentedly to his company.

This clever discrimination between the "war" and the "duration of the war" may help all the rest of us to carry on in the midst of the strains and disappointments that burden us, even though nearly two years have run their course since hostilities ceased. The painful aftermath of this gigantic struggle is so vast that it severely tests the tenacity of our courage and our faith. What little idealism we ever possessed is in danger of being dimmed by the hard, sordid facts of the present situation. We have to screw ourselves up to anything like the self-discipline and the self-sacrifice which were everywhere manifest during war days. But let us remember that we are in the "duration" period and that too may pass in the good providence of God.

President Hopkins cleans the slate for Dartmouth to a gratifying extent when he announced that careful investigation shows that only three students, including the one recently convicted of manslaughter for killing his classmate, "were engaged in and knew about traffic in intoxicating liquors." This should reassure parents whose sons are at Hanover. We hope that there, and in other college communities, the authorities will continue to keep a sharp watch upon tendencies to violate the national law. The colleges of the land should be foremost in their adherence to the policy upon which the country has decided and from which decision it will never recede.

Winthrop Murray Crane

The nation, the church and the world are the poorer because of the death of former Senator and former Governor Crane of Massachusetts. He belonged to the older group of leaders who for so long a period exercised a dominating influence in the Republican Party, but he should be dissociated entirely from any in that group whose personal ambitions and interests led them into the field of active politics. Mr. Crane's methods were quiet, but never devious. He believed in organization and in the Republican Party. He was loyal to it at the most critical point in its recent history, when in 1912 many other Republicans cast in their lot with Mr. Roosevelt. Senator Crane never served his party better than in the last two or three years when he made so gallant a fight, first at Boston a year ago successfully, and last June at Chicago unsuccessfully, for a clear-cut declaration allying the party with some kind of a League of Nations.

Mr. Crane was a believer in and a member of the church. He was a Congregationalist by ancestry, training and convictions. He had been a faithful member of the Dalton Congregational Church for 47 years. The books of our denominational societies would show many entries of his name affixed to very generous contributions, but his sympathies were no more limited to one religious body than the fresh Berkshire breezes are confined to a single plateau. Up and down that Western Massachusetts country the traces of his benevolences and good will are numerous. He had a keen scent for human need wherever it was to be found. He stood by the regular charities of the church but from the fountain of his benevolence trickled countless streams, relatively few of which coursed along the public highway where they could be seen and known of men.

The possessor of great wealth, closely engaged for many years in the active administration of important business interests, Senator Crane exemplified the qualities which adorn the Christian calling and make it attractive in the eyes of other men. He never said a great deal in public about religion. He lived it.

The new social order, about which we talk so much and concerning whose precise nature we know so little, may produce, when property is more evenly distributed, a higher type of personal character than that of Murray Crane, but it will have to be very high indeed to exceed that of this modest, upright, conscientious, friendly man to whom public office was always a public trust, to whom party allegiance was only a method whereby he could the better serve his country, who used his fortune, honestly acquired, in the spirit of genuine stewardship, who was the master of his wealth, and not mastered by it.

Those programs for the fall campaign which are appearing on church calendars here and there look good, and they wear their best look when they are made comprehensive and specific. "Pilgrim Leadership in the America of Today"—that's a good subject for other Associations of Congregational churches besides the one which is making it this week the central theme of its autumn gathering. And if like that Association you can find a merchant to talk about Pilgrim leadership in business, and some one familiar with public affairs to talk about Pilgrim leadership in politics and a really religious minister to talk about Pilgrim leadership in religion, you will have an order of procedure that should attract the outsider.

The League at Work

The League of Nations has before it two international questions of great importance both to the nations concerned and to the future peace of the world. One is submitted by Sweden and Finland and concerns the Aland Islands, a group of rocky but inhabited islands at the entrance of the Gulf of Bothnia, which separates the two countries. The population of the islands is of Swedish origin but for two centuries or more has been under Russian control and governed through the Finnish authorities. The importance of these islands to either country is their strategic position in regard to the whole Baltic and to the Gulf of Finland, which is the outlet for Russia to the sea and at the head of which Czar Peter, the Great, conquered the Finnish marshes and built his new capital of Petrograd. The Swedish argument will build upon original possession and ties of blood and language. The Finns will plead that for six generations they have held the islands and that they are necessary to Finland's safety.

The other question submitted relates to the boundaries between Poland and Lithuania, which are not only in dispute but have also been the occasion of recent fighting. On the ethnographical side this question is difficult owing to that interpenetration and mixture of races which has gone on across most of the boundaries of Eastern Europe. And in all this region of what was Western Russia the natural boundaries are few or non-existent. All through the Middle Ages Poles and Lithuanians were in the closest relations and Lithuania at one time supplied Poland with its dynasty of kings. Both went to Russia in the final partition, and under Russian administration differences of language and of feeling have kept them apart. Here again strategic advantages play a part. Poland, with old oppressors on east and west, both larger and more powerful and both hostile, naturally seeks the most defensible frontiers, with such bars and gates as forests and marshes supply. As at present constituted the southern end of the Lithuanian territory affords an undefended gateway from the east such as Belgium, against its will, became for Germany. On the other hand the Lithuanians are naturally reluctant to yield anything out of their small territory.

Both these questions are difficult. The League will have a good test of its wisdom and authority in solving them. But that they have been submitted, in the one case out of century-long differences of feeling and in the other from an armistice in actual combat, shows the natural function and opportunity of the League, and gives it a chance to approve itself to the good opinion and confidence of the whole world.

If here isn't the ancient First Church in Springfield, Mass., pillar and ground of conservatism for nearly three hundred years, inserting in the local papers a display advertisement of its Sunday services and of the topics on which Dr. Neil McPherson will preach. Of course the fathers did not do it precisely that way, but we are confident none of them, if living now, would raise a word of remonstrance.

Peace and War as the Germans See Them

There is evident, though too reluctant, progress in the re-education of the German people which, when further advanced, will make them a welcome member of the family of nations. As an instance of what we mean: there was a great popular gathering in August on the anniversary of the breaking out of the war. Some forty thousand people gathered in Berlin in the open space between the imperial palace and the cathedral. Former soldiers, whole and disabled, in their associations, war widows and orphans, the Republican Officers' League, the International League of former soldiers and other organizations paraded, all bearing mottoes and banners denouncing war.

The London Telegraph reports the meeting with its hundreds upon hundreds of disabled and disfigured men and earnest speeches declaring that the nations of Europe must never again allow themselves to be plunged into such a disaster. "Never Again" was the motto of the day. A telegram of brotherly greetings was read from a French ex-soldiers' association and a wireless message was sent to the ex-soldiers in all lands stating that thousands of Berlin war victims and lovers of peace promised to use all their powers for the reconciliation of the peoples and for healing the wounds caused by the war.

Prof. James Stalker has been studying the mind of the intellectual and religious leaders of Germany since the armistice. He quotes a letter in the Christliche Welt, one of the leading religious newspapers of Germany, addressed by Professor Förster of Munich to the editor in which he raises the question of guilt for the bringing on of war. All the European world was armed, he says, and the guilt must in some measure be shared by all; but he goes on to argue that though the sin of militarism was universal, it was most concentrated in Germany. To quote Professor Stalker's report: "The neutrals know well that, while all the nations have practiced the politics of violence, it was Germany which, at two Hague Conferences, frustrated the attempts of the rest to put an end to their sins and introduce an era of humanity. The neutrals know well that, while all the nations armed themselves, it was Germany which resisted disarmament with scorn thrice within fifteen years, rendering the approaches of England in this direction abortive—they know also that that which the world calls Prussian militarism was a quite peculiar product, against which the entire human race has with complete justification risen up in wrath, and will continue to rise."

Professor Förster is a South German. The editor of Die Christliche Welt published the letter, with no protest except by way of caution and modification. How far this attitude is already accepted in religious circles Professor Stalker is not sure. Nor is he of the opinion that this acceptance is wide. But the publication of such an open letter is in itself a confession that the facts of German preparation for war and refusal of disarmament are being faced. In the bitter disillusionment of an overwhelming defeat and the sufferings entailed as a consequence, we welcome any clear judgment against war and any frank recognition of the facts of history and of the necessity of future brotherhood in those who made themselves our enemies and whom we should like to have again for friends.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Guest-Room Towels

There came to me a man who said, The trouble with thee, and with the Church, and with all who labor with thee, is that thy Methods are Old. We are living in a New Age, and the Old Methods are Inadequate.

And I answered, thou speakest truly, and perhaps wisely.

And he said, How is it that if what I say is Certainly True it is only Possibly Wise?

And I answered him, Because there are no kinds of unwisdom so great as those that are founded on Truth that is Ill Considered. What New Methods dost thou advocate?

And he Got Busy with a Line of Talk about his New Methods, that never had been tried anywhere, and which were certain of but one thing, that they never would work.

And he said, How dost thou like my New Methods?

And I said unto him,

I went to a certain city, and lodged with a friend who sent me to my bed in the Guest Chamber. And it was a Comfortable Chamber, and his wife had made it ready for my coming. And among the other Preparations, she had hung the towel-rack full of New Linen Towels, which she had purchased by the Dozen, and there were Six of them in my Room. And they were Very Nice Towels, and well worth the Price that she paid, for Linen was Going Up. But when I essayed to wipe my face upon them, then I could not do it. For those Towels were every one of them as Stiff and as Shiny as a Sheet of Tin, and likewise as Impervious to Water. So I mussed them up, one of them and yet another and another till I had polished my face with the Metalic Surface of all six of them.

And I said unto him, There must needs be New Methods, and I would not be last in the use of any of them that are good. Neither do I care to be the first to dry my face upon a New Towel. Let him that is ambitious for New Experiments try it before me, and after it hath gone to the Laundry and come back, less Shiny but more Serviceable, then will I try it. It is enough for me that I must wear my own New Boots.

In Brief

We hope all the eligible women who read this paper have either registered as voters or intend to do so forthwith. The opportunity is for all classes, all races and all kinds of religious people and no right-minded woman should evade it. The "antis" have shown themselves pretty good sports in accepting the outcome and in qualifying for voters.

Get your local library to exhibit any books, manuscripts, maps, prints or drawings which it posesses relating to Pilgrim and Puritan settlement in America. The Boston Public Library has been holding such an exhibition, as well as the Library of Congress at Washington. Such a display, if properly arranged and advertised, should attract a good many persons, especially young people, during these next three months.

We begin this week a series of three articles by Prof. Graham Taylor on the Interchurch Steel Strike Report. In view of the wide discussion and strong feeling which have resulted from the report and the vital importance of the principles involved, we are sure our readers will welcome the illuminating, broadly informing, and perfectly fair study of this great industrial problem from such an expert as Professor Taylor.

No American was more conspicuously "on his native heath" at the celebrations in Holland of the departure of the Pilgrims than Dr. William Elliot Griffis, who has written so many books pertaining to that period. Thence he went to take part in the English celebrations and, as a former Congregational pastor in Boston, to carry to old Boston in Lincolnshire America's greetings. Dr. Griffis' bow seems to abide in its pristine strength and the Pilgrims have no more ardent champion than he.

The state of Connecticut seems to resort to Congregationalists when it is looking for gubernatorial timber. Judge Simeon E. Baldwin of New Haven, long active in the local churches and in the affairs of our National Council, held the post of governor for several years. Recently the Democrats have nominated Rollin U. Tyler of Haddam, a fine type of Congregational layman. It must take the martyr stuff that we associate with Puritan ancestry to run for governor on the Democratic ticket in Connecticut this year.

Summer tourists just back from Switzerland speak with enthusiasm of the tangible evidence of a going League of Nations supplied by the substantial building in Geneva, which serves as its headquarters. They say that it is not only imposing externally, but inspection within reveals numerous kinds of activity in progress, with officials coming and going, who look as if they were engaged in important tasks. Of course machinery and a staff of workers do not necessarily ensure a finished project. At the same time, to our mind, one of the essentials to this league, or to any league, for that matter, is continuous existence and not intermittent functioning. The Palace of Peace at the Hague is a fine structure, but to the best of our knowledge it has not been open for business for some time.

Those were impressive and valuable meetings in Boston last week in connection with the International Congress of Religious Liberals. A report of them appears elsewhere. They were keyed to the Tercentenary celebration, but the prophetic element in the gatherings both in Boston and at Plymouth was quite as marked as the historic. Rev. Rhondda Williams, one of the English speakers, ventured in his quiet way to suggest that it might be a good thing to retire from general use for the next ten years the words "liberty" and "liberal" and spend the intervening time in filling up the contents of those words with spiritual meaning and value. That is always liberalism's chief danger, that it will put too much emphasis on the mere attainment of freedom, which is only the means to an end. We are not, however, saying that this was a fault of the recent Congress.

Another American preacher who has received considerable attenton in the religious press of Great Britain is Dr. G. G. Atkins of Detroit. Of him the British Weekly says, "Still in the prime of life, with winsome voice and quiet, gracious manner, the Detroit preacher knows how to catch and keep the attention of a large mixed audience. In his appearance there is something of the professor, in his language a good deal of the poet." Dr. Atkins has been supplying Dr. Jewett's pulpit at Westminster Chapel morning and evening. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Brooklyn of course received the kind of welcome which he usually gets in Great Britain. The text of his first sermon after his return this autumn to Clinton Avenue Church, Brooklyn, was "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Dr. Boynton, if he doesn't watch out, is likely to become a confirmed internationalist. His recent election as chairman of the Committee of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship imposes upon him considerable responsibility in that direction.

Dr. S. P. Cadman of Brooklyn has been the subject of a number of appreciative pen pictures in the columns of the religious papers of Great Britain, where he has passed the summer. Evidently the impressions made on previous visits have been deepened as Dr. Cadman has spoken in leading churches and on many platforms. This is due not simply to the fact that Dr. Cadman is an Englishman, but because his hearers recognize in him one of the leading figures in the Christian pulpit today. A writer in the Christian World speaks of him as "the very incarnation of that quenchless optimism, nerve-driven energy and indefeasible youth which make the best type of American so splendid and inspiring a creature. The cool caution and temperamental reluctance of middle-age find no foothold in his nature. His personality spells welcome to all men of good will; being introduced to him is like entering a friendly city steeped in sunshine."

Dr. Cadman has done royal service in promoting a more cordial understanding between the peoples of America and England just at this time, when so many influences are at work to alienate the two lands. He received a warm welcome, as always, from English Congregationalists. Many visitors spoke to him after the services. His broken right arm made it temporarily necessary for him to use his left hand in responding to greetings. Between Sundays he spent refreshing days in Shropshire, where he was born.

FROM·OUR·WESTERN·WINDOW

The report of the steel strike made by the Committee of Inquiry of the Interchurch World Movement was received by the West with varying emotions. Extra conservative representatives of capital have complained that the investigation of a strike is not the business of the church, while radical labor representatives feel that the report is not drastic enough in its criticism of Mr. Gary and his associates. There is a great deal of criticism from both these parties and from some representatives of all the shades of opinion between the two. Still there is much more accord with the findings than would have at all been possible ten years ago. If we are to judge by the reception accorded the report we are making great advances in securing amicable adjustments of the relationships of capital and labor. A very large number of our people now accept collective bargaining, the eight-hour day, a wage scale sufficient to keep a family in comfort, and decent working conditions as rightful standards in the industrial world. This was not true even five years ago.

Had such a report as this been made ten years ago by a church committee we would have heard a great deal of talk about "the church attending to its own business," and ministers would have been admonished to "preach the simple gospel and leave to business men the running of business," etc. The great fight waged for 25 years by the church against the saloon has shown the fallacy of all such arguments as these regarding the relationship of the church to industry. Our ministers almost without exception take the ground that anything that is of interest to, or influences, humanity, is their business. It is very generally recognized by them that from the dawn of history to the present moment labor has generally gotten the worst of the bargain and if the labor union is radical sometimes and overreaches in certain respects it is only doing what capital has done in every country of the world from the beginning of time.

The American public on the other hand is going to demand of the labor union that it adopt the practical recommendations of the Interchurch Committee for its reform. People are tired of such lack of faith as the anthracite coal miners have just shown in their dealings with President Wilson's Commission. The unions will also have to quit the present practice of holding production below a reasonable amount; they will have to dispense with gunmen and sluggers and give some time to teaching their men the art of returning a fair day's work for a fair day's wage. It is recognized that the labor union has made a great contribution not only to the welfare of labor but that it has made just as great a contribution to the whole social order. It must now rid itself of the abuses that crept in when it was making its fight for its very existence.

The restlessness of our day and the demand for direct action that has come to us out of the war may lead us to forget how rapidly we are advancing in the industrial world. There are many indications that the relationships of capital and labor in a good many quarters are rapidly approaching Christian standards. The clothing trade agreements so well represented by those working in the Hart Schaffner & Marx factories where the arbitrators happen to be preachers and college professors of the idealistic sort illustrate how far we have gone in this direction. Likewise the International Harvester Company, which a year or two ago put in a shop council and made conditions very favorable for its men to own stock and draw dividends, has now given the men a still larger share in the industry. It will give its employes 60 per cent. of its profits after seven per cent. has been paid on the invested capital. This extra compensation will be paid part in cash and part in stock. The employes will receive their share of this year's profits as the plan is made operative as of Jan. 1, 1920. The profits after paying dividends on the capital stock in 1919 were $12,000,000—this large sum is an indication of how far-reaching this new plan of the International Harvester Company is.

The Proctor & Gamble Company of Cincinnati has just reorganized so that the employes have the right to elect three members of the Board of Directors. For 30 years this company has encouraged its employes to become stockholders and a considerable number has responded. It was reported from Hammond, Ind., the other day that the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway had purchased 80 acres near the Gary Country Club, upon which it will lay off a nine-hole golf course and build a recreation center and cottages for the employes of the road. The price paid for the land was $36,000. I noticed as I was passing a great factory in Ohio the other day that the company had bought a tract of land which was entirely given over to golf courses, tennis courts, and other recreation grounds for its men.

Henry Ford has been the butt of much ridicule and jesting on account of his voyage during the war on what some one facetiously called "The good ship Nutty." Mr. Ford may have rooms to rent on the third floor back or some other where in his upper story, but this fact has not been in evidence in his dealing with his employes if the reports that come to us are true. Undoubtedly some would find fault with his relationship by calling it "paternalistic," but he appears to have done very well. Mr. Ford came in at the psychological moment the other day to knock down prices and for good hard common sense the manifesto which he issued on that occasion will rank well with those of our foremost statesmen and though he reduced the price of cars and other products to a pre-war basis, he did not disturb the wages of his men.

These examples encourage us to believe that we are not to settle down to a state of warfare between capital and labor, but that we are moving on to industrial peace founded on mutual sympathy and understanding. Just what form social-industrial organization will take we cannot now predict but we are surely on the way to better things. Twenty-five years ago the clothing of the country was produced in sweatshops. It is a long cry from that day to the modern clothing factory with the 44 or 48-hour week, good wages, and sanitary conditions. We ought now to consolidate our gains by converting such men as Mr. Gary on the one hand and on the other hand the labor union man who is an advocate of violence and dishonesty. Watchmen, what of the night? The morning cometh!

From the Southwestern Window

A spectacular political campaign has been on this summer in Texas. After so many years of non-residence that he was a vague memory to most of the younger generation of Texans, ex-Senator Joseph Weldon Bailey, corporation attorney with offices in Washington, D. C., for some mysterious reason was suddenly seized of an intense affection for the old state, at least of a great longing to serve as Governor, and thrust himself into the race for nomination. To the utter surprise of most in the first primary, with the vote divided between many candidates, Bailey received the highest vote. Then began a campaign for the nomination at the final primary of Aug. 28 streaked with sensationalism and personalities, and as diverting as a movie actor rehearsal in Los Angeles. Progressive Democrats united in the support of Mr. Patt M. Neff of Waco, the second man in the first primary, whose platform was that of his party adopted at San Francisco, plus a forward-looking position on state issues. Bailey was as reactionary as the old Chinese Empire, his slogan being "Old-time Democracy is good enough for me." He was pro-Jefferson and Jackson, and anti-Wilson and his administration. As the papers reported him he was against woman suffrage, against prohibition, against labor unions, and preachers and churches and every modern and progressive measure and principle. He is even reported as saying: "I milked cows standing in six inches of mud as a boy many a time and I drank gallons of uninspected milk, and I lived through it. I am sick and tired of this modern stuff about cement floors for dairy barns, inspection of milk and sanitary laws and experts and enforcement officers." His appeal was to ignorance, prejudice and selfishness. He talked open shop, reduction of taxes, curtailment of administration expenses, issued whole editions of promises and loosely jointed theories often out of geer with facts and situations. But he was adroit and dramatic, eloquent and nimble willed, personally attractive and magnetic. But, nevertheless, Aug. 28 was his Waterloo. A majority for Neff of nearly 80,000 constituted as even Bailey himself admitted, "A result demonstrating that Texas Democrats do not subscribe to the type of Democracy for which he stood." One does not need to be a Democrat in Texas or out of it to rejoice that once again the state has been delivered from a humiliating and shameful predicament, and has risen splendidly to meet a real crisis. The Wichita Falls Times states it: "As Oklahoma did to Grove; as Arkansas did to Kirby; as Missouri did to Reed; as South Carolina did to Blease, as Georgia did to Hardwicke and Smith; and as Mississippi did to Vardaman, so has Texas done to Bailey." And the state that impeached Jim Ferguson, enacted prohibition long before the national triumph, enfranchised women early in the procession of states, may be accounted as really emancipated, progressive and trustworthy. Here's to Mr. Neff and a progressive administration for the Lone Star State.

Object for Intercession

For Teachers in Our Church Schools:

Lord, we remember before thee those to whom opportunity is given to teach. May they be taught of thee, that they may enter into full sympathy and understanding with those who come to their classes and that they may teach by their example of a faithful Christian life. So may teacher and taught be friends together, for this and for the eternal life with thee. In the name of Christ. Amen.—R.

Review of Interchurch Inquiry

Living and Working Conditions in the Steel Industry

By Prof. Graham Taylor

This first installment of Prof. Taylor's review of the Report on the Steel Strike of 1919 by the Commission of Inquiry, The Interchurch World Movement (Harcourt, Brace & Howe, N. Y. 1920), will be followed next week by another discussing the more favorable side of the case relating to the Steel Corporation. The following week Professor Taylor will discuss the question raised by critics, "Is it Relevant to Religion and Within the Province of the Church?"—EDITORS' NOTE.

This last of many strikes in the steel industry was not the first to call for public inquiry. It was, however, the first one to precipitate such a situation as to arouse the religious spirit to a consciousness of its duty to understand and of its opportunity to contribute to the public understanding of industrial conditions and relations which bear directly upon the public peace, order and welfare, as well as upon the purpose and work of all the churches of every name.

It is not the purpose of the writer to review this inquiry from the viewpoint of the churches, nor from that of the employers or of organized labor, but from the public point of view. For the verdict of public opinion will be more decisive upon the issues of this inquiry than any attention or neglect which either organized labor or the Steel Corporation may show the report. This fact is well stated by George W. Coleman, the only layman on the Commission of Inquiry which directed the investigation and reported its findings, who writes: "The gripping truth of the matter is that the report will stand on its own legs, gather its own momentum and register on its own merits."

That the public is interested in and is reckoning with the findings, conclusions and recommendations of this report is strikingly evident. On the date of the release of its advance statements, the New York World made a count of more than 2,000 columns of newspaper space reporting and commenting upon them. The New York Tribune declared this fact to indicate that more newspaper attention had been given to this report than to any similar findings of the past fifty years. The Springfield Republican expressed the very general editorial comment in affirming the report to be "a challenging document in which the whole question of industrial relationships is raised and needs to be." No less indicative of the challenging force of these findings is the activity of certain economic and financial journals to discredit the report both before and after its issuance.

OPEN TO CHALLENGE, YET TO BE RECKONED WITH

Ground, however, was given both for honest misapprehension and for willful misrepresentation by issuing a summary of conclusions without the substantiating evidence upon which they were alleged to be based. The full text of the volume also appears without the proof referred to as the "principal sub-reports frequently quoted in this summary still awaiting full publication." This leaves the findings and conclusions open to damaging denial and rebuttal, which may suspend or qualify the verdict of the jury of public opinion.

Nevertheless, so many of the findings as appear in this volume constitute a formidable document. Whatever in its complete text may prove to be open to criticism or even to rejection, its massing of facts and figures, its citation of sources of evidence and information, either previously recorded or readily available, must sooner or later be reckoned with. Sneers cannot brush the report of this inquiry aside. Scorn cannot silence it. Mere challenge or blank denial cannot set aside the facts it gives of living and working conditions in the steel industry, because they involve not only the Steel Corporation and its employes, but also the public safety and welfare and the personal and social ideals and standards to which religion commits every church.

POINTS FAIRLY AT ISSUE

The inquiry and the report cannot be fairly judged from the public or any other point of view without considering the scope set, the reliability of the sources of information, the accuracy in the statement of facts and the fairness in drawing conclusions from them, the competence of the personnel of the Commission and its staff, and the relevancy of the whole undertaking to the prerogatives and functions of the church. If these points can be covered suggestively yet critically, the purpose of this review will be fulfilled in clearing away unfair prepossessions and misconceptions, and in opening the way to a fair discrimination in appropriating material from this inquiry upon which to base personal judgment and contribute to public opinion.

Salient Points Made by Dr. Taylor

That the public is interested in the report is shown by the fact that 2,000 columns of newspaper space have been given to reports and comments upon it.

* *

Living and working conditions in the steel industry involve not only the Steel Corporation and its employes, but also the public safety and welfare and the personal and social ideals and standards to which religion commits every church.

* *

The report urges collective bargaining and recognition of the right to organize "for conference" upon conditions and grievances.

* *

Evidence on the side of the Steel Corporation is lacking because it was not put at the disposal of the investigators and they had no authority to compel testimony.

* *

The length of the worker's week has increased 2.4 hours since 1914 and a larger proportion of men work seven days a week than was the case ten years ago.

* *

Wages are inadequate to maintain the comfort or the subsistence of a family of five, and especially to provide for housing conditions compatible with decency and health.

SCOPE OF INQUIRY DEFINITE YET BROAD

The Commission limited the scope of its inquiry primarily to facts as to the conditions causing or occasioning the strike, dealing secondarily with conflicting policies both of the United States Steel Corporation and the labor elements involved which have a bearing upon American national institutions and modes of thought. In justification of so doing, the Commission perhaps too tersely states that the causes of the strike still remain—inevitably to be the occasion for the next strike—and continue to be uncomprehended by the public; and that the only peaceable way out for the industry and the public is through "an enlightened public opinion based upon the more general understanding of the national conditions and trends here analyzed."

The living and working conditions in the steel industry, as determined by the length of the working day and week and by the lowest wages paid to unskilled labor, were considered to be the "causative facts" underlying the discontent of those upon whom they bear most heavily. But at every point of statement or proof the alleged fact of "no conference" between management and men is predominantly emphasized in headline topics and dwelt upon in the text as the irritating occasion for discontent and disturbance in the steel industry, which leaves neither party any way of adjustment. At every point, therefore, collective bargaining and the recognition of the right to organize "for conference" upon conditions and grievances are urged as the only alternative to the warfare of strike and lockout.

VARIED SOURCES OF INFORMATION

Many are the sources of information and evidence cited to support disputed claims as to the number and classes of employes subjected to long hours and low pay, and as to the effects of these conditions upon their vitality, morale and family life. Among them are congressional investigations and hearings, government reports and public records, personal interviews with employes and their priests and pastors, affidavits and excerpts from daily diaries of steel workers' individual experiences, open hearings in Pittsburgh, elsewhere in Pennsylvania and in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, special investigations by the Bureau of Industrial Research of New York, by the Washington Bureau of Applied Economics, by a firm of consulting engineers, and by the Commission's own staff of investigators.

The evidence most conspicuously lacking is that which could only be furnished from the files of the United States Steel Corporation. While Judge Gary's offer of an open door for the Commission's investigation is acknowledged, the withholding of documentary evidence at headquarters and by the subsidiary companies is evident, and of course could not be obviated except by authority to compel testimony, which the Commission did not have. The great preponderance of direct evidence is therefore drawn necessarily from one side, with little offered in contradiction or rebuttal by the other side, except the very general statements in very general terms made in the citations from Judge Gary's interviews with members of the Commission and his testimony before the Senate Committee appointed to investigate the strike.

LOW WAGES AND LONG HOURS

However true to fact may have been the impressions of living and working conditions drawn from fairly typical cases, yet facts from a wider range of inquiry over the uncovered area of the vast field might impair the extent to which conclusions apply. This, however, is true of the statements and impressions given by both sides. For instance, the claim of exceptionally high wages made by Judge Gary, and more still by certain press reports in rejoinder to the findings of the Commission, proved to be true in exceptional individual cases only, or in the case of the small minority of highly skilled workmen. The claim of very low wages on the other hand applies to the great majority of employes, "the bulk of unskilled labor earning less than the average family's 'minimum of subsistence,' and the bulk of semi-skilled labor less than the 'minimum of comfort,' " as these standards for a family of five are set by expert investigations of the United States Government.

The long hours likewise are gauged up or down as viewed from two effects. Their overdraft on the strength and scant time for recuperation of the workers is unquestionably a legitimate cause for this discontent and for interference on their behalf. On the other hand, the desire and even the demand for the most earnings in the least time upon the part of perhaps the 30 per cent. of employes who are young, strong and single men, may be cited in extenuation of the twelve-hour day, if not of the seven-day week. In either event, however, these excessive hours are so manifestly against public health and welfare as to justify the severe condemnation of the report. Since the strike eight hours became the basic pay day, with time and a half for overtime. While this increases the wage, it leaves the long day compulsory and strengthens the incentive to tolerate or demand it.

The variation of the hours of the working week in the different steel plants is inconsistent with the repeatedly cited "instructions" from Steel Corporation headquarters to the subsidiary companies. It is still more inconsistent in view of the alleged facts that the average steel week in 1919 was 2.4 hours longer than in 1914 and 1.1 hours longer than in 1910; that 52 per cent. of the steel workers still work the twelve-hour day, or 76.4 hours per week of six days—a larger proportion of them than ten years ago—and 46 per cent. approximate a seven-day week, working 78.5 hours. It is due to the management to explain that in some plants an eighth man has been added to a crew of seven, so that each man is laid off from work in the continuous operation one day in the week. By changing from the day to the night shift at the end of the off day, the "long turn" of twenty-four hours may also be obviated. This improvement in working conditions is claimed to have been made years ago when the Steel Corporation directed its subsidiary companies to discontinue a seven-day week. It is also fair to state that while the twelve-hour day men are in attendance all day yet they do not work continuously, and have intermissions between their "spells" of hot, hard work.

The comparison of hours and wages in the United States Corporation plants with those prevailing in other basic industries not only, but in some independent steel works, notably the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, is to say the least invidious. Their substitution of the eight-hour day for the twelve-hour day justifies the conclusion of the report that the longer hours are not essential in the continuous industry.

Living Conditions Still Bad Though Improving

The description of actual living conditions bears chiefly upon the inadequacy of wages to maintain the comfort or the subsistence of a family of five and especially to provide for housing conditions compatible with decency and health. The public menace of this situation is intensified by the overcrowding of large families. It is alleged, but without reference to the sources of the statistics, that 15 per cent. of the immigrant steel workers' families average ten members, and 37 per cent. of Croatian and 21 per cent. of Magyar families have more than ten members. Scant figures are given however to supplement the Pittsburgh Survey report on the housing of the steel workers in 1909. The worst conditions that the forthcoming United States Census may disclose are indicated by the census figures cited from Braddock, Pa., in 1920, where 200 families were found in 61 houses, one house sheltering 35 boarders, who occupied the beds in three shifts, each bed serving three persons every twenty-four hours.

Judge Gary's reference to such single men was: "Some men prefer to secure their own places of residence, save money and take it home abroad. Of course this is not objectionable from our standpoint at all." Ignorance of or indifference to such living conditions neither escapes the notice of the workers' spokesmen nor does credit to the better conditions provided by some of the subsidiary plants.

One such spokesman takes notice of them thus: "While the employers lived in gorgeous palaces, the workers found themselves, for the most part, crowded like cattle into the filthy hovels that ordinarily constitute the greater part of the steel towns. Tuberculosis ran riot among them. Infant mortality was far above normal. Though several increases in wages were granted after the war began, these have been offset by the terrific rise in the cost of living. If the war has brought any betterment in the living conditions of the steel workers, it cannot be seen with the naked eye."

The Japanese Question in Southern California

American Legion Makes Race Problem More Acute

By Rev. George F. Kenngott, D.D.

Anti-Japanese resolutions by the American Legion in state convention assembled recently at San Diego, Cal., the anti-Japanese attitude of the Republican candidate for the United States Senate from Southern California, a leading Christian layman, anti-Japanese resolutions by Chambers of Commerce and anti-Japanese utterances in public and private by all kinds of men and women, lead one to believe that something is the matter with the Japanese or their antis or both. If social conversation lags or business slackens, the mention of the Japanese starts silent tongues a-wagging and makes the quiet machinery hum. The air becomes electric as in a New England thunderstorm actualized or a California earthquake as reported in New England newspapers!

The American Legion, representing the most recent heroes in the great World War, who fought to make democracy safe for the world, solemnly "whereases" that "the men returning from the service of this country find their occupations in the hands of these unassimilable aliens and whole agricultural sections completely dominated by them to the exclusion of service men," and, therefore, resolves "that we go on record as being in favor of the adoption of the following: (1) cancellation of the 'gentleman's' agreement; (2) exclusion of 'picture brides'; (3) rigorous exclusion of Japanese as immigrants; (4) confirmation and legalization of the policy that Asiatics shall be forever barred from American citizenship." And, then, the Legion equally unanimously and enthusiastically recommends an initiative petition to obtain a state law permitting boxing bouts of not more than fifteen rounds. Boxing makes a counter-irritant for Jiu-Jitsu!

And, now, comes the Republican candidate for the United States Senate with a long and comprehensive statement of his political creed, covering such articles as the elimination of waste, need of farmers, forestration and irrigation, closing with this ex-cathedra statement:

"We have no place in California for any race or any people who cannot assimilate with us and who cannot become citizens under our constitution. At the present rate of increase, it would not be very long before there would be several hundred thousand Japanese in our midst, and you cannot introduce into our body politic a race as distinctively alien as the Japanese without irritation and outbreak. . . . I am in favor of eliminating all ownership or control of our lands by these alien and unassimilable people and of the admission of no more of them. . . . Safety lies only in an exclusion policy that shall apply as rigidly to the Japanese as to the Chinese."

The same attitude was suggested by the pastor of one of the largest Protestant churches (not Congregational) in Los Angeles, when he spoke upon "The International Aspect of Americanization" at the recent conference on Japanese Christian Americanization in the Japanese Christian Institute of Los Angeles. He compared the Japanese racial problem to that of the Negro problem, the solution of which was that they should never have come to America! They probably would agree with him. He was not quite daring enough to approve the Dixonian solution of deportation, although he seemed to recommend that Japan should be for the Japanese, hermetically sealed in the tight little islands.

The treatment of the Japanese by Americans (at least by these representative Americans, some of whom were born elsewhere than America) follows the trail of the American Indian diplomacy.

Grave Inconsistency

Of the Pilgrim Fathers some one has said facetiously, "They fell on their knees and then on the aborigines!" We sent missionaries to Japan and then blew open the hermit nation with our guns—at least we turned them on her. We brought the Japanese to our shores to till the soil and raise the garden stuff and to do the work which would break our backs and blister our hands; and now our politicians, if not our statesmen, our ecclesiastics and religionists, if not our Christians, would corral them in Japan as for years we forced the real native Americans (called Indians), into reservations, treating them as animals, things, or men apart, and declared them in consequence unassimilable, unfit for citizenship in the very land of their fathers.

In these days when, as the afore-mentioned divine intimated, "the Pacific is only an irrigation ditch separating Japan and America," when the wireless, the steamship, the dirigible balloon and aeroplane have "made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth," it is an anachronism to declare that the rest of that statement by Paul—"and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation"—means that the Japanese are to be shut up in the carefully guarded reservation of Nippon. One might as well try at this late day to turn Niagara back to its source, to deport the Negroes to Africa whence they were forcefully brought to America for economic reasons, to incarcerate the free-born Indians in reservations, as to deport the Japanese to Japan, or build anew Pillars of Hercules at the Golden Gate, with glaring lights by night reading: "Japanese prohibited—America for Americans—Keep off the grass."

The facts are that the California population of approximately 3,500,000 includes about 80,000 Japanese. While the Japanese population increased 40,000 in the last decade, the total population increased a million. The total area of California is 99,898,880 acres, of which 28,828,951 is farm land, 11,389,894 improved. The total acreage of Southern California is 28,923,980, total acreage of assessed land, 9,326,411. The total improved farm land in this section is 1,862,778 of which the Japanese own 4,885 acres and lease 100,102. As to the birth rate, the facts are that it increased rapidly after 1913 when the three-year land lease law was enacted, but a recent survey of the Japanese in rural Los Angeles County records a tendency already to a declining birth rate, especially since Japan has of her own accord stopped the picture-bride system.

STANDARD OF LIVING

As to the standard of living, the Japanese will doubtless pass through the same experience as that of the various immigrant races to New England. Prof. Francis A. Walker called attention to the fact that between 1850 and 1870 the rate of increase in the native population of the United States fell sharply off, and "between 1870 and 1890 the decline has been accelerated." "As foreigners came, the native population withheld their increase." He said: "The access of foreigners, at the time and under the circumstances, constituted a shock to the principle of population among the native element. That principle is always sensitive, alike to sentimental and economic conditions. The decline occurred by singular correspondence with the excess of foreign arrivals but chiefly also in those regions to which the newcomers most freely resorted.

"Throughout the northeastern and northern middle states, into which the newcomers poured in such numbers, the standard of material living, general intelligence and social decency had been singularly high. Life had its luxuries. Then came the foreigner (no blame to him) with a vastly lower standard of living, but too often having an actual present incapacity to understand refinements of life. There was a sentimental reason strong enough to give a shock to the principle of population." Furthermore, the "American shrank from the industrial competition thus thrust upon him. The people of the free states became divided into classes—natives and foreigners. . . . The more rapidly foreigners came into the United States, the smaller was the rate of increase. . . . Foreign immigration has amounted, not to a reinforcement of our population, but to the replacement of the native by foreign stock.

"From 1830 to 1860, the material conditions of existence in this country were continually becoming more favorable to the increase of population. . . . The checks for native growth were not physiological and climatic, but social and economic; and chief among them was the access of vast hordes of foreign immigrants bringing with them a standard of living at which our people recoiled. When working on the railroads and canals became the sign of a want of education and of a low social condition, our own people gave it up. . . . It is to be doubted whether any material growth, which is to be secured only by the degradation of our citizenship, is a national gain, even from the materialistic point of view."

Each new alien race has brought a lower standard of living. This has shown itself in the overcrowding of tenements, in the use of cheap and often insufficient food, and in the absence of the simplest comforts of life. Each new alien race under the impulse of larger wages here than in the homeland spends much of its energy in reproduction, until, becoming acquainted with the higher standards of the new land, it raises its standard, only to be in turn assailed by a new race with again a lower standard; and so the battle of the standards continues. Thus at preesnt, the Greeks in Lowell, Mass., receiving in actual wages five times as much as in their own land, where they lived as farmer or shepherd, are beating at the gates of the French-Canadians, who have steadily raised their standard of life. Each race withholds its increase under the depressing influence of newcomers. Thus the birth rate and mortality of the Greeks are increasing, while with the French-Canadians, as with their predecessors, the Irish and native Americans, the birth rate and mortality are decreasing.

The battle now has simply shifted from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific Coast. Already the Japanese in Southern California show signs of a higher standard of living as a result of their contact with American people. Everywhere there is evidence of two heredities, racial and social. It is fairly easy to identify the racial heredity of little children in the kindergarten. It is not so easy, owing to the change which social heredity makes, to identify racial origins in Harvard University.

We have made it practically impossible, or at least very difficult, for Japanese to own land. Therefore, they "skin" the land which they lease or rent, as many Americans have done under similar circumstances. We have forbidden them to become American citizens. Therefore, they congregate in little Tokios and then we charge them with being unassimilable.

The last crowning, crushing argument against them, when everything else fails, the argumentum ad hominem which becomes often a reductio ad absurdum, is the question, "Would you have your daughter marry a Japanese?"—a purely academic question. And yet, to reverse the order and use the same method, what would Robinson Crusoe probably have done on his lonely island, himself fully recovered from his shipwreck, vigorous, red-blooded, strongly sexed, if in the cherry blossom time, "when the young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love," he had met a fine, attractive, vigorous Geisha girl, and no others were readily attainable? Under the circumstances recorded in Genesis II. and III., history doubtless would have repeated itself, for Adam and Eve, with the serpent tempting them, did not stop to consider racial origins. Observe what happened in the South among the Negro women, and in the West among the Indian women. We should at least be fair in the argument.

THE SOLUTION

As to the solution, that is another matter—greatly involved because of our past treatment of the Japanese, like our past relation with the Negroes and Indians. America claims, and should make good her claim, to be the school of democracy, the land of opportunity, the home of the free-born. As a great university, she has the right to admit only so many as she can train for citizenship ("assimilate" is not a good word for persons; it belongs to things). Her test should be not race (one cannot indict a whole race), not nation (no more can one indict a whole nation), not goods nor even learning, but goodness, personal character and fitness, educability. The test should be personal, not racial, applied in Japan or Italy, in Ireland or Germany, before the emigration started, as Harvard makes the test at Andover. Gulick's suggestion is too wooden and mechanical.

Indeed, the solution of the Japanese question in Southern California lies, like that of every other question, in fairness, justice, good will for all men of every clime and race. America must give to every man, woman and child within her borders the freest opportunity for self-expression and self-realization, and with every possible inducement to do the right.

Los Angeles, Cal.

A Little Interview with Rhondda Williams

It is seventeen years since Mr. Williams made his former visit to this country. During most of that period, a successor to Reginald J. Campbell in the large Union Church at Brighton, he has made for himself a large place in the religious life of that fashionable watering place and in the adjoining region. He has been one of the preachers at City Temple, London, for a great many years, and has run for Parliament once on the Labor ticket. He has written eight or ten books which have had a wide circulation, especially two: "Shall We Understand the Bible?" and "The Working Faith of a Liberal Theologian." While he has never been addicted to ecclesiasticism in any of its forms, he is at present chairman of the local Congregational Union and a member of the Council of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He says with a twinkle in his eye that he believes in Congregationalism because it gives a minister a chance to secure and keep the good will of a single congregation without being beholden to any outside larger body.

Asked as to political and social conditions in England, Mr. Williams frankly said that he agreed with Bishop Darlington of Pennsylvania, who was a fellow passenger on the transatlantic steamer with him, that the Labor party in England is nearer Christianity than either of the other political parties. He has great confidence in the sanity and high-mindedness of such Labor leaders as Ramsay McDonald, J. M. Thomas and Arthur Henderson. He thinks there is no danger of the Labor party in England going over to Bolshevism unless they were driven in that direction by the uncompromising attitude of those who represent capitalism.

Mr. Williams shook his head sadly when he was asked if there were many signs of the continuance of the idealism supposed to have been called forth by the war and of its incorporation into church life. "How could you expect that men who went through such a terrible experience would come back elevated in character? As a matter of fact those who were strongly established before the war may not have been harmed by it, but in the case of many who were leading fairly decent lives, there is no doubt there was some debasement and retrogression." Though Mr. Williams believes that England had no other course than to enter the war, and though his own son was killed in the German offensive of 1918, he sought throughout the entire course of the war to allay bitter feeling and to bring about the kind of peace that would prevent recurrence of strife. He feels that Mr. Lloyd George capitulated in the election of 1918 to the war party, and that he went to the Peace Conference at Versailles handicapped by his promises to them, and was therefore unable to co-operate with President Wilson in the direction of a milder and less provocative peace. Concerning Mr. Wilson himself, Mr. Williams speaks of his own early enthusiasms for his utterances, which seemed to him then little short of those of a prophet, and he still feels that his statement of the issues was a great contribution to the moralities of the situation.

Cheering Notes of Progress on Pacific Coast

Congregationalism Steadily Pushing Forward

Southern California's Best Year

By Rev. George F. Kenngott, Ph.D.

Superintendent Southern California Conference

The record of the Southern California Congregational Conference for 1919 gives cause for unqualified rejoicing. In all respects which may be counted as fair tests of the churches' success—in addition to the membership of the churches and their organizations; in the financial support of the local church, in denominational and other benevolences; in the service of the community in general, and the building of the Kingdom of God on earth—the churches have had in all these respects the most successful year, perhaps, in the history of the Conference.

It numbers 113 churches, 208 ministers, 18,233 members, with a net increase of 395. The Conference raised $96,914.96 for denominational benevolences, far beyond its apportionment. The churches report their property as $2,670,500; salaries, $142,352, with an average salary of $1,548. On the quota of $154,000 for the Pilgrim Fund the Conference raised $166,823.96. For the Emergency Fund, one-third of the churches have pledged $36,000, and the remainder, on a conservative estimate, will raise at least $40,000 more in the autumn, reaching the quota adopted by the Conference Directors.

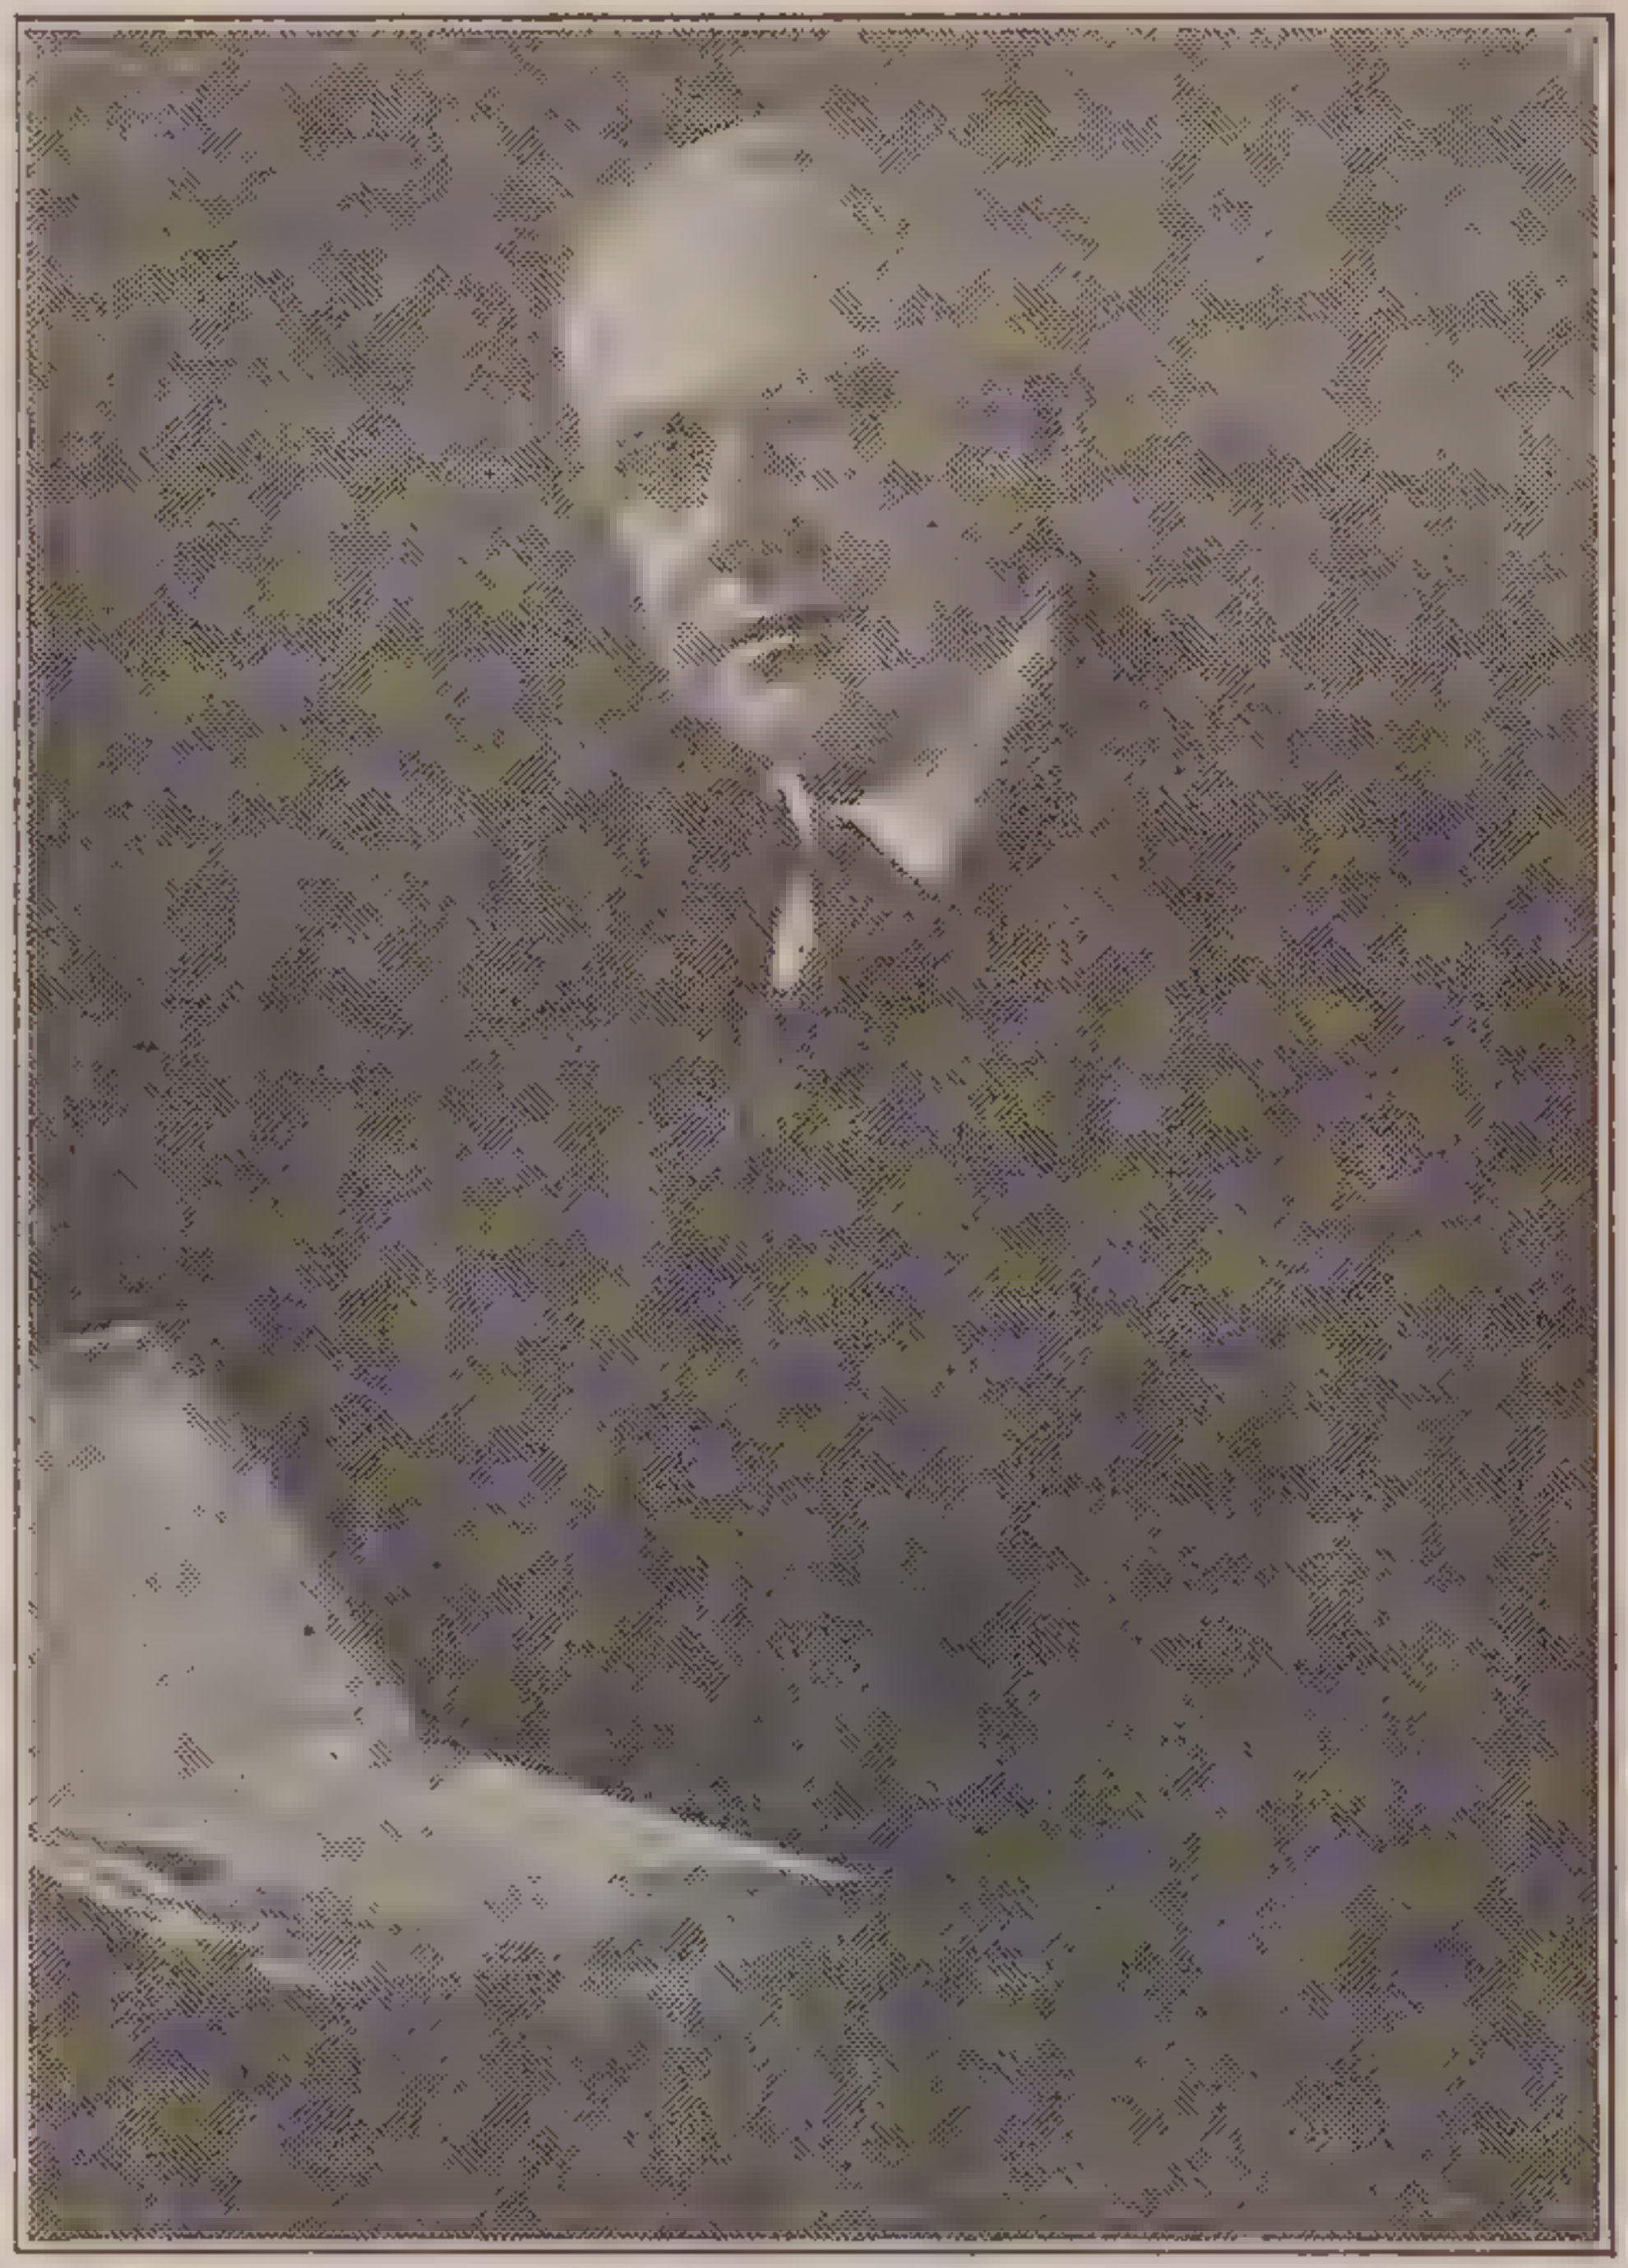
Future of Pacific Coast Assured

By Rev. Leland D. Rathbone, D. D.

Superintendent Northern California Conference

The importance of the Pacific Coast to the United States cannot be too strongly stated. Take California, an area as large as the six New England states, with New York, Ohio, Maryland and Delaware and then some, with land as fertile as that of the states named and a climate much better for agriculture or manufacture than any of them; with water power enough to accomplish all the work of running mills, pulling trains, lighting cities, and the humdrum labor of the ranches; with oil fields and gold mines and many kinds of valuable minerals; facing the ocean with the longest shore line on the globe, and with commodious harbors; and as yet this great land is very sparsely settled and its tillage and commerce and manufacture hardly begun. The future of this coast is assured. Congregationalists need to look well to their interests.



Dr. Leland D. Rathbone

There is good ground to consider the condition of the Northern California Congregational churches hopeful.

1. In 1919 there were more additions to the churches than the average for the five years preceding.
2. In 1919 the membership of the Sunday schools increased by 1,313.
3. In 1919 the membership of the Endeavor Societies increased by 308.
4. The Congregational benevolences for 1919 were over $4,000 in excess of the average for five years.
5. A systematic effort for year-around evangelistic work on the part of the churches has been inaugurated.

Oregon's Hopeful Outlook

By Rev. Arthur J. Sullens, D. D.

Superintendent Oregon Conference

Never were the prospects for Oregon Congregationalism brighter!

A growing Congregational Consciousness is knitting our churches together in fellowship for service. Our First Church of Portland, long pastorless, but now under the inspiring leadership of Dr. McElveen, is helping greatly in this matter.

Dr. A. J. Sullens

The general condition of the churches is most encouraging. Several new church buildings and parsonages are being erected and others are planned. There is evident a deepening and extending of the spiritual life and power manifested in the spirit of evangelism—the Easter ingathering was very gratifying—and also in desire for world service.

From the home missionary viewpoint the wonderful natural resources of the state foretell the unceasing coming of multitudes of people to take part in the development of Oregon's great lumber forests and her wide extending plains, where irrigation projects will be established.

Fostering Pilgrim Principles

By Rev. Lucius O. Baird, D. D.

Superintendent Washington Conference

It is difficult to condense into few words the hopeful things about Congregationalism in the Northwest. The following are simply headlines:

Rev. L. O. Baird, D. D.
Plymouth Church, Seattle, Wash.

Headline One. Big humans developed in big surroundings unreachable by a small religion. Persistent calls for "our kind" of leadership. Three churches offered to other communions refuse to be anything but Congregational although but few of that denomination were in the original groups. Congregations unsupplied during the war with pastors and loyally supporting by gifts and service other local churches, plead for men, and promise increased financial support for community leadership of the Congregational type.

Headline Two. Four thoroughly trained young men of pioneer spirit expected before fall. Union, Yale and Chicago offering their best. The days of the old Yale Band are ahead.

Headline Three. Growing enthusiasm over The Pilgrim Legion, grouping all Congregational Young People's organizations in a program to perpetuate Pilgrim principles in the New England of the West.

Headline Four. Seventy leading laymen and their wives planning a third summer week-end at Seabeck for better acquaintance and to discuss state, national and world problems.

An American Parson in England

The Troubled Times and the Hope of the Future

By Gaius Glenn Atkins, D.D.

Sandown, Isle of Wight, of a Sunday afternoon.—Sept. 5, 1920.

By a happy fortune two numbers of The Congregationalist—Aug. 5 and 12—came in this morning's mail. They have given to the day a suggestion of devotion of which, perhaps, my keeping of it stood in need. Perhaps there will be in time a place in The Congregationalist for some impressions of England as gained by an American parson. A parson, by the way, with an uneasy conscience, for I have had the haunting sense all the day that I should have been in Plymouth attending the tercentenary of the sailing of the Mayflower. The official delegate's card is in my pocket alongside a letter commending me to an English host—Alderman Harrell. Indeed I wrestled for a little with the intricacies of Sandown to Ryde pierhead, and Ryde pierhead to Southampton pierhead, and Southampton to Salisbury and thence to Plymouth, but it was too much for me and I took the way of least resistance up the chalk cliffs above the sea.

The church bells called as they must have called to Dick Whittington—"turn again, delegate, to the Mayflower celebration—or at least come to church"—but like another individual who got in trouble at the seaside I hardened my heart. Perhaps it was just as well. Some of us are chosen vessels for such things and some of us are not. Dr. Barton should have had all the credentials which I have carried about unused in the bottom of my bag. He would have attended with fidelity, said just the right things happily and written delightfully about it afterwards.

But he would never have learned thus what Kingsley meant when he sang of a "sheep-cropped down," nor how Shakespeare felt when he looked over Dover Cliff nor met a flock of horned Dorset sheep attended by a real sheep-dog nor seen the sea become an opal under the changing skies. And, as for church, the opalescent sea taught me—since the sea is His and He made it—that the immensities of life, like the wideness of the sea, are in the hand of God, that beyond far horizons there are appointed havens and though the sea be pathless there are ways to be found even there if one study sun and stars—and this is true of life. May more sea and life alike take their color from the skies above and the depths below and though our tides ebb, they flood again and these, too, are in the hands of God. Surely a surpliced parson could have taught me no more and maybe not so much.

None the less I've the feeling I shall regret not having gone to Plymouth. Any man who cannot imagine himself saying, at the close of his address to the Elder Brewster Congregational Club next Forefathers' Day—"as I stood above Plymouth Harbor three hundred years after the Mayflower sailed into the sunset to find an ampler dawn, I myself took passage in imagination upon that immortal vessel—" has never been troubled by the divine afflatus (whatever that is). Dr. Boynton said, the other day, he wanted to sail down the canal from Delfshaven by exactly the same route the Pilgrims took—"that," he said, "would last me all my life." Here's hoping that he did it and will share it with us all.

Impressions of London

My own main task has been preaching during August in Westminster Chapel and that's enough to occupy one's serious attention and leave him wanting only to be quiet a little when it's all over. It is a challenging congregation, fine, devout, friendly. The service is simplicity itself but the congregational singing is superb. The congregations are so large as to move one always to wonder, especially the seven o'clock in the evening one. Where people enough come from at that hour, in a part of London apparently depopulated of a summer Sunday, to fill the entire area and first gallery of a church seating 2,200 people I don't know yet—but they came. Evidently there are steadfast elements of devotion in the English which we somewhat lack.

Between Sundays I lived partly in the house of a Congregational minister in Kent on the edge of London. The family—a most delightful family—were on their holiday. It was an old farmhouse, rebuilt a bit, with a walled garden—English gardens are delightful once you get behind the wall—and all the things that go with it. We had a delightful young Swiss and two Norwegians and a friendly wire-haired terrier, Jack, in our household. We were looked after by an elderly housekeeper who, when I asked her if she were alone in the world, said she had sixty nieces and nephews she could count—"I think there are more, sir, but I can only count sixty." I felt reassured as to the future of the Empire.

I played a little golf over a course whose velvet turf and noble trees—it had been an old park—were an endless joy and whose bogie was my despair. English golf courses lack our scientific ferocity of artificial hazard but they are harder none the less. The course here—a true "links" which, an expert says, are found only by the sea—with its gorse and furze and blind drives and blinder approaches and its unresting wind, makes the game what Dante would have found it had he been compelled to "drive" up the slopes of Purgatory. The course is closed on Sunday—a rare thing anywhere—and rightly so. No man ought to imperil his soul playing such a course on the Sabbath.

London looks solid and prosperous. One sees little of that mouldy poverty which was in evidence ten years ago in beggars who looked to have come out of sunless cellars, and the English confirmed this judgment. There is less grinding poverty. On the other hand the gentlefolk with fixed little incomes and a pride which will not ask help are the real sufferers and there are pathetic stories of their suffering. The shops of Bond and Oxford and Regent and Picadilly are full of marvelous things some one must buy.

England is the most heavily taxed country in the world and yet, barring private motor cars of which there are more on Woodward Avenue in Detroit than I've seen in Europe, there seems a high level of comfort. There are even people who ride first class. Labor is restless and skimping production. The radical wing is in evidence but competent observers say the conservative element is still the stronger and even predict a break between the left and right. But English public opinion is more just to labor than at home. They recognize that it is a pendulum swinging from a position as far wrong in one direction before the war and in the other direction today. Indeed English public opinion is more judicial on all disputable questions than ours.

I attended a meeting of the Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches at St. Beatenberg in Switzerland—a long and weary journey with much viséing of passports and inspection of baggage and rising in cold, wet dawns and disappointed dwelling in the face of cloud-veiled mountains. But it was worth while to see an international congress and sit at table with Roumania and Servia and Chezcho-Slovakia and new nations and gorgeously clad prelates and hear everything translated three times. I suspect the value of such meetings is rather in the personal contacts than in the resolutions—if the world could be saved by resolutions it would have been saved long ago—and the whole meeting was promising. Dr. Boynton was there with a son who begins to look like his dad (though more slender), and Atkinson and Lynch and Merrill and Idleman and the Lord Bishop of Winchester and other Lord Bishops of far lands.

America and the League

I have found no bitterness of feeling at all toward America—more kindness than we really deserve considering our press and our politicians. They are anxious to know about us and listen gravely to any elucidation of our politics or remarks about prohibition or Henry Ford and why we wear heavy-rimmed glasses. Our problems are simplicity compared with theirs, saving always the complexity of our population. They are bothered from Mesopotamia to Ireland and feeling their way through a changing social order. They have their sins of omission and commission but one feels a sense of responsibility for others and justice. They are shrewd traders, getting the extra sixpence in the two shillings and the extra shilling in the guinea, when they can. But they are vastly more than that.

They wonder at our aloofness in the present world situation, they feel we ought to share—and we ought. I have sought information in every direction as to the English position to the League. There is a predominating testimony that the great mass of the people favor it. They wish it would do more, they are passive rather than aggressive in their support but they believe in it and want it tried. And so do their statesmen—with few exceptions—and the bulk of the press.

The League is already a going concern and it is the logical and unavoidable form into which any endeavor to recast international relations must be shaped. And until we can so divide the sea which is breaking under the window by which this is written so that it has only a western and no eastern coast, we can not separate ourselves from this world here and its fortunes. We would do far better to take our share of the world's hardships than to try to keep "safe" or "tranquil," and we would do far better to use a machinery to which all Christendom—barring Germany, Russia and Turkey, if they be Christendom—now belongs than to demand that it all be scrapped and rewritten to make a plank for this or that party at home in its platform four years from now.

But there is no end to all this—one should say something of the happy use of long twilights when all England is outdoors, of endless tea drinking, of cricket at the "oval," where every one stops for tea and, like the brook, the game goes on forever; of the fine family life and the children and parents living together to an extent unusual in America, of the delight of English folk in the sea (on the shore they do everything with the sea save sleep in it and drink it), of the way in which the public houses in London assail the eye and the nose now that we have none at home, of the climate which makes possible so much outdoor life and which this summer has alternately chilled and wet us all the summer through, of English as it is spoken by the English, of the tone of the English press—there is a range and fair-minded solidity in London journalism which the American press sadly lacks—of the joy of walking from stile to stile across fields which have been lovingly tilled for centuries, of the moving suggestion of a land whose very soil is steeped in the things of the spirit and to which we are kin by what is strongest and best in our own life. It is a privilege for which any American parson may be grateful to have shared all this as I have shared it this summer.

On Going Home from America

Being the Farewell Thoughts of an English Country Parson

By Rev. Albert Peel

Pastor of Congregational Church, Great Harwood, Blackburn, England

Irishmen permitting, I leave this country on the Baltic on Saturday, having spent in it three very pleasant months. During that period I have not only attended the International Council, and spent some weeks at work in the libraries of Harvard and Yale, the Boston Public Library, and the Library of Congress, but I have paid more or less flying visits to universities like Princeton, Columbia, and Brown. I have breathed all atmospheres from the pure air of the White Mountains to the unadulterated gasoline of Fifth Avenue or State Street. I have preached in churches in city and country alike, and have met many delightful people connected therewith. I have stayed in hotels of various degrees of comfort and extortion, in the summer homes of some of the greatest Americans (did this country ever produce a finer man of action or a better informed man of affairs than Gen. A. W. Greely?), and, lest I should be exalted overmuch, for one night in what is called in England a "common lodging house" (where I confess I was very glad when morning came).

In my travels I have visited some fifteen of the Eastern states, and in train and hotel I have met many business and professional men, and so have seen a viewpoint other than that of the religious and academic circles in which I have most commonly moved. Such are my credentials. What, then, are my impressions? What my thoughts on going home?

Perhaps I can best state them if I attempt to answer the four questions which Americans have put to me most frequently during the last two or three weeks. They are:

1. What do you think about our politics? What is going to happen in November?
2. What are your impressions of American women?
3. How does our speech appeal to you?
4. What do you think about American manners?

1. What do you think about our politics? What is going to happen in November?

It is not easy to answer these questions in a paragraph, and the rôle of prophet is never an enviable one. My position will be understood when I say how glad I am that I am not called upon to cast a vote in the presidential election. It is a calamity when party so dominates politics that the choice of a President is between two third-rate—or should I be polite and say two second-rate men? America has much bigger and better citizens than the two candidates, and it is a matter for regret that two of them have not been nominated. As it is, many people are in the position of the distinguished scholar who said to me: "I can't vote for Harding, and I'm damned if I'll vote for Cox!" (I don't know if The Congregationalist will print that, but it's exactly what he said!). And this is not only because of the personalities of the candidates. In the main I have moved, of course, in Republican circles, among those who are profoundly dissatisfied with the present Administration, and have generally voted the Republican ticket.

But I have been amazed how many of them, especially of the younger people, have declared their opinion of voting Democratic or not voting at all, because of Harding's conservatism and his reactionary attitude to the League of Nations. Many more are keeping an open mind, praying that before November something will turn up to enable them to vote as they have done before. Yes, I'm very glad I have not to vote this fall.

2. What are your impressions of American women?

Now what is a man to do when a charming hostess confronts him with a poser like this? It is pleasant when gallantry and truth coincide and I can honestly say that I greatly admire American women, and am immensely attracted by the American girl (there is a type, though some people deny it).

The standard of living is higher than in England, and there is more home comfort, and yet the American woman is not a slave to her domestic duties as are so many of ours. Labor-saving devices are so common that even the lower middle-class woman has time to spend on reading, social intercourse, and on her person and dress. Girls mature much earlier than with us (the hair goes up much earlier), and they speedily attain an independence which our girls never know. [By the way, I greatly envy you your climate, which makes possible those admirable boys' and girls' camps, so valuable for physical, mental and social development.] To see a slip of a girl work a Pierce-Arrow through Fifth Avenue, or take a "flivver" through Crawford Notch is a perpetual source of astonishment to the Britisher. And the way the girl is prepared to take up a trade or profession, from stenographer to landscape architect, is altogether inspiring, and I know it is not true to say that while the American girl can drive an auto, she cannot cook a pudding! On this subject I confess I speak with reservations and qualifications, for I am conscious that the majority of women I have met have been of the educated classes, the product of fine girls' schools like the Sarah Porter of Farmington, or of Smith, Radcliffe, or Wellesley. Yet I dare venture to say that the granting of the franchise to women will make more difference to political life in America than in any country where the women now vote.

[May I be permitted to mention one thing that puzzles me? I am far from being conservative in the matter of dress, and I rejoiced to see woman's freedom from convention in the mountains, but I cannot understand why, when one shows as much of one's chest and back as possible, it is deemed immodest to show one's ears. That is a feminine mystery three months has been too short to fathom.]

3. How does our speech appeal to you?

"Appeal" certainly isn't the word, although, as I have been told I speak very good American, I ought to be qualified to write about the American language. The compliment, however, was undeserved, although I can say "sure," and "fine and dandy," and "make a reservation," and know the precise moment to interject, "I get you," or "I'm from Missouri." These are but a few of the many phrases that I have gotten (please note) during my visit, and very expressive some of them are. It is still very difficult nevertheless for me, even now, to understand a genuine American, say a High School boy of 16, wihout listening very intently. It is not so much the pronunciation that is different, as that the intonation and accent, combined with the slurring of so many consonants, make the language almost a foreign one. Many times have I been inclined to say—especially, perhaps, in New York—what I have to say to the Frenchman, "Would you mind going much more slowly?"

The slang is an interesting study in itself, especially that of baseball. Always keen on sport, I quickly tried to read the accounts of baseball games in the daily papers, but I found they were in a language not included in my college course, and I had to say, "Greek I know, and Hebrew I know (with marks of interrogation, please), but what are these?" After watching one or two games, I began to be able to follow the descriptive reports, but the uninitiated must wonder what "fans" and "beanpoles" have to do with the game, and be amazed to read that in the midst of an excited inning, "Babe walked!"

4. What do you think about American manners?

Ah! Much has been written on this subject, and why should I rush in where angels fear to tread? On the whole, I think the position is summed up by saying that with the American the bark is very much worse than the bite! The Yankee is so quick and has so much "pep" that, though naturally courteous and kind, he often appears to be otherwise. Is it necessary to be quite so abrupt in public and private, to say, "Keep out," "Keep off;" snap out, "Wat's that?" to a sentence that has not been heard, or blurt out a curt "Yep" or "Beacon" to a request for information? Especially does the Englishman notice the way children speak to their parents; they always seem what we call "cheeky and you call "fresh," and to hear a college girl shout from one end of the house to the other "Momma" or "Wat?" is certainly an experience not easily forgotten.

But behind all this alertness and bustle, there is real warm-heartedness, and the desire to help, and the children are very lovable.

And so, if for two days more I escape annihilation by the autos, destruction by the elevators, and lunacy from the telephones, I sail for home. Yet I have never once felt that I was in a foreign country, and I have not been treated as an alien, though everybody has known—some by my dress, others by my speech, and all by my boots—that I was a "Johnny Bull." I leave behind me many friends and comrades, and I shall be very glad if duty calls me across the Atlantic again. Will you come? Why, yes, I guess I will.

New York, Sept. 3.

Near East Relief Problems

By James L. Barton, D.D.

Chairman of the Near East Relief

The Associated Press dispatches reporting thieving from the supplies of the Near East Relief at Constantinople, have come as a startling surprise to the great multitude of friends of this Relief which has been the chief agency in reaching the distressed people of Turkey during the last five years. There is no member of the Committee, and least of all its Chairman, who has a word of excuse to offer for those who have been found guilty of a crime worse than mere stealing, for it is nothing less than taking food out of the mouths of the starving and clothing from the backs of the perishing. Private dispatches which have come from Constantinople indicate that the peculations have not been extensive nor long continued. In a communication just received from the Chairman of the Local Committee, Dr. William W. Peet, Dr. Peet says:

> The difficulty comes in the main through the people who have come to us from France. They seem to have been on the whole a seamy lot. Colonel Coombs, the Director, is putting in pretty vigorous work, and no one will be spared who is really guilty.

This letter was written under date of Sept. 7 and shows that the investigations have been going on for a month and that they have culminated in the imprisonment of a considerable number of those who were involved.

Few can realize what is involved in taking vast quantities of food and other supplies into a country that has been war-cursed for years and where famine and pestilence stalk at noonday. Whatever moral standards existed before had been seriously impaired or completely shattered. In addition to these conditions on the field, the Committee was forced to bring in quite a number of American relief workers from France, men who had served in some capacity in the war and were ready for a new adventure. These served mostly as drivers of transportation trucks, a work to which we could not set our limited supply of choice young men who came out from America and who, moreover, were needed in places of larger responsibility. It was impossible to handle the thousands of tons of equipment and supplies without employing large numbers of native workmen. We knew at the outset that there would be attempts at thieving and every precaution was taken to prevent it. A considerable number of British troops were detailed for guard duty, together with some Turkish soldiers, and barbed-wire entanglements were drawn about the area occupied by the landing docks and the warehouses, with the single entrance guarded night and day by British soldiers.

A prison was established in which all thieves when caught were confined for a day or more and fed upon bread and water. The entire outfit was under the command of a United States Naval officer. With all this precaution and watchfulness, from among the some two hundred men employed to unload and warehouse these supplies, one or more would be caught each day with a tin of milk or a pair of shoes or some other small article hidden in his garments.

I have given this narrative to show that from the first the directors of relief knew they were dealing with men who were laboring under no moral restraint, who were in need and to whom the relief stores seemed to represent fabulous wealth. By a process of elimination the worst elements were weeded out and men of greater integrity were substituted. And yet we must remember, as we did not permit ourselves for a moment to forget, that we were dealing with Orientals for the most part, who regard it as no sin to take what they want provided they can avoid detection. Safeguards and counter checks were instituted as far as our tried workers from America were in sufficient numbers to supervise.

It was almost inevitable that there should have been some peculation from the first, but the directors have been alert, recovering in most instances what had been taken and punishing and dismissing the thief. The total amount actually lost by this method has been in the aggregate surprisingly small.

The recent dispatches would seem to indicate that in the present case some Americans are involved. The whole matter is being thoroughly investigated. The American High Commissioner, Admiral Bristol, and the United States Consul General are lending their services as well as the services of their offices. I have every confidence that whatever losses have occurred will be made practically good. The report that the Managing Director, Colonel Coombs, has been giving expensive champagne dinners at the expense of the relief funds, I believe to be a camouflage story invented by those who wish to divert attention from themselves. The local committee of control are Dr. William W. Peet, Treasurer of the American Board for the Near East, Prof. George H. Huntington, Principal of the preparatory department of Robert College, and Rev. Dr. F. W. MacCallum, a missionary of the American Board who is also at present acting as Treasurer of the Near East Relief.

It is inevitable that at the table of the relief headquarters government and national officials should frequently be seen, for with these the Committee must necessarily be in constant relations, and hospitality is an outstanding virtue in the East. This constantly occurred when I was at the headquarters and always to the advantage of our work, but the "feasts" were simple, and champagne and all other intoxicants were conspicuous by their absence. It is unthinkable that the Committee should allow anything of the kind, even if Colonel Coombs should propose it. In fact, Treasurer MacCallum testified before the court that he had paid no bills of that character. More than a year ago an order was issued from Constantinople by the Director of the Near East Relief that drinking could not be permitted among relief workers, and in selecting those to go out from the United States a pledge of total abstinence from intoxicants is required.

I am confident the present cases will be probed to the bottom and to the top. I anticipate we shall find that the prompt and radical action at Constantinople has furnished the reporter with material for a sensational story in the absence of anything more exciting in politics and that the story has lost nothing in the telling.

National Convention at Atlanta

Workers Among Colored People Confer

By Rev. H. H. Proctor

The Eighth Biennial Session of the National Convention of Congregational Workers among Colored People and allied organizations met with the Rush Memorial Church, Atlanta, Ga., Rev. G. J. Thomas, pastor, Sept. 22 to 26. The church was assisted as host by the First Church of Atlanta and the Atlanta University. There was a representative attendance from the Colored churches all over the country and from the A. M. A. schools in the South.

Among the topics discussed were, "The Demand for Enlarged Borders;" "The Angola Mission;" "The Challenge of the Denomination to the Negro in the North;" "Spiritualizing the Social Activities of the Church;" and "The New National Opportunity of Congregationalism."

Among the outstanding addresses were those by Superintendent H. M. Kingsley, in which he presented the challenge made to the denomination by the Negro in the North; that by Miss Drusilla Tandey of Raleigh, N. C., on the work done by social service workers in the church; that by the Rev. A. L. Demond of Charleston, S. C., on the historical record of the Negro in Congregationalism. Rev. Samuel Loomis gave a most inspiring address in behalf of the American Missionary Association.

One of the new features in the convention was the emphasis placed on the opportunity of our churches in the North in view of the emigration of a million Negroes northward within the last four years. In addition to the vigorous address by Superintendent Kingsley, it was also pointed out that this emigration affords the denomination its best opportunity for new recruits. It was contended that while the Negro was changing his environment, he would be ready also for a change to a new denomination, provided its claims were properly presented.

The convention was opened by a sermon by Rev. Spencer Snell of Florence, Ala., in which he made a memorable plea to "Bring the King Back." The convention sermon preached by Dr. Frank Newell White of Chicago made a lasting impression. Introductory addresses were made by the Mayor of Atlanta and other representative citizens, delivering to the convention the keys of that progressive Southern city.

The League of Self-Supporting Churches, Rev. A. C. Garner, Washington, D. C., president, held an interesting session in which it was urged upon all churches as quickly as possible to come to self-support. The Alumni League with Rev. W. W. Cash of Chattanooga, Tenn., president, also held a session in which it was urged upon the graduates of all A. M. A. schools to get together for the common good of the denomination.

The Women's Auxiliary, with Mrs. C. C. Cater of Atlanta as president, held its best meeting. Mrs. F. W. Wilcox, of New York, gave a series of addresses in which she set forth the methods of mission work. Great interest was shown in the work of Mr. and Mrs. McDowell in Africa and over $300 was collected for their support. The auxiliary held a memorial service for the Colored boys who fell in France, with addresses by Chaplain Miller and Dr. Proctor.

A tender memorial service was held Sunday evening in which special mention was made of the late Dr. George W. Moore, the real founder of most of our Colored churches in the South, Dr. Hubert C. Herring, for whom our churches held a very high regard, the Rev. J. H. Pickens of Marietta, Ga., Rev. J. E. Smith of New Orleans, and others.

For the first time the convention decided to hold its next meeting north of the Mason-Dixon line, with the Lincoln Memorial Church of Chicago. For the first time also a layman was chosen for president, Prof. Nathan B. Young of Tallahassee, Fla. Rev. H. H. Proctor was chosen corresponding secretary.

REPRESENTATIVES OF THE WESTMINSTER CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, KANSAS CITY, AT THE LIBERTY CONFERENCE

The Liberty Conference

By Nat Spencer

On the last Saturday afternoon in August, two hundred and thirty-seven Christian men withdrew from the busy life of Kansas City and boarded electric cars for William Jewell College at Liberty, fifteen miles away. For ten years a steadily growing number of spiritually inclined men have been making this over-Sunday pilgrimage for religious conference, meditation and inspiration. The 1920 conference was the largest in attendance and one of the most beneficial in results.

The remarkable spiritual uplift of this communion of kindred spirits with each other and with their creator has attracted more than local attention. There were in attendance Samuel Pettigrew, a full-blooded Navajo Indian from Shiprock, N. M.; P. K. Shih, a Chinaman from Peking; Ralph P. Bridgman, from Omaha, now a student at Harvard; G. W. H. Russell, a former denison of the slums in many states, now a converted holiness minister; H. T. Williams of the Chicago Y. M. C. A.; W. F. Spencer, Springfield, Mo.; Ira Boyd, Muskogee, Okla.; and O. H. Sawers of St. Louis. Among the number present were an ex-mayor of Kansas City, the vice-president of an important railroad, the vice-president of one of our largest banks, two High School principals, the secretary of the Kansas City League of Social Agencies and many other men of affairs in Kansas City.

The program of the Liberty Conference is not given in advance but each number is announced at the preceding meeting. The speakers are known only to the committee. The first event was a substantial meal in the college dormitory. Then came a period of fun led by "A Mutt." "Jeff" had been present on previous occasions but this time he was unavoidably absent. However, "Mutt" was fully equal to the occasion.

Following the dinner the first meeting was held at eight o'clock. The keynote address was delivered by Dr. Cook of the Scarritt Bible and Training School. At the close of the session the men marched to the dormitory rooms of Ely Hall while singing, "On Christ, the Solid Rock, I Stand." Instructions were given to keep quiet and go to sleep. They were obeyed. The men were awakened at 6.30 by music from the cornet and piano and called to a seven o'clock morning watch. At the dismissal each man was given a copy of Henry Drummond's leaflet, "How to know the will of God." This was carefully studied until breakfast time at 8.15.

Following breakfast was a period of relaxation until 10.30 when an inspiring address was given by Henry M. Beardsley. Gen. Sec'y C. S. Bishop followed with an address embellished with a recital of experiences in China where he has recently studied the religious and economic conditions as a special representative of the International Y. M. C. A.

Lunch was succeeded by a do-as-you-please time until four P. M. The various denominational groups held meetings of their own. The Westminster Congregational delegation of sixteen men was one of the largest. The afternoon session was given over to the especial religious experiences of selected men and the evening session to a free-for-all relation of individual testimony. It was 10.30 before the leader found himself able to close the meeting. The final session was from 6.15 to 6.45 Monday morning. Then electric cars to Kansas City, breakfast, and the day's duties.

One of the most important elements in the success of the Conference was the music. The pianist played with skill, vigor and personal interest. It was an act of worship for the cornetist to send forth his clear, harmonious notes. The leader directed the voices of more than 200 men with a fervor and pleasure that was infectious. The men truly made "a joyful noise unto the Lord" and as they sang they experienced the reaction of a deepened faith and a joyous communion with God.

The number in attendance was limited by the available accommodations. A five-hundred capacity dining hall at another near-by college is a future prospect when the Liberty Conference attendance will probably be doubled. The results of the conference are not spectacular but are abiding. The "spiritual illiteracy" of some of the men was overcome, all experienced a deeper conviction of the duty and joy of religion as a personal factor and the leaven of the spirit is being felt in the civic and commercial affairs of the community.

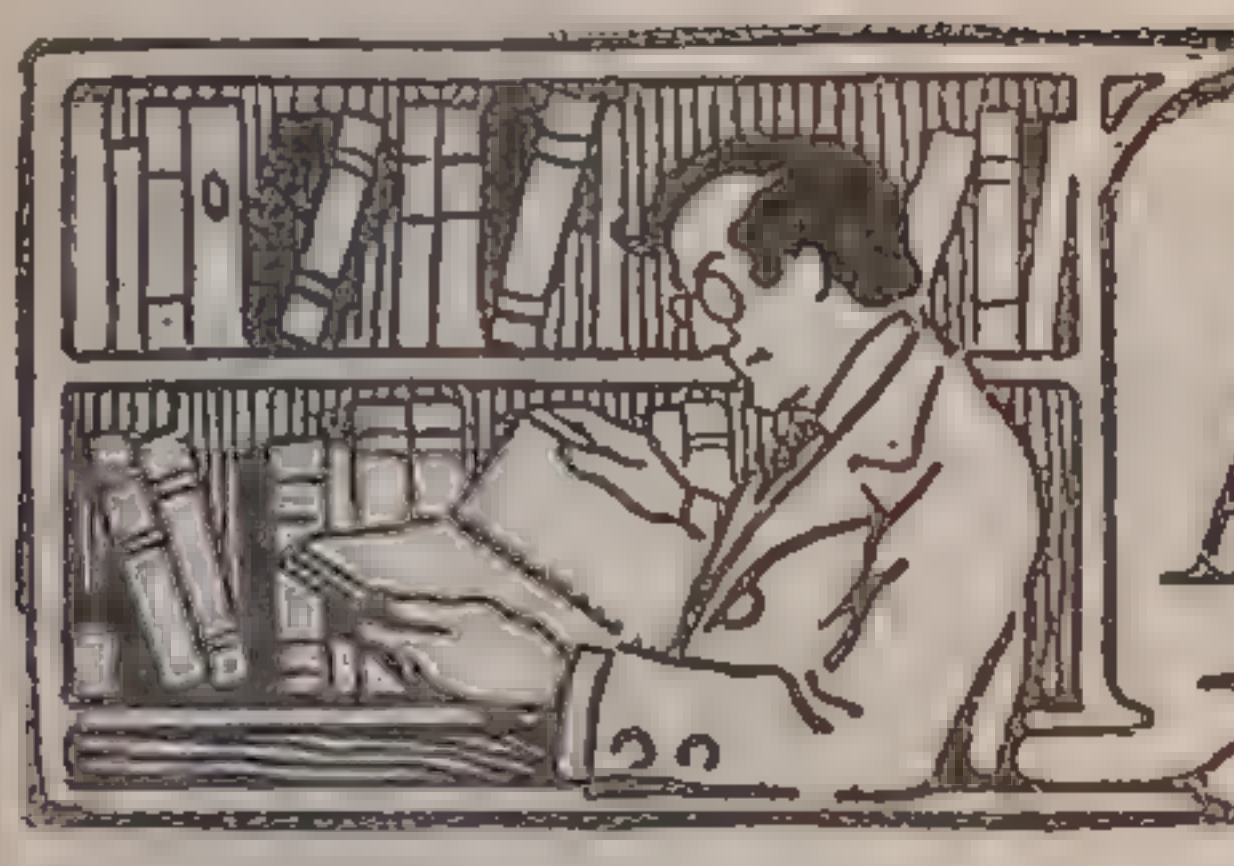
The conference has been mainly managed by Y. M. C. A. officials but it is purposely not a Y. M. C. A. institution. The purpose of the conference is to provide physical relaxation and, apart from detracting influences, to promote a deeper and a happier spiritual life; not simply to attain a temporary exultation but to inspire a permanent companionship with God. The Liberty Conference is a strong factor in the lives of those who attend.

Dr. Eaton Becomes Secretary

Because of the loss of Dr. Herring, so tragic and irreparable, it devolves upon the Executive Committee of the National Council to appoint one who shall fill out the unexpired term until the meeting at Los Angeles, when the Council itself will elect Dr. Herring's successor. The selection has been made of Pres. Edward D. Eaton, who will at once undertake the duties of the Secretary. He will be at the New York office at stated times during the month and whenever his presence is necessary. He will also be free to speak in the interests of the denomination and to confer with committees and individuals wherever his counsel may be desired.

The Committee deems it fortunate that such a man is available who, by varied experiences in administrative positions, by wise judgment and considerate mind, is so well fitted temporarily to undertake the responsibilities of this office. We bespeak for him that spirit of cooperation which will enable him, in the difficult situation, to promote those interests that were so ably guided by Dr. Herring.

CHARLES F. CARTER.
Chairman of the Executive Committee.



AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Concerning America

The Pilgrim Republic, by John Abbott Goodwin (Houghton Mifflin). First published in 1888, this work has long been recognized as the most complete and popular history of the Pilgrims after their arrival at Plymouth, down to 1732. But little of great importance has been discovered since concerning the history on this side of the sea. It is fitting therefore that this standard work should be reprinted as a Tercentenary Edition. An elaborate Index greatly adds to the value of the work.

The United States in the World War, Vol. II., by John Bach McMaster (Appleton). The first volume of this admirable history covered the ground from the opening of the World War up to 1918. The present volume opens with the appearance of submarines off our coast in May, 1918, and closes with two long detailed chapters on the Treaty of Peace and its rejection by the Senate. The body of the book surveys war work at home, the part of our troops in the fighting in France, the Armistice, the President's visit to France and the Peace Conference. With material gathered not only from American but also from German and French sources the author has provided the most complete account of America's part in the war and in subsequent peace discussion that has been published. In Appendices the texts of the Armistice, the Proposed Covenant and the Covenant of the League of Nations are presented in full.

The United States, an Experiment in Democracy, by Carl Becker (Harpers). An interesting popular review of the development of the democracy of the United States from Colonial days, with suggestive comment. "In entering the war the United States needed to be quite sure, and in guaranteeing the peace she needs to be quite sure, that it is democracy and not capitalistic imperialism that the world is being made safe for. She needs also to be quite clear that making the world safe for democracy is not the same thing as imposing upon the world her own brand of democracy," is one of the characteristic remarks which indicates the nature of the work. It closes with a clear statement of the present trend of political events.

People of Destiny, by Philip Gibbs (Harpers). A serious and friendly account of the impressions gained by this famous war correspondent on a recent visit to this country. The Adventure of Life in New York, Some People I met in America, Things I Like in the United States, America's New Place in the World, What England Thinks of America, Americans in Europe, are the chapter titles. They convey a general idea of the great variety of matters considered. It is a delightful book to read, though it is not by any means wholly flattering. As the title indicates he expects great things of America and in his appreciation of our difficulties he doubtless reveals the growing sentiment in England. We heartily commend the volume to our readers.

Everyday Americans, by Henry Seidel Canby (Century). An interesting study of the American mind, "as manifested in the American of the old stock." It has chapters on Conservatives, Radicals, Conservative-Radicals, American Idealism, Religion in America, Literature and the Bourgeois American. The author has been teacher of English at Yale, one of the editors of the Yale Review, and writes with abundant authority a very interesting and encouraging series of essays. It is well worth careful reading.

Short Stories

Famous Detective Stories, edited by J. Walker McSpadden (Crowell). Eleven selected stories by such authors as Poe, Gaboriau, Conan Doyle, Stevenson, Hornung, etc. A choice collection.

Famous Psychic Stories, edited by J. Walker McSpadden (Crowell). Twelve stories selected from the writings of Hawthorne, Poe, Wilkie Collins, E. F. Benson, etc., each, with one exception, not exactly a "ghost story," but of the psychic type. They are "little classics."

Turn About Tales, by Alice Hegan Rice and Cale Young Rice (Century). Ten short stories, each author in turn telling one; hence the title. They are choice stories, in which pathos and humor are well blended.

Century Co. From Turn About Tales

The Story of Jack, by J. Horace Lytle (Pettibone, McLean). Jack, an Airedale terrier, followed his master to the Klondike in the gold rush and died to save his master. It is a great dog story and there are a half dozen more short stories all about dogs.

Chill Hours, by Helen Mackay (Duffield). These short stories and sketches lay bare the heart of France in the days following the close of the war. There is pathos and power in them.

Monday Club Sermons

Monday Club Sermons, 1921 (Pilgrim Press). This is the forty-sixth series of sermons issued by the Monday Club. The fact speaks for itself. The lessons in the International Uniform series for 1921 are after a new order. The first quarter is devoted to the life of Christ, concluding the lessons for the fall of 1920. The second quarter is devoted to social topics. The third and fourth quarters are given to the Life of Paul. As in previous volumes over a score of Congregational ministers contribute one or two sermons each, a sermon to a lesson.

On Religious Themes

How to Use the Bible, by L. Wendell Fifield (Womans Press). The author is a Congregational minister at Sioux Falls, S. D. He has made not only a popular textbook but a real help to the average man and woman in the pews, as he discusses Modern Attitudes toward the Bible, Methods of Making the Bible Effective, Great Verses and Chapters and similar themes. It would make a good textbook for an adult Bible class.

The Eyes of Faith, by Lynde Harold Hough (Abingdon Press). A series of papers on the relation of experience to the present-day problems of religion.

Behold, a Sower! by M. Louise C. Hastings (The Beacon Press). A choice collection of inspiring quotations in prose and verse taken from many authors, largely Unitarian, arranged as daily readings for young people.

New Furrows for Old Fields, by William Chalmers Covert (Doran). Stimulating and suggestive statements that will help us in taking account of stock—like new emotions released, new assurances of faith, new zones of love, new types of leadership, new estimate of the church and new signs of Pentecost.

The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War, by the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook (Association Press). A study by a number of American religious leaders showing the enhanced significance and urgency of foreign missions in the light of the war, the war's effects in various countries and a fresh consideration of missionary principles and policies.

A Better World, by Tyler Dennett (Doran). A study of the religious resources of the world for the preservation of peace, emphasizing the fact that the one great hope of the world is in Christianity.

It's a Good Old World, by Bruce Barton (Century). Fifty little editorials, pointed, sane and interesting, mostly practical lessons of life, written for various papers.

What Religion Is, by Bernard Bosanquet (Macmillan). A helpful volume dealing with the simple, fundamental principles of religion. It appeals to the mature mind rather than to the youthful inquirer, on such themes as Salvation, Freedom and Power, Unity with God, Man, and Nature, The Nature of Sin, Prayer and Worship, the Religious Temper, etc.

Jesus Christ Is Born Today, and Never Mind Me, by Margaret Slattery (Pilgrim Press). Two little paper-bound booklets, each containing three or four brief but vivid and impressive messages, calculated to quicken and encourage the Christian life. Good for young people and also for older readers.

The Real Christ, by R. A. Torrey (Revell). A series of sermons in a characteristic vein by one of the most ultra conservative and literal interpreters.

A Guide to Bible Study, by Harry E. Richards (Oxford University Press). A non-critical handbook of Bible study from Genesis t Revelation, by a layman. It follows Geike and Edersheim in the Old Testament.

Purpose in Prayer, by Edward M. Bounds (Revell). "Prayer is a disinfectant and a preventive. It purifies the air: It destroys contagion." . . . "Prayer puts God in full force in the world." These are sample extracts from these devotional essays which are a worth-while addition to the literature of the "Inner Chamber."

The Christian Task, by J. Harold Dubois (Association Press).

The Near East: Cross Roads of the World, by William H. Hall (Interchurch Press).

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

What the King Requires

International Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 24. Matt. 5:1-10; 43-48.

We have seen that the first message of Jesus announced the near approach of the Kingdom of God. This simple description required working out in practical detail. This Jesus did. His teaching always was concrete and was related to the practical life of men.

1. The Master's "Blesseds." The beatitudes are the first statement of what the King requires. But the way to understand them is to begin with the key word "blessed," which indicates, not what the King commands but what he gives. The word means "happy." It is the best single word to interpret the habitual spirit of the Kingdom, which is happiness. Religion, according to Jesus, was designed to make men happy. This is its temper and result. This happiness flows from certain habitual dispositions, as follows: 1. Poverty of spirit; 2. Sorrow; 3. Meekness; 4. Yearning for righteousness; 5. Mercy; 6. Purity of heart; 7. Peaceableness; 8. Enduring persecution and reproach. These eight qualities or graces the King requires. Poverty of spirit does not mean a poor, weak spirit. The poor in spirit in the time of Christ were those who were eager and expectant for God's Kingdom to come. They were, like Simeon and Anna, "looking for the consolation of Israel" (Luke 2:25-38). Mourning includes far more than sorrow caused by the death of loved ones; it involves sorrow for the woe of the world, for personal sin and for everything that separates us from God. Persecution has so far passed from our modern life as the result of following Christ that we understand only with difficulty what it means. Nevertheless, one seldom starts out to follow Christ fully without soon coming into some kind of a practical situation where "persecution for righteousness' sake" becomes a reality. Let anyone try to put the principles of Jesus into practice fully in business, in politics, in social relations, and sometimes even in the church, and he will discover that he has to pay the price of opposition in terrific measure.

If you were to set down carefully the requirements for membership in the Kingdom of God today would you include any, or all of these qualities? In what order would you place them? What new ones would you add? Name the qualities that come to your mind as the marks of a modern Christian.

2. The Law of Love. One expression of the old law is found in Lev. 19:18. The love of one's neighbor is commanded explicitly here. Hatred of one's enemy is not; it did not need to be. Jesus gave here the most searching command concerning the exercise of love that is to be found anywhere. There are no modifications to it. He does not say, Love your enemy if he becomes penitent and seeks your pardon. He does not impose any conditions on his commandment. He says plainly and explicitly that we are to love those who do not love us.

This is one of those items in the Christian life which we affirm and approve in general, but which we seldom face squarely or apply concretely. But if Jesus meant what he said and if the command has any authority it applies without stopping at any barriers that we interpose. It means that the time to love the Austrians and Germans and Turks, even if we hate their sins, is now, in spite of any hardness that they may be showing. Let us look the whole situation squarely in the face. Jesus may have stressed the point strongly—over-emphasized it, in fact—in order to make it clear. But this strong emphasis does not make the command less valid or limit the range of its application. What does it mean, therefore, for Americans to love Germans now? We have suffered and all the world will suffer for a generation on account of their selfish and brutal action. Granted, that they had no monopoly on the practice of selfish nationalism, their action has plunged the world in woe. If the war has taught us anything it is the futility and the crime of war. Germany could not conquer the world; the world cannot "crush" Germany. Force and diplomacy have been tried in vain. Good will and confidence never have been fully tried. Jesus asked us to try what love would do. He was sure that it would finally conquer. He practiced it himself. Was his program a success? It is not difficult to practice love on far-off people who have done us no harm; but the disagreeable neighbor, whose faults are all so well known to us—and ours also known to him, let us not forget—and the German and the Turk! Can we love them? Can an Armenian love a Turk? Can a Frenchman love a German? Are we to indulge our hatreds? Can we trust love?

The Study of the Bible

III. What is the Bible?

Even a partial answer to the question, What is the Bible? should aid us greatly in interpreting the Book. Wrong ideas about the Bible have often made a satisfactory interpretation impossible. Many parents and teachers hardly know what or how to teach because they have no adequate point of view from which to approach the task.

If salvation is not obedience to an inerrant external rule, but the possession of a new inner life, a change of ruling purpose, an achievement of Godlike character, moral fellowship with God, realized through seeing what God is as revealed in Jesus Christ, by turning from sin, and by giving our lives to him in trust and obedience, then all parts of the Bible are not necessary to salvation and salvation is in no way dependent upon an infallible book.

We have not been fair with this matchless Book. Most of us come to the Bible with a theory of inspiration which necessitates its being an authority in history and science, when we should know that the keenest and deepest spiritual insight adds nothing to one's store of historical or scientific facts. Inspiration is primarily in the realm of morals and things spiritual.

The Bible is primarily a book of religion, a book of life, a story of redemption. It has history, literature, and reflects the science of its time, but the distinctive thing is its religious interpretation and use of all these. Not geology, even though Genesis has an account of creation, which was a common Semitic tradition, but the religious interpretation of creation; not literature, though it has all kinds and some of the best; not ethics, though its ethics are the loftiest known—religion is its theme; it has to do with God and man and the life which follows from right relations between them. It is a story of God's effort to redeem man by bringing him into fellowship with himself. This is primary; all else is secondary. This is the greatest religious and moral book of the world. Redemption and character are its supreme interests. It should be judged in the light of its purpose. We lay upon it a burden which it is not able to bear and which it was never intended to bear, when we try to make it authority in fields outside the scope of its purpose.

> Religion made the Bible, not the Bible religion.
> Religion was before theology or interpretations of religion and has endured through countless changes in interpretation.
> All parts of the Bible are not necessary to salvation. Communities in India have found God through the Gospel of Mark alone.
> Let us go with Jesus who treated the past as a guide-post—not a hitching-post.

While the Bible is not a Book of Science, if it is permitted to correct itself by judging and interpreting its lower religious teaching in the light of its highest teaching, we may safely say that it is a Scientific Book in the field of religion and redemption.

The Bible is the story of Hebrew and early Christian Religion, culminating in the supreme revelation of God and the way of life in Jesus Christ. It is the product of the social experience of Hebrew community life under the guidance of God.

Before applying the point of view we have been developing, in actual interpretation of the Bible, it will help us if we realize:

1. That religion made the Bible, not the Bible religion; that the Bible is founded in the fact of religion, not religion in the fact of the Bible, much less in some particular theory about the Bible.

2. That Christianity being a new life of good will to God and man, following Jesus Christ in the committal of our lives to God in trust and obedience, rather than conformity to external rules and laws, then it is immaterial whether or not the Bible is infallible.

3. That inspiration being in the realm of morals and things spiritual, we should expect

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

What is a "Square Deal" for Our Negro Population?

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 17–23

BY GEORGE L. CADY

Scripture Passage. Gal. 3:26-29; Col. 3:11-14.

Think of the world to which Jesus came—a world of rigid castes within the nation and between nations. The national and racial boundary was the limit of pity or human regard, with the darkness only now and then relieved by a Good Samaritan.

The League of Pity. George Mathewson says that Christianity was a "League of Pity," and for the first time Pity went out into the world not asking, "Who is in need?" but "What is the need?" But first it had to be a League of Justice, for Pity without Justice is idle and often selfish.

The need was never greater and the young heart can become Christlike in no more significant way. "If you are God's child then make it known by your mercies, your kindness, your long suffering, your humbleness of mind and above all things by your charity for all mankind." Racial lines are being drawn more clearly. The gulf between those who differ in color and language is greater than before the Great War. Christ and all Christlike hearts must bridge this gap.

What Is Equality? There is a sense in which "all men are not born equal" and no artificial law can make them so. Men will always start out handicapped for the race by inheritance and environment. But the equality for which every Christian must strive is equality of opportunity, the right to climb.

Christian Equality. If we only believe that the man of color is also a son of God, we shall not rest until every influence which has fitted us to live our rightful life shall be within reach of every boy or girl without regard to color. There were thousands of slaves in the early church but no grave of a slave has ever been found in the Christian burial places. Paul found a runaway slave, Onesimus; he sent him back to Philemon charging him to receive him as a brother. Across the communion table of the early church slave and master clasped hands.

If our colored brother—black, yellow or brown—must go to a separate school, we shall make that school equal to our own. If he goes to college, we shall open every door to every cultural influence as wide for him as for ourselves. If he attends a separate church, we shall help him to make that church as attractive and helpful as our own. And wherever these opportunities are not within his reach, we shall leave no stone unturned until they are. We shall do this because "they too are the sons of God."

LIVING TOGETHER

If ye fulfill the royal law, according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well. James 2: 8.

Thus, these brethren, receiving of the same Spirit from their Head, Christ, are most strongly bent to the good one of another. If there be but a thorn in the foot, the back boweth, the head stoops down, the eyes look, the hands reach to it, and endeavour its help and ease; in a word, all the members partake of the good and evil, one of another. Now, by how much this body is more spiritual and lively, so much the stronger must the union and love of the parts of it be each to every other.—Robert Leighton.

"Who seeks for Heaven alone to save his soul,
May keep the path, but will not reach the goal;
While he who walks in love may wander far,
Yet God will bring him where the blessed are."

For the same wind that blows out a candle only fans two faggots into a flame.—D. Crawford.

There are many members, but one body. Their functions differ, but the life in them all is identical. Each is necessary to the completeness of the whole, and all are necessary to make up the one body of Christ. It is his life which manifests itself in every member and which gives clearness of vision to the eye, strength and deftness to the hand. He needs us all for his work in the world and for the revelation to the world of the fullness of his life.—Alexander Maclaren.

We will not, then, quarrel with today, for whatever else it lacks it is full of opportunity. Has it dawned for us upon a hard, bare, seemingly hopeless condition? At least it has left us the opportunity of patience, of inner development—the opportunity, in short, of being good. We can today be cheerful, helpful, serviceable. Do you need comfort? Find it in comforting some one else. It is a sure way.—J. Brierley.

Make us, O God, more faithful in our relations with others, more considerate of their needs and of their weakness, more ready to note the good and refrain from all disdain and scoffing. Persuade us by thy patience with our own neglects and follies. Open our eyes that we may look with sympathetic hearts upon the things of others and be quite free from envy. Rid us of festering dislikes and cleanse our thoughts from all memories of evil suffered, that thy way may be open to take away our self-reproach for evil done. Make us active in all ways of Brotherhood, swift to see all opportunities thou givest us of good will. In the name of Christ. Amen.

—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

Events as Teachers and Preachers

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 24–30

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Lessons from Recent Events. Luke 13:1-5; Prov. 25:25.

Light from the Bible Passages

Jesus drew his lessons not only from near-by scenes and objects but also from recent events of which he was not a part, but which were well known. Pilate's inhuman, brutal treatment of the Galileans and the catastrophe at Siloam, were such incidents. The essential thought in Christ's mind was the imperative necessity for repentance. Delays are dangerous. His message, when he and his disciples found the fig-tree withered, is an excellent example. Another incident is of the disciples' peculiar trip through the cornfields. Many an event happening in far-away lands gives fine possibilities for suggestive lessons. The Book of Acts has good examples of drawing strong suggestions for life from current events.

Leads for the Leader

Current events represent life, and life always furnishes the best material for study. Many of us simply use our minds in recording these events. It would be far more rewarding if we asked occasionally what the meaning of these may be to ourselves. Many a small event may have a large amount of suggestion.

The Great War may not be too hackneyed an event to furnish still such lessons.

A great railroad accident as an example of the danger of taking a chance.

The baseball scandal as a danger signal to weak standards of morals.

The sugar shortage as a test for making the most of life even without some things we think necessary.

Thoughts for Members

"Life's real loss is life unlived. The strength we pay out for a principle enriches us, though the cause may seem a failure. The strength we save through cowardice or selfishness inpoverishes us. The love that is given, though it be not half returned, builds up the heart, while the love that is withheld shrivels it."

God of the earth, the sky, the sea,
Maker of all above, below;
Creation lives and moves in thee,
Thy present life through all doth flow.
Thy love is in the sunshine's glow,
Thy life is in the quickening air;
When lightnings flash and storm-winds blow,
There is thy power; thy law is there.
—Samuel Longfellow.

"The tests of life are to make, and not break us. The blow at the outward man may be the greatest blessing to the inner man."

A Moment of Prayer

Our Father, in whose hands are all the affairs of the world, we recognize that though they may not all result as thou wouldst wish, yet they may furnish us with lessons for the cultivation of our lives. Open our eyes, we pray, to discover these and thus enrich our souls through the influence of these thoughts. Amen.

Margery's Vowels

By Mary A. Thompson

"It's the very snarliest hair in the whole world!"

This is what Margery Blake used to say every morning and night, while her Aunt Louise was brushing her hair. Perhaps she stretched the facts a little, but Margery certainly had her trials, for her hair was not only long and fine and very thick, but it was as full of kinks and tangles as the grapevine tendrils, or a spool of silk the kitten had played with. Besides, when a little girl walks a mile to school, plays tag all recess, and spends her spare hours climbing trees and jumping on the haymows, she can hardly be expected to keep all the snarls out of her hair.

Now though Margery could climb to the tops of the tallest apple trees, she was not very brave in bearing pain. When she felt a pull she would jump or scream until poor Aunt Louise was at her wit's end. Sometimes Father would look up from his newspaper with the remark, "I must take her to town next Saturday and have it cut!"

"Oh, no!" would come from Mother then, and "Oh, not yet!" from Aunt Louise, and "Oh, no!" from Margery herself.

Then the little girl, who really wanted to be good, would be quite patient with the snarls—until she forgot it.

One day, as she came dancing in from school, Father said, "Well, Chicken, what did you learn today?"

"I learned the Vowels," said Margery, proudly; "A E I O U. Teacher said we must say 'em over often so we wouldn't forget."

"A E I O U," said Father, thoughtfully. "Those sound to me like some of the noises a little girl I know makes while her hair is being brushed."

Margery turned rosy red and looked out of the window.

"I'll tell you," said Aunt Louise, quickly, "I've thought of a game we can play. I'll give you five screams every time I brush your hair, one for each Vowel. You can save the worst pull for O, because that sounds the worst. But when you've had all five, you must keep quiet, no matter what happens."

"Well," said Margery; and that night she sat down to have her hair put in order without once saying, "Oh, dear!"

Aunt Louise began to tell a story as usual, but the silence that followed was very unusual, indeed. It is true there were some pulls, but Margery thought them not important enough for a Vowel. At last there came a gentle A.

"That's a good choice," said Aunty, "that was a hard one, I know. Now remember, four more. Well, as I was saying, the princess"—

But the princess was nearly married before Margery could make up her mind to employ E.

"I'm glad you got that in," laughed Aunt Louise, "for now we are all through."

"Why Aunty, and I didn't have the other three at all! What made you do it so quick and easy?"

"I thought the snarls were worse than usual," said Aunt Louise, "but never mind, dear, you can being again tomorrow morning."

Next morning Margery reached I. But if you will believe it (and I'm almost afraid you won't) two weeks passed before she could decide to say O.

"For that ought to be very bad, you know, Aunty. And really, when you come to think, it doesn't hurt so awfully. Why, sometimes I don't get beyond A. But today after I'd been in the woods and got pitch on my hair, I was sure O was all right."

"It's much nicer for me," said Aunt Louise, "but you aren't practicing the Vowels much. I don't believe you could say them all at once if you tried."

"Oh, yes, I could," said Margery, and a month later she proved it.

It was such fun to walk round the big beam above the haymow! Margery had done it many a time, but this once her foot slipped, and she lay, a limp little heap, on the floor. Father ran in from the stable where he was at work and lifting her in his strong arms carried her into the house.

"I'm afraid her arm is badly broken," he said to Mother. "And she minds pain so much that I don't know how she will get through the setting."

The doctor was an elderly man who had seen many strange things. But even he was a little surprised when his patient looked up at his first touch on her arm and said very distinctly, "A E I O U!" Then she shut her eyes and made no sound nor movement till all was over, and she was lying back on the pillows in her own little room.

"Margery, dear," said Mother then, "you don't know how much you pleased us all by being so brave today."

"Yes, indeed!" cried Aunt Louise. "The doctor said you were a real little heroine."

"No one would think you were the little girl who used to cry when her hair was brushed," declared Father.

"Why, you see," said Margery, "I used up the Vowels. It hurt so when he first touched me that I thought it was fair to say 'em all at once. And then there wasn't anything more to say, so I kept still."

Margery's hair is thinner now, and it snarls less than of old, but she still remembers the Vowels. Sometimes when she is in pain, she says to herself, "I wonder if it is bad enough to say O, or had I better wait a while?" And sometimes, while she is waiting, the pain grows better.

A Boy with Two Faces

I've heard about the queerest boy,
  A boy that has two faces;
One face is round and full of joy,
  As out of door he races.
But when his mother calls him in
  He changes to the other,
And that is long and sour and thin—
  I'm sorry for his mother.

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

My last report on the Dorchester Academy (Ga.) Lunch Fund was on July 1, when I said we had $16.52. I said I thought we might reach $25. We have. We have gone way beyond, and left that figure quite out of sight. Today (Oct. 1), it stands at $37.02. I certainly am proud of my Comrades. Just think what that will mean to those boys and girls, walking ten and in some cases twenty miles a day, to get their education at that school.

Names of givers to the Fund not mentioned before are: Mrs. C. A. Skinner, Watertown, Wis., Miss Maria A. Barlow, Ware, Mass., ? from Syracuse, N. Y., Mrs. Charles H. White, Woodford, N. Y., Mrs. Elizabeth E. Alden, Fitchburg, Mass., Everard Webster, Bennington, Vt., the Hansons, Pomona, Cal., Miss Jessie Barlow, Cambridge, Mass.

I should like to give their letters in full, but here are some "bits": Miss Maria Barlow (of Ware) was "an honorary member of the Conversation Corner of blessed memory." She welcomes the Comrades' Corner, reads and enjoys each number. "One of my pleasant memories is of a call from 'Mr. Martin' while I had a short vacation in East Gloucester in the summer of '98. He was so kind and friendly, as if we had always been acquainted."

You will much enjoy this from Mrs. White's letter, written from her "home among the beautiful hills of Delaware County in New York State": "Many years ago my sister spent one year, as teacher, in that school (Dorchester Academy). She was taken ill with malaria, and was obliged to give up the work. She has told me many interesting things about the work there, and I remember especially about the distance some of the children would walk to attend the school. She tells of a true-blue incident that happened in the school. A pupil was reading the Bible verse: 'He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully.' This is the way it was read: 'He which soweth sparklingly shall reap also sparklingly; and he which soweth beautifully shall reap also beautifully.'"

I don't know what "sowing sparkingly" could mean, but "sowing beautifully" is a very pretty thought. If we sowed our thoughts and our words and our little kindnesses that way, it would put a new smile on the face of the earth.

Mrs. Alden is "very glad an Alden has the care of the Comrades' Corner. My dear husband carried that name seventy-nine years," so she feels a friendliness for one of that name. It is a name that signifies very much, and one almost trembles to carry it. It would be so much simpler to be a Jones or Smith or Brown or White, not that I would indicate that those names do not mean much. Only there is such a lot of them!

Everard Webster is another Comrade who had a tiny garden. The potatoes he sold for seventy cents and he wished to send fifty of it for the Fund.

The Hansons number three—Endicott, Muriel and Horace. Endicott was the first prize winner of the first contest we ever had in the Corner.

Well, school has opened at Dorchester, and I hope soon to have a letter from them. We shall all be glad to read it, I know.

I am sure the printer will think we have taken all the space we ought to use this week, so let's be good to him.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

Permanent Exchange of Pulpits

The practice of exchanging pulpits for a service or even for a vacation season is common enough among our pastors, but it is not often that such an exchange is permanent, especially where it is unpremeditated. When Rev. C. S. Price resigned the pastorate of CALVARY, OAKLAND, last spring to take up work on the Chautauqua platform, it was with the intention of making this his permanent work. The church at once began a careful search for the right man as his successor, and during the summer extended a call to Rev. W. A. Schwimley, who since 1914 had been the pastor of LODI, the prosperous city in the center of the Tokay grape district of California. Mr. Schwimley began his work in Oakland on Aug. 1, and the church is looking forward to a period of progress and growing service to the community under his leadership. Lodi made splendid progress in the six years of Mr. Schwimley's pastorate, having nearly doubled its membership during that time and the choice of a new pastor was a matter of great importance.

Mr. Price enjoyed an unusually successful season on the Chautauqua circuit in the Northwest, but the summer's trial of the life of a lecturer convinced him that nowhere else could he find the satisfaction in service that is found in the church of Christ. He definitely decided with the close of his engagement to return to the pastorate, refusing new and attractive contracts for further lecture work. His heart turned back to California as a field and just in time to find that the people of Lodi were desirous of having him pay them a visit. The visit was made and resulted in a unanimous call to the pastorate of Lodi, which was accepted. Mr. Price has entered upon the pastorate with anticipations of effective service together, both on his part and that of the church. D. S.

Santa Cruz Secures Dr. Palmer

SANTA CRUZ was called upon to give up its pastor, Rev. A. W. Hare, for work in connection with the Anti-Saloon League of California, but it was not long pastorless nor did it have to look far for its new leader. At the other end of the 25-mile crescent of Monterey Bay is Pacific Grove, with the Mayflower Church, of which Dr. B. M. Palmer has been pastor since 1912. Through these eight years of service Dr. Palmer has become so well and favorably known in that region that it was to him that Santa Cruz turned when the need for a new pastor came. The cordial invitation of the church was accepted and on Sept. 1 the pastorate began. Santa Cruz is one of the larger churches of Northern California and good things are looked for in this new connection as the days go on. D. S.

Changes at Santa Barbara and Yucaipa

FIRST, SANTA BARBARA, which was led during a period of difficult reconstruction by Rev. Chester Ferris, has regretfully accepted his resignation, this being made necessary for health reasons. The membership recognizes with deep appreciation the heroic and self-sacrificing service rendered by Mr. Ferris during a time of unusual strain.

Santa Barbara's loss is Yucaipa's gain, for that church is rejoicing in Mr. Ferris' acceptance of their call. The service in this country parish near Redlands began in September. Although a distinct contrast from the city parish of Santa Barbara, Yucaipa offers a challenging opportunity and under Mr. Ferris' leadership it is hoped that the church may become a real community force.

Meanwhile Santa Barbara has issued a unanimous call to Rev. J. H. Batten to serve the church as regular pastor, he having been stated supply during the past few months. Mr. Batten's aggressive leadership during this period has strongly developed the church and has aroused the loyalty and devotion of the membership. This was evidenced in their enthusiastic call to him as pastor at a salary of $3,000, with a promise of increase to $3,600 Jan. 1, 1922.

Northern California Conference

The Northern California Conference tried an experiment this year in the holding of its annual meeting at the conference grounds of the Y. W. C. A. at Asilomar, instead of with one of the churches. For some years past there has been a growing feeling that the entertainment of the Conference was too large a task for any of the smaller churches and even the large churches have found that their members have been so burdened with the details of hospitality that they were unable to participate in the meetings. The fine equipment of the grounds at Asilomar offered an opportunity of relief from many problems, but with the increased railroad rates the 125-mile trip from San Francisco was a practical hindrance to a large attendance. However the attendance was exceedingly good, 45 churches being represented by about 175 pastors, delegates and visitors. One church, 200 miles from Asilomar, had 17 representatives. A home missionary pastor and his wife and a delegate made an automobile trip of 600 miles to attend the meeting and the churches farthest away, both north and south, were all represented.

The program was arranged with a view to making this a meeting which should give to the churches the largest possible practical benefit to be carried back by pastors and delegates and to that end the method of informal conferences among groups with kindred problems was largely used. Each morning the last hour was given to such conferences in three groups, of pastors, laymen and women, and these groups discussed such subjects as methods of organization, pastors' problems, church finances, the layman's part in the spiritual work of the church, plans of work that have proven most effective, missionary interests, home and foreign, with a special view to the new plans for the coming year, and other topics of practical value

Another feature of general interest, more or less unusual in a conference program, was the use of one hour each day for a study of modern psychology and its bearing on the teaching of religion, under the direction of Profs. J. V. Breitwieser and C. E. Rugh of the Department of Education of the University of California, both of whom are members of Congregational churches. Miss Sarah E. Bundy, Religious Education Director of the Southern California Conference, also addressed the conference on the need of the recognition of religious education as a matter of primary importance in church work.

The informal hour around the fireside each evening was one of the most attractive features of the program. On one evening greetings were given by churches and associations, with reports of the work of the year; on another home missionary interests had the chief place, and on another the Conference sang together the old songs of the church and the home. At eight o'clock the evening sessions were held in the beautiful chapel, the program including addresses by Dr. J. L. Gordon of San Francisco, Dr. F. J. Van Horn of Oakland, Rev. T. T. Giffen of Fresno, and Hon. J. Stitt Wilson of Berkeley, with a stereopticon talk on the Pilgrims by Rev. E. A. King of San Jose and a special program prepared by the young people of the Pacific Grove Church.

Afternoons were given to rest and recreation, beside the many committee meetings and other informal gatherings which found place during these leisure hours.

Among the important business actions of the Conference was the unanimous adoption of a carefully worked-out program for the year, including an intensive campaign of education in the churches in preparation for the Every Member Drive, which for special reasons it seemed best to hold at the time to which the churches are already accustomed, the first week in December. The apportionment adopted for the year, including the emergency fund of the Congregational World Movement, was $108,500 for missionary work. The program also included special emphasis on evangelism throughout the year, with the Easter ingathering, and the general celebration of the Tercentenary of the coming of the Pilgrims to America on the significant dates.

The practically unanimous feeling of those who attended this first Congregational Conference at Asilomar is that the experiment was a great success and that this should be chosen as the permanent place of meeting. The opportunity for friendly intercourse between sessions and at meal hours and the freedom from distraction and from the care of entertainment of delegates make ideal conditions for thoughtful consideration and careful planning of the work of the Kingdom and the share of Northern California Congregationalists in its upbuilding. A Dozen Years of Notable Service

After a service of 12 years with FIRST, SAN DIEGO, Rev. W. B. Thorp has resigned his pastorate, the resignation becoming effective Oct. 1. In this period of a dozen years the church has grown from an organization of 473 members to a membership of 571. Mere statistics, however, do not give any adequate record of Mr. Thorp's pastorate. His scholarly habits have given his pulpit a strong, intellectual place in the city, his social vision has led the church into lines of community service and his clear judgment has made his personal service to the denomination in Southern California one of real significance.

Mr. Thorp has been closely identified with the activities of the Southern California Conference and has been the natural leader of the ministerial group in the San Diego Association. His latest service to his own church has been in promoting the plan for a new parish house, which is now almost completed. An expenditure of approximately $50,000 has made possible the provision of adequate space for the church school and the renovation of the church building itself.

Mr. Thorp will be greatly missed from the Southern California fellowship. He has not yet announced his future plans.

Reception to Ventura Pastor

A reception at VENTURA, with an attendance of over a hundred, testified to the splendid service of Rev. T. M. Patterson, who undertook the pastorate of that church last April. When Mr. Patterson began his service the church was practically inactive, but his aggressive leadership has demonstrated what powers of rejuvenation lay inherent.

Although Ventura is generously churched, there seems to be a real place for the Congregational organization, for within the brief period of Mr. Patterson's service attendance at Sunday school and church services has more than trebled. Financially the church has steadily increased its support—this in spite of a large street assessment this year which made a serious drain upon their resources. S. E. B.

Mobridge Tries an Experiment

A religious day school in a Western prairie state is a new thing under the sun, but at MOBRIDGE, under the direction of Mrs. L. B. Esch, church assistant, such a school was conducted during the month of June. A two-hour session was held each day. A registration fee of 25 cents was charged, and 75 children from four to 14 years of age attended. A competent kindergartner was secured. A program, including a brief devotional service, music, instruction in temperance and missions, talks on habit, Bible stories, Bible geography, etc., was carried out. In this way 40 hours were given to thorough religious instruction, far more than the children can get in weeks in the ordinary sessions of the Sunday school. It is proposed to try the experiment again next summer. Rev. W. F. Ireland is pastor.

Dedication at Manchester

In November, 1916, the church building at Manchester was destroyed by fire, the pulpit and pews being the only brands snatched from the burning. War conditions and high cost of materials and labor seriously interfered with rebuilding; but faith and hope, joined to a steady and determined purpose, gained the victory. Rev. W. J. Suckow, who was pastor at the time the church was burned, began the restoration of the house of worship, and had the work well on the way toward completion when the new pastor, Rev. H. L. Goughnour, succeeded to leadership early last spring.

On Sept. 12, pastor and people of Manchester witnessed the final success of their labors, when the new church was formally dedicated. Pres. J. H. T. Main of Grinnell College preached the dedication sermon. Superintendent Johnson took charge of the formal service of dedication. In the evening Dr. H. F. Milligan of Dubuque gave an address on Christianity in Action, the Challenge of Our Time, and Rev. Fred J. Clark of Waterloo spoke on The Church and Civilization. It was an inspiring day for the church and one long to be remembered.

Discuss Relation of Church to Workingman

Olivet, St. Paul, received four new members at the September communion, making a total of 88 since the first of the year. On Labor Sunday evening the topic, "The Church and the Workingman," was helpfully discussed by Rev. J. R. Morgan of Minneapolis and Mr. E. H. H. Holman of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks. A representative audience greeted the speakers, as written invitations had been sent to most of the labor union organizations and paid advertisements had been run in the various labor journals. The pastor, Rev. G. M. Miller, afterwards received a letter from one of the labor unions thanking him for the use of the church and declaring, "We who happen to hold official positions in labor unions are very thoroughly aware of the complexity of the industrial situation and we believe that such meetings are of value. This is a time when we must all give due heed to the issues that confront us so that what is best may be preserved and progress may be achieved."

Mr. Briggs at Villa Park

Rev. W. A. Briggs, who has just begun the pastorate of Villa Park, came from Fourth, Chicago, where he had served four years. During his pastorate with Fourth the merger of the three organizations—Cortland St., Maplewood and Grace—was effected and the new organization given a successful start. Many difficult adjustments were made, in all of which Mr. Briggs showed himself a patient, wise and far-seeing leader. Maplewood and Cortland St. are flourishing branches and give great promise of growth.

Villa Park is growing rapidly and the Congregational Church is practically the only religious organization in the community. Under the leadership of Mr. Briggs it is giving an all-round community service.

Rev. George Milne came to Stillman Valley a few months ago from North Berwyn, Oak Park, where he had given eight years of loyal service. North Berwyn ministered to the whole community and was especially helpful in its dealings with the youth. Mr. Milne led in the adoption of measures that secured playgrounds and other advantages and was also an aggressive force for community reform and law enforcement.

Under Mr. Milne's leadership the church at Stillman Valley has begun a progressive campaign for a full year's service.

Dr. Goodenough's Notable Pastorate

Ten years ago it was prophesied that Rev. Arthur Goodenough would round out a fifty-year pastorate at Winchester. He has fulfilled the prophecy and the event was celebrated Sept. 22, in the church and on the "Green."

To the degree of Doctor of Divinity, conferred by Yale upon him last June, was added by the church at this time the cap and gown. As they were placed upon him, significant as the act was, it was overshadowed by the thrice repeated phrase of Deacon Elliott B. Bronson, "We love you."

So completely has Dr. Goodenough served and enriched the life of the community that Dr. Karl Reiland of St. George's, New York City, congratulated him in his address on the fact that in all his half-century no attempt has been made to establish any other church, mission or Sunday school in Winchester and recently a neighboring Catholic priest asked him to take spiritual care of one of his families that had moved in.

The most conspicuous evidence of the overflow of his seemingly obscure work is that his address as Moderator of the General Association of Connecticut was printed in full by the Outlook and his work was favorably commented on editorially, a recognition won by no other moderator in the entire time of his pastorate.

Dr. Goodenough's neighbor, Dr. Goddard of Salisbury, pastor for 36 years, Supt. Sherrod Soule, Professor Barton of Bryn Mawr and Dean Brown of Yale did honor to him and to themselves by deeming the occasion worthy of their notable addresses. Perhaps the crowning feature of the whole occasion was the frequency with which Dr. Goodenough was spoken of as "Bishop" and the hearty responses always evoked thereby from those gathered from all over the state, bearing witness that the consensus of Christian consciousness is all the authority needed to make a bishop. Bicentennial Celebration at Griswold

It took two full days worthily to observe the 200th anniversary of the church at Griswold and even then only the high spots could be touched.

The parish was first known as the North Society of Preston and later locally as Pachaug.

The exercises were held in the nearly century-old, dignified meeting-house, sentineled by oaks as majestic as those of Mamre, and crowded at every service. Some of the marked features were the decorations, the names of the early pastors appearing on tablets draped with British flags, whose subjects such ministers were, while the tablets with names of later ministers were adorned with American flags.

Church at Griswold, Ct.

Two colonially uniformed officials guarded the right and left assemblage, one bearing a sword typifying early defense from the Indians and the other carrying a tithingman's rod to be applied to sleepy age or unruly youth.

Two little maidens, descendants of the first minister, gave words of welcome. Some children were baptized, wearing the beautiful and perfectly preserved christening robe donated and used by the first pastor, who served from 1720 to 1761.

The Weber Quartet of Boston lent largely in the way of song, a favor made possible by the thoughtful generosity of William M. Morgan, Esquire, of Boston, a Pachaug boy.

The grandmother church, First, Norwich, the mother church, Preston, and the daughter church, Jewett City, gave maternal and filial greetings and many sister churches offered congratulations.

Special addresses and sermons fell to the lot of Rev. C. H. Peck, a former pastor, Deacon D. L. Phillips, Rev. Sherrod Soule, and the present pastor, Rev. J. P. Richardson, who, together with his efficient wife, should receive praise for the program and its execution.

The community has changed greatly since the golden age of the pastorate of the distinguished Levi Hart, D. D., from 1762 to 1808. Near-by industrial villages have arisen, the old Yankee stock has lessened and the incoming few are aliens. The church, however, has faith in its future as well as reverence for its past. It would be hard to find another country parish comparable in size and station that could equal the record of Pachaug in the matter of mighty men, elect matrons and excellent ministers "raised up." Here first saw the light, Prof. Moses Coit Tyler, the famous historian and writer, George Denison Prentice, the bold and brilliant editor of the Louisville Journal in the stormy days of the Rebellion, and William

Worcester Regrets Departure of Dr. Bradley

Dr. H. S. Bradley, beloved pastor of PIEDMONT, WORCESTER, and dean of Worcester Congregational ministers, has resigned his pastorate to take effect the middle of November and has accepted a call to State Street, Portland, Me. During the 11 years of his residence in Worcester, Dr. Bradley has been an influential leader both in the religious and civic life of the city and has filled many positions of leadership in church and city organizations. He served as president of the Worcester Congregational Club and was the first president of the new Worcester Federation of Churches. While building up a large and efficient church organization he has fulfilled a ministry-at-large among the unchurched and has rendered conspicuous service to the smaller churches just outside the city. In civic, industrial, fraternal and social organizations he has been in great demand as a speaker by reason of his forceful and constructive utterance. He has seemed to be an almost indispensable personality in the life of Worcester.

During Dr. Bradley's pastorate 729 persons have been received into church fellowship, with a total net gain of more than 42 per cent. This gain is one-third as much as the net gain of all the other 18 Congregational churches of the city. The working facilities of the church have been improved by the addition of a new organ, new social and dining halls, new kitchen, rooms for Boy Scouts, Camp Fire Girls and kindergarten, and pastor's study. The church's gifts to various causes amount to more than $800,000.

One reason for the growth of Piedmont, in addition to the personality of the minister, has been his emphasis upon the fundamentals of Christian faith in preaching, creed and action. The articles of faith have been simplified until they contain what Dr. Bradley considers the bare fundamentals of a belief in Christ and these articles have been cordially accepted and supported by the church.

Dr. Bradley, in addition to conspicuous service in his home city, holds positions of honor in the denomination at large, and is in demand as a speaker in religious and educational gatherings far and near. Mrs. Bradley has also held a large place in the affections of the people of Piedmont and among the women of the city, and has ably supplemented her husband's work, especially in the missionary activities.

Dr. Bradley accepts the call to Portland as an opportunity to minister at a strategic point in a great state and section of the country where the members of the church have pledged themselves to a forward movement for which they have sought his leadership.

He was born in Jackson County, Ga., a little more than 50 years ago, of Puritan stock. After his graduation from Emory College, Ga., in 1890, he devoted himself to study and teaching, holding professorships in the natural sciences in his alma mater and serving as its vice-president from 1899 to 1901. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Georgia in 1894. From 1901 to 1905 he was pastor of Trinity M. E. Church, Atlanta, Ga., and from 1905 until 1909 was pastor of St. John's M. E. Church, St. Louis, Mo. He is the author of works on religious subjects, the best known of which is, probably, "Christianity as Taught by Christ." F. D. T.

First, Waltham, Celebrates Centennial

FIRST, WALTHAM, two weeks ago celebrated its centennial anniversary. On Sunday, Sept. 26, the pastor, Dr. F. H. Page, preached the anniversary sermon, giving an historical review of the one hundred years of the life of the church. A new pulpit Bible, the gift of the King's Daughters, was dedicated at that time. In front of the church an elm had stood for more than a century. It fell ten years ago and a part of this centenary service was to plant a new "centennial elm," its new roots to mingle with the old. The tree was planted by Dr. Page, assisted by the officers of the church and four children, representing the four points of the compass. A Young People's Centennial Rally and a Children's Centennial Party were held during the week and books, clothing and household articles such as were used 100 years ago, with paintings of the churches, public buildings, and streets of Waltham at that time, were exhibited.

On Sept. 28, the Suffolk West Association held its regular session with this church. The original records of the church were read under date of Sept. 28, 1820. Mr. E. M. Noyes gave the anniversary address, reviewing the changes that Europe and other lands have seen in a hundred years.

The church grounds have been laid out by an expert on landscape gardening, the church building has been repaired, and a director of religious education has been secured. The church believes it can best honor the past by securing a 100 per cent. efficiency in all its departments with which to begin the new century and this is what it considers its real centennial observance.

Plymouth, Worcester, Holds "Get-Together"

PLYMOUTH, WORCESTER, Dr. Robert MacDonald, pastor, set the ball of church activities rolling with an enthusiastic church family rally and supper Sept. 28. Harvey S. Gruver, Superintendent of Schools, Worcester, and Chairman of Plymouth Religious Education Committee, presided. Rev. J. L. Cross, of Rollstone, Fitchburg, was the speaker of the evening and in a magnificent address applied the theme of "Service" to the far-reaching influence and importance of church work. Community singing and solos varied the program. The Layman's Creed, written by George Rugg, principal of Quinsigamond public school, Worcester, and a member of the Religious Education Committee of Plymouth, was presented to the meeting and was read aloud by the 300 members present. Within 24 hours members of four churches requested

Prof. Athearn Addresses Boston Ministers

At the Boston Ministers' Meeting, Oct. 4, Prof. Walter S. Athearn, of Boston University, spoke on "The Emergency in American Education." He questioned whether a nation had been successful in its educational program when there existed a great army of illiterates who were old enough to hold the franchise. We are two billion dollars behind in our school building program and besides there are 121,000 schoolrooms closed for lack of teachers. Our public school system has failed because it is a neighborhood system and not a national system. We need a Department of Education as we have departments of labor and commerce and we need to have the Secretary of Education a member of the President's cabinet. This is provided for in the Smith-Towner bill, which will come before the next Congress, with an appropriation of $100,000,000 annually for national stimulation of interest in public education. We must build up a religious program of education beside the state program of education and fill the educational program of the state with the religious ideals of the church. Seven out of every ten children of the United States are growing up without any formal instruction on morality and religion.

New Pilgrim Treasure

Dear Mr. Editor:

The Congregational Library has acquired an interesting volume which may be seen in a glass case in the reading room. It is called "Leyden documents relating to the Pilgrim Fathers." The larger part of it consists of facsimilies of certain pages in the Leyden municipal book of betrothals for several years previous to 1620, together with transcriptions and translations. The folio lies open at the entry that gives the espousals of William Bradford and Dorothy May.

Sunday Question in New Hampshire

Dear Mr. Editor:

In The Congregationalist of July 22 you published a statement by the New Hampshire Sabbath Conference and in the issue of Sept. 9 a rejoinder by the secretary of the Lord's Day League of New England.

In the interest of accuracy, fairness to all concerned and a better understanding between Christian brethren it may be said that the circular letter published July 22 was written and printed, not by Mr. Tuck, but by the officers of the New Hampshire Sabbath Conference.

Confronted by a demand that did not originate with us and by the imminent danger that at the next legislature a bill providing little or no restraint would become the law of the state unless some definite recommendations were made by the friends of the Sabbath, the appointed representatives of eight different denominations of churches and of the Grange and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union drafted a bill which seeks to prevent the commercializing of the Lord's Day and to preserve it for rest from labor, for worship and for the moral and religious training essential to citizenship.

That bill which was not drawn up by Mr. Tuck, but which received his approval, was rejected by the Lord's Day League of New England, and Mr. Tuck's services were discontinued by the League in spite of his acknowledged efficiency on the ground that "our positions are irreconcilable."

What is the difference between the position of the Lord's Day League of New England and that of the New Hampshire Sabbath Conference?

It is not in our common devotion to the Lord's Day but in our judgment as to how far its observance should be enforced by legal enactment and how far in a democracy our fellow citizens and fellow Christians should be compelled by legislation to accept our interpretation rather than their own of the teachings of Moses and of Paul, and of Christ concerning the Sabbath. We differ as to the function of the state which controls by external authority and the function of the church which appeals to the conscience.

A more complete statement of our principles than we ought to ask The Congregationalist to print will appear in the next issue of The Sabbath Bulletin which Rev. Edward A. Tuck, Concord, N. H., will send upon request to any who wish for further information.

In this decisive year of a great moral conflict we call upon those New Hampshire readers of The Congregationalist who are in sympathy with our principles to continue their contributions in response to the appeals of Mr. Tuck, whose efficiency and devotion command our absolute confidence.

Accordingly we have so drafted our proposal for a Sunday law that, if enacted, the moral Christian sentiment in any community can, by objecting to anything of the nature of work or play that is felt to be a disturbance, effectually prevent those inroads upon the Sabbath rest which other bills proposed have either favored or attempted to meet with a universal prohibition not considered enforceable.

The Next Secretary

Dear Mr. Editor:

There can be no question that Dr. Herring discovered the true orientation of the National Council Secretaryship. He took the idea, somewhat crudely put forth in the original proposition, and accepted by many with reluctance, and showed us its real meaning and possibilities of good. He took the position, which some regarded as an encroachment, and proved that it was no autocratic meddling with ancient doctrines and rights, but an efficient agency for getting the things done which we all felt should be done but no one was authorized to undertake.

It was his task, as the first interpreter of the new program, to "set the house in order," with sane, inspiring message and gentle but forceful hand to guide the denomination into the new ways and to foster in our people a liking for those ways. His selection at that transition time was clearly providential. His rare personality, wide experience, serenity of temper and unusual ability to interpret and apply principles and measure men; his clear grasp of Congregational history and ideals, unfailing tact and genuine brotherliness preeminently fitted him for the pioneer work to which he was summoned.

Too early, before he was permitted to do more than lay foundations, he was called away. Our hearts are still so sore that we can do little more than wonder and grieve. The editorial in The Congregationalist of Sept. 30, entitled, "Dr. Herring and the Future of the Council," suggests, however, that it is not too soon to ask, On whom shall his mantle fall?

There is one name that instinctively comes to many lips; the name of that strong and gracious brother who so long enjoyed Dr. Herring's intimacy and worked in harmony with him as Chairman of the Executive Committee, Dr. Charles F. Carter of Hartford. No man among us is more familiar with the National Council business or Congregational affairs. No man better knows Dr. Herring's mind and his hopes for the church he had helped to lead into self-consciousness. When you add to these undoubted qualifications Dr. Carter's own clear vision, sound judgment, ability to present issues in concise and convincing speech, patient consideration for differing opinion, courteous and kindly manner and ringing voice, you have the man, in the judgment of some of us, conspicuously qualified to take up the succession and to "carry on."

A Hymn for Japan

The World's Sunday School Association is meeting in Tokyo, Japan, from Oct. 5 to 14. Dr. Allen E. Cross, whose other hymns have first appeared in the pages of The Congregationalist, was asked by Prof. H. Augustine Smith, Director of the Music of the Convention, to prepare a special hymn. This new hymn, "Salute the Banner of the Sun," was written to enable the Japanese to see in their own National Flag the ideals of the Son of Man. It has already been translated into Japanese and put upon stereopticon slides for general use. It also appears in the Tokyo Hymnal and Service Book. In our reading of it, it may be remembered that the motto of the reign of the present Emperor signifies "The Great Righteousness." If it seems to lift up too high an ideal, it is worthy of consideration that the flag of a nation should visualize to the imagination its loftiest social standard. The hymn is sung to the tune of Waltham and is as follows:

Salute the Banner of the Sun—
The Day of Righteousness begun!
Lord grant it be, till time shall cease,
The flag of fellowship and peace!

All hail the Banner of the Light,
The splendor of Eternal Right!
Fling out its rays to cheer and bless
A realm of Truth and Righteousness.

Salute the Banner of the Day
When wrong and hatred flee away;
And Fujiyama, high above,
Calls men to worship and to love.

O Banner of the Sun, all hail!
Shine on! thy light shall never fail!
Shine on, to serve the Common Good,
And lead the World to Brotherhood.

the Bible to reflect the geology, astronomy and accepted historical data of its time and not feel that the Book is any less valuable religiously because it is not modern in these respects.

4. That the Hebrew considered all that came to pass as direct from God; there were no secondary causes. If men's hearts were hardened, God did it. If a man came to a conclusion about God's will, he did not hesitate to say, "God said unto me," or "the word of God came unto me."

5. That there is in our Bible that which is eternally vital and of supreme concern to the men of today, but there is also a great deal which belongs to the history of this growing religion. It is outgrown accordingly to specific teaching in the Bible itself and hence mainly of historical interest only.

6. That there is a difference between fact and truth. Just as a parable or fiction may teach most profound truth, so, much in the Bible may teach eternal truth and yet not be fact at all.

Keeping these things in mind we shall begin in the next article an attempt to rescue essential Christianity from the outgrown and inadequate teachings in the Bible, which block the progress of the Kingdom and greatly perplex parents and teachers.

(If these articles give rise to questions you care to ask or suggestions you wish to make, the writer will be glad to hear from you.)

F. M. SHELDON.

Agrees with Mr. Dumm

Dear Mr. Editor:

I have been observing, with deep interest, the exchange of opinion called for by your paper upon the action of the recent International Council relative to the indorsement of the League of Nations.

I am inclined to feel that Mr. Dumm is not as "dumb" as his name might indicate, and I confess that I rather sympathize with the position he takes. It hardly appears to me to be any more fair for such a Council to put this great denomination on record as favoring the League of Nations than it was for Mr. Wilson to attempt to speak for these United States at Paris, or for Mr. Gompers to attempt to cast the entire vote of the A. F. L. for the Democratic nominee at the coming election. Twice I voted for Mr. Wilson, and until six months ago I supported his idea of a League, but I cannot do so today for many honest reasons. I know my church well enough also to be able to say that the weight of opinion among the membership is not in support of the Wilson League. Why should any body attempt to voice, as our representatives, a unanimous opinion on a matter that seriously divides us in the ministry and in the pew? I am of the opinion that it misrepresents our Congregational constituency.

W. K. WILLIAMS.

"Have you heard Miss Howles? They say she has the gift of song."

"I hope it was that. I should hate to think she paid anything for it."—Boston Transcript.

Tom—They say your divorced wife has made up her mind to marry a struggling young lawyer.

Harry—Well, if she has made up her mind, he might as well cease struggling.—London Opinion.

Being told by the deacon that his constant demands for money from the pulpit would kill his church, an old colored preacher replied, "Churches don't die that way, brother. You show me one that did an' I'll go dar an' climb up on de rafters an' shout with a voice of thunder, 'Blessed am the dead that die in the Lord!' "—Boston Transcript.

Edward, aged five, showed a determination not to go to school at all. Finally his favorite aunt was called in to use her persuasive powers. "Surely, Edward," she said, "you want to go to school with your big brother in the autumn." "No, ma'am," said Edward; "I have decided not to go to school. I can't read, I can't write, and I can't sing. So what use should I be at school?"—Harper's Magazine.

Scout Bill (on a summer hike)—Say, Jack, let's divide our rations.

Scout Jack—Let's. I have a canteen of water.

Scout Bill—And I have dried tongue.

Scout Jack—Now that you have had your share of the water I'd like a bit of that dried tongue.

Scout Bill—I haven't got any now.—Boys' Life.

A small Congregational girl from Somerville moved with her parents to a growing suburb of New York. There being no Congregational church in the town she was sent to the Sunday school of another denomination which had roofed over the foundation of a new house of worship expecting to complete it in due time. Asked by a lady if she attended the Episcopal Church she replied, "Yes." Whereupon the lady asked, "Is your church low church or high church? She replied, "It is rather low now but we expect that it will be higher before long."

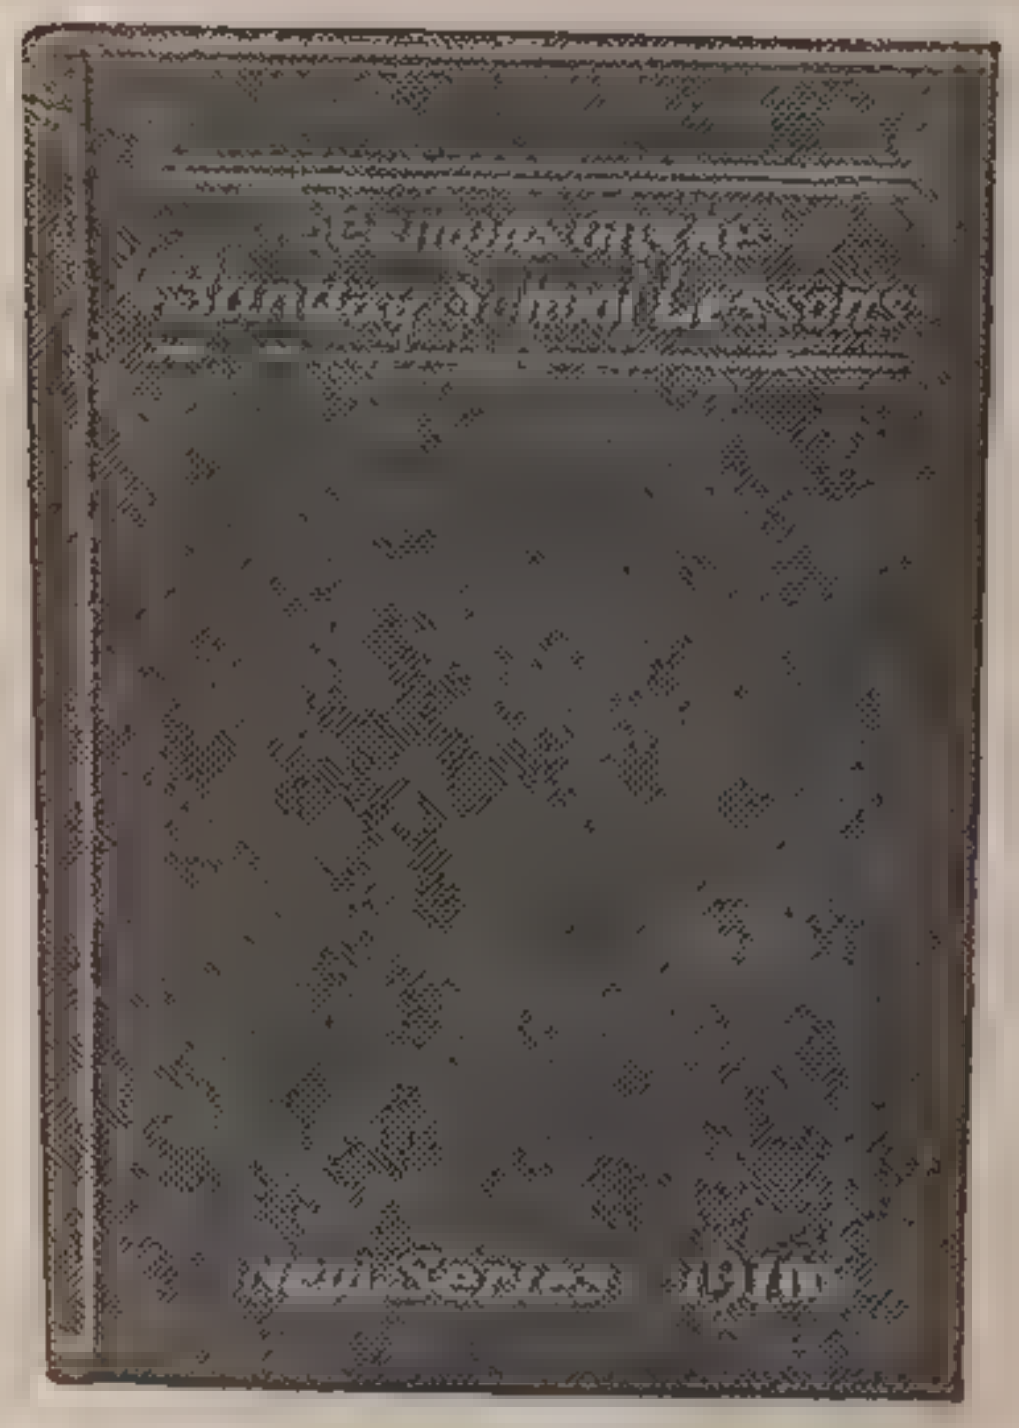
One of our customers, who for years has been a purchaser of the Monday Club Sermons and at the present time owns all but four of the 46 volumes which have been issued, told us the other day in speaking of the edition for 1921 that it was "Tip Top, The Best of the Forty-six."



It is a volume rich in contents, with many such eminent contributors as Charles E. Jefferson, Francis E. Clark, William E. Barton, Charles R. Brown and many others whose names would be equally familiar but too numerous to mention. A wonderful volume on the International Lessons for 1921. Dear Friends:

Enclosed find check—for which please send The Congregationalist to the 120 names on the enclosed subscription list. It may interest you to know that three subscribers to the Congregational World Movement authorized the above amount to be applied out of their pledge in order to make possible these subscriptions. They believe that it will prove first-class publicity, working for denominational and missionary loyalty, and destined in time to bear due fruit in increased intelligence, intercession, and giving, as respects the entire round of our Congregational missionary and benevolent enterprises.

Yours very truly,

Poems that Comfort and Inspire

Most people have favorite poems, poems that have buoyed them up in times of stress and encouraged them to enter upon some new undertaking. Would it not be a delightful service if we should pass on poems of this sort to the thousands of other readers of The Congregationalist and Advance who need just the help that inspiring poems give? We shall be glad to publish these favorites if you will send them to us. Please give the author's name in each case if possible, and give your own name and address, too. It will add to the interest of others if they know that a particular poem of inspiration or comfort has helped you. Already we have received many poems in response to this request. Have you sent yours? Do it today. Some one may be waiting for the particular comfort your favorite poem may contain.

Movies in the Churches

Frequent requests come to us for the names of ministers whose churches have made successful use of moving pictures. In order to be of more service to those seeking the information we should appreciate it if pastors, church clerks and other church members would inform us if their churches have adopted the use of movies and, if so, whether the results have been favorable. A postal card will carry the information we desire.

From Our Mail Bag

"I was so glad to see in The Congregationalist the article on America's Immigration Problem, by Mrs. Mead. I hope you will follow it up occasionally by others. It is one of our most vital problems now, and there is no question that the National Committee for Constructive Immigration Legislation has the right plan of action, and it ought to be made known everywhere and its value shown. Circulation Department

We receive many cheering messages from our happy circle of readers. Here is a letter that we pass on with special pleasure, feeling the thrill of good cheer that goes with the paper as it is handed on from home to home. We shall welcome other similar letters. What is the itinerary of your Congregationalist and Advance?

"I read with much interest recently your comment on the ways in which our mutual friend, The Congregationalist, is made helpful and useful, and in answer to your query as to individual papers I will give the itinerary of ours, which arrives on Thursday, is read thoroughly (and mostly on Sunday) by the next Monday. On Tuesday it goes to an invalid and a shut-in, returning to us Thursday for rereading. On Saturday it climbs the hill to spend a few days in the home of our daughter, whose children can hardly wait for the Children's Story to be read. When it comes back to us, we glance at it briefly, refreshing our memories and confirming impressions. Then it ascends another hill to my sister's family, where my mother is, and she has been reading it for sixty years. After she has read and reread it, a friend with little time for reading has the paper, bringing back a budget occasionally. Then the man of the house clips for various envelopes in which choice and important items are stored, also poems, sermons, and anecdotes, for public and private use." MRS. J. M. COMSTOCK.

The Conquest of Fear

GOD meant fear to be an innocent messenger-boy. We have made him a terrible giant.

Love reigns supreme in heaven, and in hell the power over all is not cruelty or injustice or lust, but fear.

The walls of Jericho fall not from direct attack or strange miracle, but through fear! The beleaguering hosts march round and round in weird silence with mystic symbols till every vestige of nerve has left the defenders; then, with a sudden yell, they make for the city and not a white-faced guard but flies in terror, not a gate but is open and undefended.

So some simple superstitious symptom starts in us the fear of disease, that nags and preys upon our vitals and makes the way ready for the harboring of the first morbid germ that comes along our way. Face fear as a master faces a useful servant and it cringes before you. Face fear as its slave and lo, you feel its stinging master's whip across your shoulders.

Now fear, like all bullies, is a coward. There are three things of which fear is desperately afraid.

FEAR FEARS LIGHT. Thousands of people have gone through life tortured by the certainty that they were suffering from some terrible and incurable heart disease. They felt that their lives must be short, that they might drop dead at any moment. Their whole existence was spent under the shadow of that fear. As a matter of fact they never had anything worse wrong with them than a slight digestive complaint which was due to wrong methods of eating. The very name, "Heartburn," is a testimony to the power of fear. But fear kept them from ever dragging their fear out into the light. They knew in the back of their minds that they had heart disease, but did not dare to face a terrible certainty about it. So they lived all their lives subject to an unreal fear. Most fears are dispelled by being dragged out of their corners and looked at in the light. The worst evil is not so bad as the fear of that evil.

The fear of being out of style, the fear of doing the wrong thing, the fear that one shall not be able to make good in business, the fear that one is slipping and not so efficient as formerly, the fear that one may die and leave one's family uncared for, the fear that an odd mood may presage insanity —most of these fears would fade into thin air in the light of day. But they are our masters as long as they are permitted to rule in the dark back corners of our consciousness.

FEAR FEARS COURAGE. It is only at the crossroads that fear sits where the traveler hesitates and doubts; on the highway it has no power. "Stretch out thy hand!" "Sell all thou hast." "Take up thy bed"—all are acts of courage. Is your life halted by a terrible bogey that straddles quite across the way? Dare to go forward, it is only paint and pasteboard. The lions are real, but are chained. We all wander for years on the borders of a promised land flowing with milk and honey, scared to go in because of the giants. If you dare to look life in the face he will run to get you what you want. But sink your eyes and tremble but a little and he has you in his grasp. Then he is robber and murderer indeed. In Ireland many boys are called Mary. This fools the fairies (who have a spite against boys) into thinking they are girls and so letting them alone. Life can be fooled the same way. The greatest coward who does deeds of courage is taken for a brave man. Life is his servant.

FEAR FEARS COMPANY. Under the Juniper tree you are alone and therefore afraid. But when you know there are ten thousand with you, you are a hero. He who fights for right is always one of an innumerable company. The Great Spirit in the hearts of all good men is with you. The company of the hand means much. But the company of the heart means more. The heart that has God as guest has no fear.

Set the bugle of prayer to your lips and blow the blast that calls through all the spiritual kingdom for your friends to help you in time of need, and lo, the banners and shining helmets of the forces of heaven appear upon the hills, the sun rises, the mists break up and the legion armies of the enemy shrink again to be the simple messengers of love warning you to do your part, to know and dare and love.

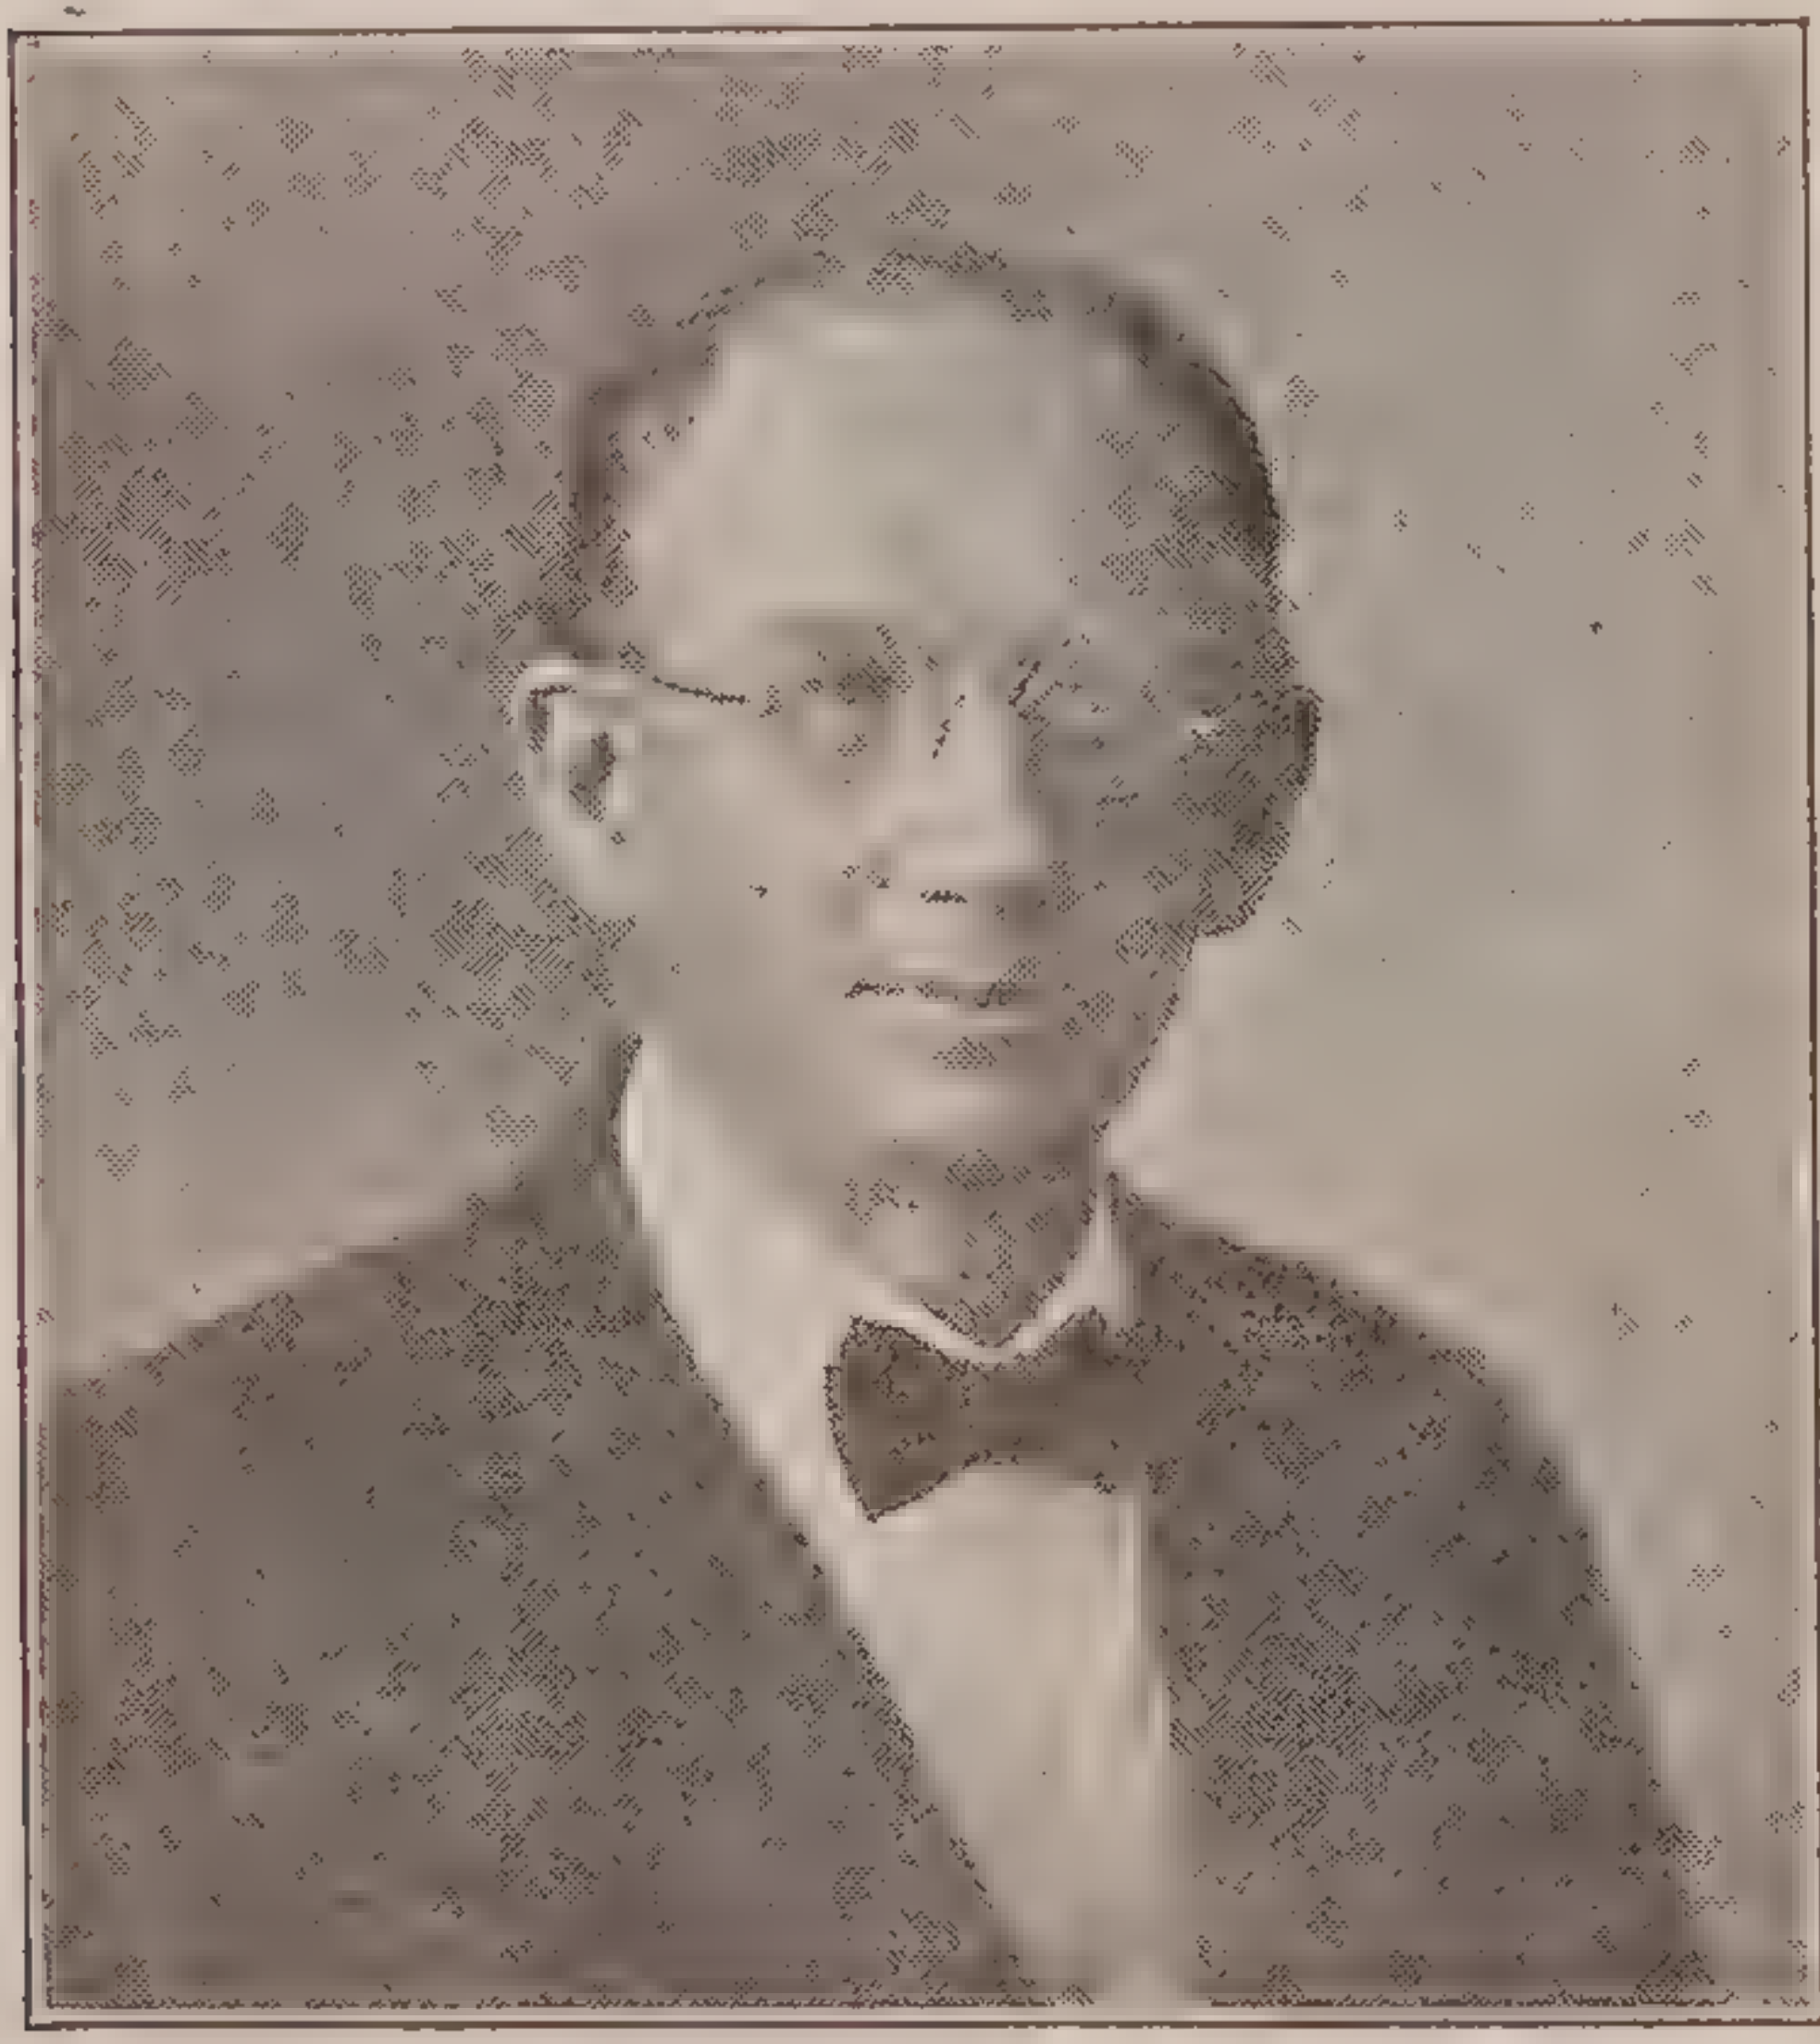
WHAT THE CHRISTIAN WORLD IS DOING

Korea Still the Scene of Revived Interest

KOREA has been in the public eye of late chiefly because of the friction between Koreans and their Japanese overlords. But notwithstanding the disturbed political situation, the mood of the people regarding spiritual things continues to be most receptive. Rev. John G. Moore, who as superintendent of the Pyeng Yang District, has over seventy churches under his supervision, writes of some villages where there is at least one Christian in every house. Church buildings are frequently packed on Sunday and money is easily raised for the support of the pastors and of Bible women. Yet in other parts of Korea a vast work remains to be done. In one district there are 300,000 people with only 1,000 professing Christians. Students of both sexes are coming to the front who, having had the training of the missionary schools, are able to go out in preaching and evangelistic bands. In some cases Korean girls take full charge of the services.

Dr. Scudder Heads Boston Federation

DR. Doremus Scudder, long well known to Congregationalists, is the new Executive Secretary of the Boston Church Federation. The Federation has existed for some time, functioning by committees, but now with convenient offices and a secretary of large experience, it plans to meet the need of a church federation in a large city with many churches and a great variety of religious and philanthropic activities. There are four chapters in the extensive experience which so admirably prepares Dr. Scudder for this responsible position. Yale, Union Seminary and the medical colleges of New York and Chicago fitted him to go as a medical missionary to take charge of the American Board Hospital at Niigata, Japan. There he was ordained for general missionary work. Returning to America from Japan, Dr. Scudder spent many months in intensive studies along social lines and as a result became pastor of "The Workers' Church," near the Chicago stockyards. He believed and demonstrated that the settlement idea could be worked out in a Christian church. He held other pastorates in Brooklyn, N. Y., and Woburn, Mass. For years he was in the Hawaiian Islands, first as superintendent of the Japanese work and then as Secretary of the Hawaiian Board. Afterward as pastor of the Central Union Church of Honolulu, he received over seven hundred new members from forty-two different denominations. When the war broke out, he was appointed a major in the Red Cross in Siberia, having charge of the department of Civilian Relief in Vladivostok and Omsk. From Siberia, Dr. Scudder returned to Hawaii to engineer a centenary of missions and afterwards accepted the secretaryship of the Boston Federation of Churches.



REV. DOREMUS SCUDDER, D. D.

Boston Federation Plans

THE Boston Church Federation is not to be a separate organization but the instrument of the churches, a key to unlock their co-operative efforts. Its policy is to develop local federations throughout metropolitan Boston. There are already some forms of federation in six parts of the city and in sixteen suburban communities. Dr. Scudder hopes for some form of organized co-operation in five other parts of the city and twenty other suburban communities. There are over 650 churches in metropolitan Boston. There are plans for inviting the new students to the higher institutions of learning to attend the church; and for getting every church voter to the polls in November. The eleven ministers' meetings will hold a retreat on Oct. 25, with Dr. Floyd Tompkins as the principal speaker. This will be in the quietest spot in the center of the city, the Swedenborgian Church on Bowdoin Street. Dr. Scudder is decidedly impressed with the welcome Boston extends to the work of federation and looks forward to the affiliation of all the various forms of benevolent and religious activities in the entire city.

The Tokyo Sunday School Convention

NEWS filters in slowly from the assembly of Sunday school workers from all over the world that was in session in Tokyo in the first week of October. It might not do to mix metaphors and say that the destruction by fire of the hall that had been built especially for the convention put a damper on proceedings, yet it did compel quick and wholesale readjustment in the plans for the meetings. According to the dispatches, Dr. H. Augustine Smith of Boston, who had charge of the music of the convention, seems to have displayed his usual influence upon large conventions, and thus helped to avert panic. Over four hundred American delegates were registered in advance, but the representation of Chinese and Korean Sunday schools is reported to have been decidedly slim. It would be a matter of regret if the international features of a convention so potential for good and for the allaying of racial feeling should resolve itself chiefly into a gathering of Americans and Japanese only. Later reports, we trust, will alter this impression.

The Pilgrims in Westminster Abbey

CELEBRATIONS of the Pilgrim Tercentenary go on both in England and America. We have word in English papers just received of the commemorative services in Westminster Abbey. Protestant Episcopal Bishop Brewster of Maine, fresh from the Lambeth Conference, was present and took part at the morning service in right of his descent from Elder Brewster. The preacher was Rev. C. E. Raven, Fellow and Dean of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, the college of Robinson and of many of the Puritan leaders. He took for his text the words quoted by Nathaniel Morton at the end of his New England's Memorial: "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and his wonderful works to the children of men." And he said:

> Here in this mother church of the communion from whose tyranny the Pilgrim Fathers fled, we today are met to glorify God for their going, to commemorate their achievement before Him and to learn from it whatever we can of duty, of heroism and of sacrifice.

Dean Raven made a plea for a movement toward union of the churches, pleading that this was a great but a passing opportunity:

> In the matter of reunion of the Churches it is certain that unless speedy action is taken by our responsible leaders to carry into effect what they profess to desire . . . there will be widespread irregularity and breaking away from the tradition of the past. Individuals will have to supplement or forestall those who ought to lead and will not. If you find yourself in such a position, uncertain how long you can acquiesce in what you know to be evil, the inspiration of the Pilgrim Fathers will help you.

And Canon Barnes struck a similar note at the afternoon service. His sermon, as reported by The Christian World, as well as both the services

> Emphasized a profound conviction that 17th-century religious intolerance was strong. The dead who were buried or commemorated within the Abbey included Cardinals and Puritans, High Church and Low Church divines, John Wesley and Isaac Watts. Their presence was a mute protest against the renewal of old disputes or the survival of ancient animosities. What transcended all, for Churchmen and Free Churchmen alike, was loyalty to the in-dwelling Spirit of Christ. By sharing this loyalty they could take ship together and sail on a voyage of faith and hope, pilgrims who would find and make a new world.

A Word for Our Times

The soul of man is responding ever more gladly to the real Christ when it hears His call, and that is the best omen possible of the coming of God's kingdom on earth, and is proving itself to an ever larger number the only real and lasting foundation for permanent peace. Faith will lead us to regard all men the world around as brothers, and to treat them as such, even if it involves risks and spells unselfishness—faith in our wives, our children, our friends, our critics, even when they misunderstand and misinterpret us—faith in our enemies, that they too are sons of God, and are to be, and will be, won to love us if only we follow Him.—WILFRED T. GRENFELL.

The Japanese Issue in California

The anti-Japanese program for America suggested by political leaders in California, and to be passed upon at the November Election, includes among other things:

1. The cancellation of the Gentlemen's Agreement, whereby Japan undertook to stop all new labor immigration.
2. The exclusion of the so-called "picture brides" sent over from Japan for family reasons.
3. The rigorous exclusion of all Japanese as immigrants.
4. The confirmation and legalization of the policy that Asiatics shall be forever barred from American citizenship.
5. A national amendment to Section 1, Article 14, of the Federal Constitution, providing that no child born in the United States of foreign parentage shall be considered an American citizen unless both parents are of a race that is eligible to citizenship.

We need not discuss from the standpoint of Christian patriotism and internationalism this program in detail. Suffice it to say, we believe that at the most it is but a makeshift. No solution to a human problem like this can be made along the line of repressive and segregative economic and racial legislation however drastic it may be.

The immigration problem is a serious one whether we think of Europe, Africa or Asia. It will not be solved, however, through class pride or class legislation. There is no law under heaven or in heaven which will prevent great racial movements, the mixing of men of one blood the world over, in America as in other countries. The time may be deferred, but come it will when racial discrimination will have to be set aside in favor of justice and peace. Asiatics cannot be forever barred from American citizenship. They are of too great intrinsic value themselves to warrant our taking such a shortsighted stand. We cannot afford to get the reputation abroad of being the great "snob" of the world. International as well as national morale is at stake.

When we come to the fifth article in the program, namely, that of depriving American-born Japanese of their citizenship, we are almost in the realm of the inconceivable. We cannot believe that America as a whole will stand for such an amendment to Article 14, even though we know that the American Legion has been won over to the program as a whole by the political leaders of California and by the general distrust of militaristic Japan which pervades our army and navy.

We can understand how this Plank Five naturally stirs to action the Christian leaders on the Pacific Coast and elsewhere, and we have sympathy with them in their determination to expose the plan everywhere as un-American and even inhuman. Dr. George F. Kenngott, superintendent of the Southern California Conference of Congregational Churches, set forth in our columns last week the injustice of the steps contemplated from the Christian point of view.

This concern over the menacing situation is not alone due to the fact that the program involves an amendment of our Federal Constitution, nor is it merely because of the far-reaching fact of a possible victory for the present political agitators upon the future of our national institutions, though we can see that if citizens of America can be deliberately deprived of their citizenship by one class or groups of classes at will, then this can be done for other elements within our own nation and in such a way as to cause internal disturbances leading to the ultimate disintegration of the nation, not to speak of such racial antagonisms as shall bring back upon us the deserved contempt of the nationals of the countries.

But the issue is even broader. It comprehends the very work of the Kingdom of God itself among nations. America cannot afford to lose its prestige as the haven of hope, the land of the free and the home of the brave, the great amalgamator of races, the country that gives a chance to all the oppressed regardless of creed and color. It would never do for us from the standpoint of fulfilling our mission in the world to become known as the degrader of men, the creator of outcasts, the instigator of racial antagonisms and the self-deluded and cordially disliked snob of the world. Even to conceive of such a plan as depriving American-born citizens of their right will tend to break down the international structure of equality, fraternity and justice that America has been helping to build throughout the world. International as well as national morale is at stake and the very progress of the Kingdom of God retarded.

We do not live in California. We have not suffered from competition with the thrifty, industrious Japanese who, working under conditions repulsive to the white and through a solidarity impossible to us, can get what they want of soil and market. We realize that many good Americans in California live constantly in the fear of a future even more than of a present "yellow menace." They are conscientious in their effort to "preserve California for the Californians." Nor can we pass judgment upon them for any effort to restrict the immigration of those whom they consider undesirable. Yet we believe with many of the Christian leaders on the Pacific Coast that the issue raised by the fourth and fifth proposals, if not by the rest of the program, is one that concerns us all and the time has come to say so.

The plan to bar Japanese from citizenship and to deprive American-born Japanese of their rights is evidently based upon the belief that the Japanese are unassimilable. We question this. We have yet to learn that the matter has been studied scientifically. We are told that the Japanese who have lived in this country for some time, have never been given a fair trial. Those who know them best say that in their home and community life as well as in their attitude toward America they do just as well as Italians, Poles and Russians. With the Japanese character so prone toward conformity to its surroundings and with the peculiar genius of the Japanese for adaptability, there is good reason to believe that a fair trial would find even the Japanese immigrant as assimilable as the majority of those that come from the Near East, Southern and Eastern Europe.

As for the American-born Japanese, we are told by Christian workers among them that they are almost ultra-American; that when they have been two or three years in the public schools they use the English language among themselves and even refuse to speak Japanese to their parents. We can remember two Japanese children returned to Japan after a few years' residence in America, when asked who the greatest man was in the world, replying "Theodore Roosevelt." Their family may have been shocked because the customary answer "The Emperor" was not given, but their own sincerity set several to thinking.

So we plead for the twenty-five thousand American-born children in California that they may be allowed to prove themselves worthy of their rights. We stand ready to match them with an equal number of any other second generation in the country so far as true loyalty and enthusiasm for American ideals and life are concerned. We condemn as do others the apparent policy of the Japanese Government to compel the registration of these American-born Japanese on the books of Japan. But this is no reason why we should even conceive of the plan of depriving them of their rights on the ground of their being unassimilable. Let us remember that we have been set by God to the task of racial readjustment and reconciliation here and everywhere and that though we may postpone the performance of our duty America must face it some day. The solution lies along other lines than those suggested by the political agitators in California.

Dr. Eaton as Temporary Council Secretary

As announced in our columns last week, Ex-President E. D. Eaton of Beloit College, who of late has been pastor of the Cleveland Park Church, Washington, D. C., has become Secretary of the National Council, with the understanding that he is not a candidate for the office at the Los Angeles meeting of the Council next June, when Dr. Herring's successor will be elected. It is with some reluctance that Dr. Eaton has yielded to the unanimous request of the Executive Committee of the Council. He has reached the time of life when having served so long and faithfully the interests of Christian education, and having participated in so vital a way in our common denominational affairs, he is not eager to assume larger responsibilities. In his characteristically quiet but efficient way, he has had much to do, within the last two or three years, with the organization of the promising Congregational Church in a growing residential section of Washington, but he had recently passed this task over to his successor and was about to take up his residence in Cambridge when the call of the Executive Committee came to him.

No better man could have been chosen for this interregnum. Dr. Eaton knows the West as well as the East. He has the confidence of all elements in Congregationalism. He will bring to bear upon the problems and duties awaiting him a balanced judgment and the wisdom derived from years of contact at first hand with undertakings that call for patience and the constructive mind. He will have in Mr. Truman J. Spencer of Hartford, now Assistant Secretary of the Council, a capable assistant as respects the handling of the official routine. Miss Eleanore Nichols, who for so many years was Dr. Herring's efficient secretary, will also be of great help in relating the new régime to the going work of the Council.

We hardly need to bespeak for Dr. Eaton the warmest sort of welcome from the churches of the country. His own bearing and procedure will show him to be the providential man for the emergency.

As Two Laymen See the Issue

We published Oct. 7 an article by Pres. J. M. Thomas setting forth his reasons for supporting Mr. Harding, and another from Dr. Oscar E. Maurer declaring his intention to vote for Mr. Cox. Each wrote from the standpoint of a Christian minister. Christian laymen are equally interested in the pending election, as two documents which have recently come to our desk show.

The first is "Cox—The Man," a little book by Roger W. Babson, the financier, and the second a pamphlet entitled, "Where does Senator Harding Stand on the Moral Issues?" by Bruce Barton. Mr. Babson has long been prominently affiliated with Congregationalism. Mr. Barton, a son of Dr. William E. Barton of Chicago, has won distinction as a writer and as a high-minded and successful advertising expert.

The Democratic candidate, as depicted by Mr. Babson, has won his way in life through hard work, beginning in early boyhood on the Ohio farm where he was born and persisted in as he moved on into the field of journalism and politics. According to his biographer, Mr. Cox is a conservative and forceful business man with an insight into human nature that has enabled him to surround himself with able and conscientious associates, of the crusading temper, resolute, when governor, in his enforcement of law, even measures relating to prohibition, an exponent of "pure Americanism," but Americanism of the Democratic type rather than of the imperialistic type, with a praiseworthy record as a supporter of education and of measures that have to do with the bettering of industrial conditions. He vouches for his intense patriotism, but not the patriotism which reactionary interests of this country are emphasizing in order to block progress and reform.

Mr. Babson does not hesitate to refer to Mr. Cox's divorce of his first wife and says that the step was taken because of a divergence of interest beginning at the time when Mr. Cox as a journalist was absorbed in the whirl of politics at Washington. Says Mr. Babson, "It was a wonderful test for any man and woman. The attitude of both is an example of frankness, courage and kindness. It was an unfortunate affair and yet was probably for the best."

Though not quite so unrestrained as Mr. Babson in his expression of admiration for the man of his choice, Bruce Barton is no less sincere in his contention that Senator Harding deserves and will repay the support of all who wish to see the great moral issues forwarded rather than set back by the next administration. From a feeling of disappointment in his nomination, he has been won through a personal interview with Senator Harding to believe that on the great moral issues of prohibition, world peace and economic righteousness in national and international affairs, Senator Harding is the candidate who should appeal to serious-minded men and women. He quotes him as saying:

> In another generation I believe that liquor will have disappeared not merely from our politics but from our memories. The very words associated with it will drop out of our vocabulary; a new race of young men and women will have grown up to whom those words have no significance. Only then will the question be finally settled Meanwhile the people of the United States have taken a great and decisive step towards its settlement by the enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment. If they choose to reverse that action they have the power. Until they do reverse it the Eighteenth Amendment, if I am President, will be enforced.

On the other hand Mr. Barton points to the letter sent out by the president of the New Jersey Liquor Dealers Association in favor of Mr. Cox as an idncation that should he triumph the organized liquor forces of the country will look upon it as a big victory for their interests.

Moreover, out of an experience at Washington during the war Mr. Barton feels that morale has practically become a thing of the past in the government departments and that on this issue—a mora issue if ever there was one—the government as trustee of the people's money will have a new moral sense of its obligations unde Harding's administration.

Concerning the League of Nations issue this is Mr. Barton's conclusion:

> Senator Harding means somehow to lead the world toward peace If that means disregarding the League of Nations, he will disregard it; if it means adopting part of the League and discarding othe parts he will do that. If the necessities of the situation make th League—either by that name or some other—inevitable, he will hav the courage, I believe, to do what must be done. One thing is certain—that in the desire for peace and the limitation of armament there is no less moral earnestness in Harding than there is in Cox

We put these different points of view before our readers in the interests of furnishing additional information and guidance to any who may still be in doubt as to their personal duty at the polls. Unles one is so ardent and confirmed a party man that he will never break with the regular ticket under any circumstances, the complexity o issues in this particular campaign puts a considerable strain upo one's powers of discrimination and decision. It is hardly to be expected that men equally patriotic, conscientious and eager for th world's progress will all be found in one political camp. The fac that such highly respected leaders as Ex-President Eliot, Presiden King of Oberlin, Dr. Henry A. Stimson of New York, Prof. John Clark of Columbia, Dr. Arthur J. Brown of the Presbyterian Boar of Missions and other men who carry weight in religious circle most of whom have usually voted the Republican ticket, have declared for Mr. Cox, reveals this cleavage of opinion. On the othe hand, it would be easy to make an impressive list of men equally influential and trusted who believe that the election of Mr. Hardin will better serve the interests of the Kingdom of God.

That there is this division is on the whole gratifying rathe than distressing. To have all the moral forces of the country line up with one candidate and party exclusively would make us despai of the future of popular government. Let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind. The essential thing is to cling to one ideals, to bring one's vote to the bar of conscience and whateve comes to pass to stand behind the new administration, give it a fai opportunity to do its best at home and abroad, and never cease t believe that the outcome of this particular campaign, whatever it b must be and will be made to accrue to the exaltation of truth, justice, mercy and peace throughout our borders and everywhere in th world.

Review of Interchurch Steel Inquiry

II. Living and Working Conditions in Steel Industry

By Prof. Graham Taylor

A Cheering Contrast

By way of contrast with the conditions in the steel industry referred to last week, it is only fair to describe better conditions, which though they may be exceptional, deserve credit as indicative of progressive efforts being made at some steel plants, notably those of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company at Birmingham and Chickasaw, Ala., which have been personally inspected by the writer. Their 23,000 employes live in nearly a score of villages and towns, sheltering a total population of 90,000 directly dependent upon these industries. Although some of the plants are new, 7,000 houses have been built already, most of them for single family occupancy, averaging from three to six rooms at a minimum rental of $2 per room per month for most of them, including electric light, water supply and the disposal of waste. Dormitories with dining halls and club rooms are provided for single men. Public health is safeguarded and promoted by infant welfare clinics, tooth-brush drills and dental service for the children, and family medical care is offered at a flat rate of $1.25 a month to those preferring such service. Hospital treatment with the best equipment and skill is freely provided employes and offered to members of their families at very low rates.

Incentive and equipment for social life are given in fraternity halls and clubhouses, community buildings, church edifices and schoolhouses, which are served by teachers of higher grade whose county salaries are supplemented by the Company. The Negro villages sheltering 52 per cent. of the employes and their families are provided with the same housing, sanitary equipment and other facilities as those of the whites. No motives or credits are claimed or defended by the Company for this investment, except that it is good business policy to conserve the human resources of the industry and to develop the stability, efficiency and productiveness of the labor employed in the plant.

Safety, Sanitation and Welfare

The United States Steel Corporation in 1906 inaugurated effort to systematize, standardize and initiate agencies among its subsidiary companies for promoting the safety and social welfare of its employes and their dependents. Out of this effort grew the Bureau of Safety, Sanitation and Welfare, directed by a capable, progressive manager, whose work of promotion and inspection among the plants influences policies and appropriations at headquarters. He opens a report of his work with the admission that previously to these recent years the managers of the steel industry were so occupied in developing processes and in becoming leaders of the world's producers that they gave "only slight consideration to the human side of steel-making —a subject not included in the daily routine of their activities." He closes by asserting "that the conditions under which the employes in our industry live and work today are superior to those in any other of the basic industries in this country or throughout the world."

This conclusion is too indiscriminate a generalization to cover other less favorable and more prevalent conditions than he reports. But his facts and figures are certainly impressive, especially when verified on the field, and are an encouraging indication of a more enlightened policy in the steel industry and of a brighter outlook for all engaged in it. He reports 27,553 dwellings and boarding houses erected and leased to employes, 45 schools, 131 playgrounds, 98 athletic fields, 107 tennis courts, 11 swimming pools, 19 clubhouses, 64 restaurants and lunch rooms, 18 practical housekeeping centers, 210 rest and waiting rooms, with a vast safety equipment and service—these are a few items of the great aggregate.

So effective have been the sanitary and safety devices and precautions that at the Chickasaw shipbuilding plant the cases of malarial fever were reduced from 3,000 to 50 in a single year by draining swamp land and eliminating mosquitoes. The reduction in accidents involving serious injuries began in all the plants twelve years ago, with a decrease of 10.40 per cent. and rose to 46.84 per cent. in 1919, saving 25,853 men from serious injury. This decrease of disablement was considered to be so constant and so sure to be progressive that the Prudential Life Insurance Company felt warranted in reducing very materially its rate of premiums on policies held by workers in the iron and steel industry. William Z. Foster, the much-criticized leader of the strike, in his recent very temperate volume on "The Great Steel Strike and Its Lessons," credits the United States Steel Corporation as "undoubtedly in the lead for the many safety appliances it has installed and the safety committees actively at work."

More Credit Due for Better Conditions

However highly the vast volume of effort and expenditure to improve living and working conditions may be commended in the withheld subreport on "Welfare Work, Pensions, etc.," in this main report it is too indiscriminately ignored and slightingly referred to. It need not in any way have modified condemnation of unjustifiably hard-working conditions to have given credit for such very great improvement in living conditions. It is fair neither to the motives nor to the achievements of such investment of forethought, skill and money for the safety, health, comfort, recreation and general well-being of thousands of employes and their families, that any such reference to welfare work should be made as this: "The Corporation's executives, in order to meet the Corporation policy, are forced to grind the faces of the Hunkies and to trust to welfare to salve the exacerbations."

The Issue on "No Conference"

The compulsory policy referred to is the United States Steel Corporation's anti-union, "no conference" labor policy, which is reported to be the crux of the whole strike crisis, as it is the point of contention throughout the entire Interchurch report. The extent to which "no conference" obtains is another issue in dispute. Judge Gary insists that "his workmen knew they were always free to come to him or any plant officer, or to send committees." The Interchurch inquiry finds little reason to think that the workmen do come either singly or by temporary committees, except in very rare instances, and then only to confer on minor matters, fearing to discuss hours or wages.

The Mutuality Committee in the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company is an exception, to which there is no allusion in the report. It is a continuous committee consisting entirely of workmen, to whom the reasons for the discharge of any fellow worker are submitted. In case they are challenged, the foreman who discharges the man is called upon by the superintendent to answer the committee's objection. Although the final decision rests with the superintendent, or on appeal from him, with the president of the company, yet the foreman and superintendent are expected to maintain the stability of the working force and therefore would be held accountable for unnecessary discharges. It is not probable, however, that any protest against discharge for unionizing could prevail anywhere against the determined anti-union policy of the Corporation. There is no reason to think that any such "conference" is tolerated by the Steel Corporation, as the trade unions insist upon for collective bargaining and joint trade agreements regulating wages, hours and conditions of work.

No influence upon this Corporation seems to have been exerted by the experience of other corporations in basic industries, such as the Colorado Fuel and Iron, the Midvale-Cambria, the Bethlehem, the Inland, and the International Harvester Companies, in direct dealing with their employes through standing shop committees, shop unions or industrial councils, which participate in the management.

Counter Claims on Causes of the Strike

Having "no say" about their working conditions is claimed to be the chief occasion for what is asserted to be the "mass movement" strike, and the most persistent cause of discontent which is sure to prompt other strikes. This again is denied by the Steel Corporation, which insists that the strike movement came from without, was instigated, organized and sustained by outside labor leaders and unions, and was part of a country-wide radical conspiracy to "wrest the control of industry from its owners and place it in the hands of the radical element of organized labor," as one prominent employer stated. Others went so far as to charge the motive of the strike leaders to be the violent overthrow of the United States Government, in order to substitute the Bolshevik, Soviet or the Communist party program.

While John Fitzpatrick and William Z. Foster, who succeeded Mr. Gompers as leaders of the strike committee appointed by the American Federation of Labor, are more radical than those who appointed them, there is no proof that they were moved by these motives in calling or managing this strike. Both of them are loyal trade unionists and are not connected with other more radical organizations. The strike turned out to be one of the regular trade-union type, such as in this and other instances received the indorsement and support of the A. F. of L.

This fact was enough to draw the fire of opposition and contempt from radical organizations, such as the I. W. W. and the Communist party, some of whose adherents, however, undoubtedly endeavored to incite the strikers to more extreme action and strove to foment violent disturbances.

This cleavage between the trade union organization involved in the strike and the radical groups competing with them for leadership ran straight through every situation at the several strike centers. For instance, the official in charge of labor headquarters at Gary assured the writer that General Wood and his staff officers commanding the military there during the strike were "absolutly square." General Wood affirmed 95 per cent. of the strikers to be loyal men and found only a small group of unreasonably radical agitators with whom the military had to deal.

Indeed, the failure of the strike is attributed by Foster to the lack of support from the twenty-four conservative international unions whose trades were involved in the steel industry. The fact that their membership consists largely of the higher paid, skilled and semiskilled workers led them, as hitherto, to have less sympathy with the underpaid, unskilled laborers, to whom Fitzpatrick and Foster were unswervingly loyal throughout. While the United States Steel Corporation was widely acclaimed as having won freedom for the open shop, yet no demand was advanced by the strikers, their leaders or the American Federation of Labor for the closed shop.

Confidence and Hope

Reviewing the steel strike from the business management point of view, a prominent Chicago employer who has had close and varied contact with both sides in the industrial struggle, strikes this note of confidence and hope:

"Admitting that there is a sad lack of understanding between many employers and their employes, let us also acknowledge the tremendous strides which industry generally has made in the last decade in the improvement in the sanitation and safety of its workshops; and that industry is advancing steadily toward better understanding, a more effective co-operation, toward a more democratic form of administration. There is much to overcome before a perfect scheme of industrial control is reached and it cannot be reached without occasional strife. But that is no reason why we should despair of the ultimate result."

Quite as much in line with this employer's hope as with the complaint of labor, is the protest of the Interchurch report against having no continuous medium of communication and conference between management and men in the United States Steel policy. The aggravation on both sides due to this lack of understanding and therefore of consideration, especially for the foreign-speaking strangers to our American life and ways, is not overdrawn. The plea with employers, and, over their refusal, the appeal to the federal government to establish some ever open medium of communication and conference, are points well taken, in view of industrial strife as the only alternative.

Findings based upon any such body of facts as this report claims to be able to produce, are bound to influence public opinion, and later if not sooner affect legislation. Meanwhile, fairer play between all parties concerned is the only basis upon which to hope for a just and decisive verdict from the court of last appeal—the jury of public opinion.

The Dutch Tercentenary Celebrations

By Our Special Correspondent

It is not easy to understand why any of the Pilgrims left Holland. Of course they were not waited upon with automobiles; they had no Café Royal to tempt their appetites with the finest food to be found on the Continent. No services, impressive in their grandeur, were held in the magnificent cathedrals in their particular honor; no delightful trips in perfectly appointed steamboats along the canals, fell to their lot. These pleasures fell to those who went to Holland three hundred years after, to do them posthumous honor.

But still it is difficult to understand why any of the Pilgrims left so hospitable an asylum as was theirs in Holland. For the spirit of welcome poured out upon the travelers of this later day, was the spirit with which those refugees of the seventeenth century were greeted. The same university at Leyden, which today is second to none in Europe, was there in those old days, and some of their number partook of its intellectual opportunities. And the countryside, so beautiful now, is practically the same countryside in the midst of which they found their homes. The lovers still go to the same town hall for permission to publish their banns to which on April 27, 1618, went "Edward Winslow, printer, bachelor, from London, England, accompanied by Jonathan Brewster and Isaac Allerton, his acquaintances, with Elizabeth Barker, spinster, from Chattisham in England, accompanied by Janie Hazel, her niece and Mary Allerton, her acquaintance," and it is a building far more appropriate in its stately beauty for such a tender errand than the log cabin of a frontier settlement on Cape Cod shores. And so, too, the quaint stone houses in which the Pilgrims lived in Leyden, still standing and still tenanted, offered some comforts which they could not hope to duplicate in "furrin' parts."

Yet they did leave. I have always known this, of course. But it has never been such a vivid realization to me as it now is after having been a spectator of the esteem in which their memory is held in Holland as evidenced by the Tercentenary Celebration there in August last and having been a recipient of such gracious and unbounded hospitality as that tendered by the Dutch people to those who gathered at Leyden from Old and New England, and New Amsterdam as well. Yes, the Pilgrims did leave the comforts of Holland, in pursuit of an heroic ideal and in accordance with the commanding dictates of characters of rare nobility. And these inestimable qualities they poured into the life of western civilization, making all who share in their heritage and their history, proud of such associations. The Celebration had to be.

Nation Pays Worthy Tribute

With a fine sense of loyalty and with generous desire to adequately express the range of their appreciation, the people of Holland planned wide and representative expression of the honor they wished to pay to the memory of their old-time Pilgrim guests. From Queen to populace, the entire range of the nation paid worthy tribute. State and city, university and church, found opportunity to voice the appreciation which so permeates the descendants of the folk who offered refuge to the harried English Separatists in those days of misguided persecution under the reign of "good Queen Bess."

As was fitting, the first function of the Celebration was a reception by Queen Wilhelmina at the Royal Palace near Amsterdam. The Queen received with a gracious courtesy which spoke eloquently of the sincere interest in the occasion which she found frequent occasion to express. One felt that she was indeed a worthy representative of that broad-minded people whose record in the annals of the struggle for liberty is so gallant.

And then the University of Leyden paid its tribute by a noble session, held in one of its historic halls. Here the contact with Pilgrim atmosphere was more intimate. For as I have said, a number of the Pilgrim company attended the university, and among others, the son of John Robinson was given its degree. This fact and many others were cited in the eloquent addresses of Professors Van Ness and Eckhof, and one's imagination could picture the eager Pilgrims seated in that room instead of the audience which was there, listening to words of wise instruction from that same platform, where these centuries after, themselves were the subject of the morning's addresses. The impression of the continuity of history came to one with a force seldom experienced in this new, new land of ours.

The City of Leyden, too, gave formal expression to its proud sense of having been the city to welcome as inhabitants that persecuted band. The Burgomaster in official robes, and with his heavy gold chain and insignia of office hung about his neck, standing in one of the rooms of the brilliantly illuminated Town House, rich with carved furniture and wonderful tapestries upon the walls, rich also in associations, for to that very room the Pilgrims themselves came on various matters of citizens' business, spoke eloquently of the Pilgrim connections with that place. And he spoke in English, as indeed did all the speakers at all of the meetings.

The Witness of the Churches

Nor was the Church to be denied its witness. The evening at the New Church in Amsterdam was never to be forgotten. I cannot imagine any date within history at which it could properly have been called the "New" church. For its exterior and interior are hoary with age. And it is as magnificent in proportion and conception as were so many of the edifices built in the Dark Ages before the dawn of—well, let us say the masterpieces of the Upjohn Brothers in this Age of Light! Magnificent! Huge, open spaces from the great entrance to the chair-filled nave. Enormous pillars about the base of which were built circular boxes, the special property of the dignitaries of Church and State. In the far distance the brilliant choir filled this night with a great chorus. How the emotions were stirred as I heard the great organ playing the simple and almost haunting melody of the Dutch Hymn of Thanksgiving, which I had first learned to love in Appleton Chapel in far-away Cambridge. And then, out over the enormous congregation, melting into the vaulted reaches of the dusk-filled upper regions of the Cathedral, the sound of the voices poured forth. And somehow thanksgiving and Pilgrims and the listening souls of men all mingled together in one's consciousness to make the heart expand and the pulses throb.

Again it was the modest, small church at Delfshaven where we found ourselves gathered together. Just down the pier on which the church stands, by the old windmill, the Pilgrims had embarked in the Speedwell, men and women, fortified by a courage, the need of which we nowadays little know. Truly at that time, comforts and friends and fruitful Mother Earth a thing of yesterday, themselves separated from death by only frail planking of a small vessel's bottom, and their hearts stayed only by invincible determination and an uncertain hope—truly then they did know "that they were pilgrims" and we are thankful for the added testimony to the effect that "they looked not so much on the things of earth, but lifted up their eyes to heaven, their dearest country, and quieted their spirits." I wonder just how much?

And so the little church became an especial sanctuary as we sat there that afternoon, thinking upon these things. But alas! What is this

THE CALLING OF THE HILLS

By GEORGE A. PERSELL

When corn shocks stand in stately rows
And autumn winds are cold,
And falling leaves dance merrily
In woodlands brown and gold;
There comes a clear, insistent call
Which all my being thrills,
A call I never fail to heed—
The calling of the hills.

A hint of frost is in the air,
I feel its witching spell;
I seek the quiet upland roads
And haunts I love full well.

And ever as I climb the heights
A call floats down and fills
My soul with nameless ecstasy—
The calling of the hills.

A sense of God is everywhere;
I walk with reverent feet
As in a dim cathedral aisle,
With pious incense sweet,
And gladly would I follow far
Where inclination wills,
The magic call that lures me on—
The calling of the hills.

that the minister of the church is saying? "We have no proof that the Pilgrims ever attended this church!" Probably they did, and at any rate succeeding generations have been positive in the feeling that they ought to have done so, for Pilgrim memorial windows shed their soft rays of colored light over the austere simplicity of the unostentatious interior. And surely their spirit was present in our midst as we listened to words of moving eloquence from Dr. Boynton, and we felt a new sense of the brave proportions of their adventure, the majesty of their stake on faith.

From there to the Cathedral at Rotterdam, where Protestant rearrangement of the Catholic house of worship, a thing so badly done that it nearly amounts to impious sacrilege, was only condoned by beautiful music and forgotten under the spell of Dr. Samuel Eliot's inspired and inspiring closing word of challenge for carrying forward in our day and generation the Pilgrim spirit, the spirit whose soul is not in the wayside campings, but "whose soul is in the journey."

I have not alluded to the speeches in detail. There always is a very great deal of talking at such a celebration. Nor have I spoken in detail of many meetings, of boat trips, of social functions. The news editor forbids.

Dutch Hospitality

But I must close with the proper finale. And fortunately my need was adequately met by the Committee on Arrangements. Profuse hospitality had followed the visitors everywhere and upon every occasion. But the grand social event was reserved for the last. That evening a large banquet was given in Rotterdam, to which all the guests and many of the celebrities of Holland were invited. Two hundred sat down to the gorgeously dressed tables and one hundred and ninety-nine were in at the finish. After the "Star-Spangled Banner" had been "rendered" three times by the American delegates, each delegate at the attack with heroic determination written upon his countenance to spare no shred of his voice, but in each case modifying into hunted and painful sotto voce as the fearful and wonderful climax of the chorus "came round," when there was threatened a fourth spontaneous outburst of that dramatic expression of patriotism, one delegate left! And history will pardon him. Four S. S. B.'s in one evening is too much! That, however, is another story. And after all it was not the fault of the Pilgrims.

The Pilgrims had no faults. Nor were the Celebrations unsuited to their subject. Holland still possesses the magnanimity of spirit which played its saving part in the chapter of the struggle for freedom which ended at Plymouth Bay.

Or, after all, did it only just begin?

From Day to Day

By Allen Chesterfield

So Remington of Fall River is dead! He has been for so many years such a picturesque and commanding figure in religious circles, locally and over a wide area, that his absence from this time on from the earthly assemblies of the saints will be noted by all who like to see the ranks of kingdom builders kept full. But Clinton V. S. Remington would probably say to us in the language of Dwight L. Moody, "Some day you will pick up the morning paper and read that Moody is dead. Don't you believe it." For vitality was the outstanding characteristic of this Fall River broker, a vitality which the grave itself is powerless to affect. His was the familiar story of devotion to a business which his own thrift and industry helped to make prosperous, of deep interest in civic affairs, of unsought but faithful office-holding, of pride in the City of Spindles where he was born and in whose commercial, educational and moral development he was so constantly interested.

But "Remington of Fall River" suggests to me most of all an earnest and forth-putting Christian life and an unrivaled devotion to the Central Congregational Church, of which he had been a member for seventy years. He was not one of the men who find it easier to be a good Christian outside the church than inside. He was never blind to the defects of the church, but he felt that his main duty consisted not in criticizing it, but in helping it. A minor item in his round of duties was the supplying of flowers for the adornment of the sanctuary. He always had a little boutonnière ready for the preacher, which he presented with his winning smile. It meant a great deal to the regular incumbent and even more to the "supply." who in his round of the churches sometimes does not even get a handshake before going into the pulpit.

But Clinton Remington could see beyond the borders of the parish which was his first love. As the Fall River News says: "Hospitals and the homes of the sick were familiar places to him. If he became weary in such works he was never weary of them. 'What are we here for?' he would ask." He represented Massachusetts at the Grand Rapids meeting of the National Council last autumn. He was always keen for fellowship and the "good old gospel." He spoke his mind freely on various themes, as when he once told me that my pulpit utterance should be several tones louder. But praise was more native to him than blame.

The late Pres. Roswell D. Hitchcock of Union Seminary used to say, "The summer is like a battle. We get together at its close and number up our dead." As I go over the roster for the season just ended of those who have passed from our sight, my mind lingers on the names of two laymen, Winthrop Murray Crane of Dalton and Clinton V. S. Remington of Fall River, both pillars, products and ornaments of the Christian Church. In the case of each, I find myself echoing these words from the editorial of the Fall River News: "Who will fill his place? God give us another such man to lead in the business, civic and religious life of the community."

Atlanta Seminary Begins New Year

Atlanta Seminary entered upon its 20th year Sept. 29, with a student enrollment decidedly larger than last year. Prof. Ralph Gillam, formerly of Milford, Mass., well known as an evangelist, gave the address at the opening service. His subject was, "The Importance of Soul-Winning in the Ministry." Since then he has already represented the seminary in South Georgia and South Alabama. Other new teachers who are giving single courses in the school this term are Rev. W. W. Memminger, D. D., rector of All Saints Church. Rev. F. D. Stevenson, pastor of the Peachtree Road Presbyterian Church, Prof. R. D. Webb, Secretary of the State Sunday School Association, and Rev. Raymond Derr, pastor of the Hemphill Ave. M. E. Church.

The largest room in Georgia Hall has been fitted up as a "Common Room" for the students. Its use was inaugurated with the first party of the season, and even in one week it is proving its pleasantness and usefulness. The Seminary's evening classes started on Oct. 12 in the Y. M. C. A.

Through the invitation of the American branch of the Sulgrave Institute—an organization designed to promote good feeling between Great Britain and America—members of the group pictured above have been visiting different centers in this country, offering their congratulations on the Pilgrim Tercentenary and bearing the good will of the motherland to its overseas daughter.

Dr. Mills' Change of Base

A Denominational Event

The First Church in Montclair, N. J., said farewell two weeks ago to its beloved pastor, Dr. Charles S. Mills, who has accepted an urgent invitation to undertake the administration of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund and the Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers. The largeness of the new opportunity has led Dr. Mills' people to subordinate their own earnest desire for a continuation of this fruitful pastorate in the interests of the larger fellowship.

The Council of Dismission which met at Montclair Sept. 28, and of which Dr. C. H. Wilson was Moderator, gave remarkable testimony to the affection and admiration in which Dr. Mills is held in his church and state. For more than an hour, members of the church and the Council gave spontaneous utterance to their admiration for him as a leader and organizer, and their affection for him as pastor and friend. Peculiarly affecting was the testimony of the young people of the church to the influence of Dr. Mills over them during all the period of his pastorate. Mingled with a deep note of regret at his resignation was a profound recognition of the greatness of the service that he can render as General Secretary of the Annuity Fund.

Dr. Mills' own conception of the scope of the office had fired the imagination both of his brethren and his church, with the result that the entire propriety of his resignation was acknowledged.

From the resolutions adopted by the Council we quote:

> Dr. Charles S. Mills in his brilliant and fruitful ministry in the First Congregational Church of Montclair has established himself in the esteem of all the neighboring churches of our fellowship and in the affection of his brethren in the ministry. Notwithstanding the great responsibilities which he has carried and the many public calls upon his time and strength he has been faithful in his attendance at the meetings of the Association, at the numerous Councils called in the interests of our churches, and in the performance of his full share of the administrative duties involved in these ecclesiastical assemblies. His fine brotherly spirit has drawn us all to him and has been a constant source of encouragement. His great executive ability, his wisdom in counsel, and his forcefulness in action have strengthened the hands of all our ministers and churches. Not only the great church which he has served with such distinguished ability but all the Congregational churches of New Jersey as well suffer a distinct loss in his removal to another field of service. Dr. Mills came to a church that had been distinguished for many years for the elevation and dignity of its spiritual message and for a church life that had been fostered by the devotion of a great pastor. He has nobly maintained both these great traditions.
> We are persuaded that there is no other man in our fellowship so well equipped for administering the office of General Secretary of the Annuity Fund. We are also convinced that this office in its immediate contact with all the ministers of our churches and with its opportunity of appeal to the young men in our seminaries, colleges and universities, offers an unmeasured opportunity to the man who occupies it. The office as at present enlarged will be interpreted and defined as to its purpose and scope by its first incumbent. It is therefore with great joy that we see this task of definition and interpretation committed to the hands of Dr. Mills. And it is with a sense of pride that we Congregationalists of New Jersey find the churches of our fellowship in the United States turning to one of our own ministers to fill this position of exalted trust and prophetic service. Dr. Mills goes forth with our confident hopes and fervent prayers.

This action of the Council followed a number of warm tributes to Dr. Mills from various members of the church and Council and from representatives of other churches in the vicinity. As the Montclair paper says:

> Simply and informally staged as the meeting was in the parish house with very little prearrangement, this spontaneous chorus of praise, gratitude and affection constituted a modest triumph such as few men are permitted to enjoy.

The members of the church had already expressed in formal resolutions their deep regret over the resignation of their pastor, acknowledging their "great debt to him for his splendid leadership during the eight years past, the most eventful in its history," and go on to say:

> How wonderfully he marshalled the forces of this people in the rebuilding of its temple of worship, when fire swept away the earlier edifice, is known to us all. He marshalled the forces of this people, also, in meeting the calamities of a world swept by the fire of war. For these great services, as well as for the continuous upbuilding of the spiritual life of this people during the eight years in which he has been our honored leader, this church will always hold him in grateful and loving remembrance.

At a farewell reception given to Dr. Mills on the evening of Oct. 6 the warm good will, not only of the congregation but of the Christian people of Montclair, irrespective of denominational lines, was made abundantly evident.

The election of Dr. Mills to this important office, though only recently announced, dates back to a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund Commission, when Dr. Herring presented the report of the nominating committee that had been appointed, recommending the election of Dr. Mills as the Executive Secretary of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund. The election by the Executive Committee was later supplemented by the action of the Trustees of the Annuity Fund, who on July 12, elected Dr. Mills to the secretaryship of that Fund. He expects to assume his new duties at once.

A Word From Dr. Mills' Predecessor

Manifest fitness indicated that Dr. Mills, who has been for seven years a Trustee of the Annuity Board, deeply concerned in the whole vast Annuity project, Chairman of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund Commission and of its Executive Committee, and Director of the Board of Ministerial Relief, should assume direct and immediate charge of the work, in the capacity of Secretary.

From Dr. Mills' direction of the Fund, great results are to be expected. No man in our denomination has a more intimate knowledge of the details of the annuity plan, and no one is more far-seeing and constructive, or more forceful in execution than is he. The Executive Committee of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, being keenly alive to the possibilities of the expansion of the scope and result of the work under the direction of Dr. Mills, adopted the following resolution, submitted by Dr. W. E. Barton:

> It is the unanimous judgment of this Executive Committee that Dr. Mills should interpret the duties of his office liberally, as being more than an office position. While his first duty must have to do with the safe and wise administration of the large fund which the churches are contributing, and its distribution for the ends for which it has been contributed, that, in the judgment of this committee is not the whole of his responsibility. It is the hope of this Executive Committee that he will be able to visit the colleges and present to students the claims of the ministry; that he will visit Conferences and Associations, and be able by his addresses and conferences, to exalt the ideals and elevate the standards of the ministry; and, in general, that he will use his experience in the pastorate, and in his varied labors of administration, as widely and effectively as his time and strength will permit. This Committee will hear with sympathy, from time to time, his own suggestions in the general line of this Minute, as they shall be made clear to him in the work of the office and of the field, and will stand ready to co-operate with him in furthering these ends.

At the moment of grave decisions in our denominational life, caused by the death of Dr. Herring, beloved and honored leader, and the institution of the annuity principle in our denominational operation, the election of Dr. Mills will serve to give confidence, steadiness, and wisdom, to one of the great functions of Congregationalism.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

John Robinson

John Robinson, Pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers, by Walter H. Burgess (Harcourt, Brace and Howe). This is not only the best biography of the beloved pastor of the Pilgrims, it presents him in his surroundings, the men and movements of his time, the rural, academic, civic, social and religious life in the midst of which he lived. It fills up the gaps hitherto existing in accounts of his ancestry, his early home life, and his academic training. There is an important chapter on the Influence of Robinson on the thought of his life and age. The author has searched widely in church and town records, in the records of Cambridge University and in Dutch records and presents his "original material." He starts out with the statement that "Robinson was a remarkable man. He left the impress of his thought upon the religious life of America and England," and the biography proves the assertion. Nowhere else, also, are the latter days of Robinson so clearly set forth and the later history of the Leyden Church. The book is well written and full of interest. We commend it to our readers.

Social Problems

The Greatest Failure in All History, by John Spargo (Harpers). This is a crushing indictment of Bolshevism, based upon official Russian documents, the laws and decrees of Soviet Russia, and other authentic records, revealing "the ultimate madness of bureaucratism, the most complete subjection of the individual citizen to an all-powerful state since the days of Lycurgus." No one can doubt the value of Mr. Spargo's work. He is absolutely trustworthy. His evidence can be accepted without question. If one really wishes to know the truth about the Bolsheviki, here it is, revealed in their own writings. The tyranny of the worst days of the French Revolution was mild compared to this. Let other nations take warning from Russia. Not by their promises but by their deeds let the Bolsheviki be judged.

Labor's Challenge to the Social Order, by John Graham Brooks (Macmillan). A most timely volume, dealing with present-day conditions. It is sane, unprejudiced, judicial and on the whole inspiring and encouraging. It reveals clearly the worst and the best of both labor and capital, and deals with such topics as Lessons from the Communists, Government Ownership, Who Shall Spend My Savings? Socializing the Milk Supply, How Long Shall We Work? The Employer's Case against the Union, Syndicalism, The New Guild, etc. Mr. Brooks lays great stress on the value of co-operation and shows over and over again that labor is learning conservatism by its own exercise of economic and political power; that "democracy is its own educator." The volume is intensely interesting and crammed full of important information. Without hesitation we commend it as the most important recent volume on the labor situation.

The Principles of Sociology, by Edward Alsworth Ross (Century). A volume of over 700 pages by one of the leading sociologists of the country. And it is interesting, too, even to the lay reader. Professor Ross has been collecting material for this volume for seventeen years. His works on Russia and China were a by-product of this larger treasure-store. The main divisions of the volume are entitled, The Social Population, Social Forces, Social Processes, Social Products, Some Sociological Principles. The section devoted to Social Processes contains thirty-seven chapters. It is impossible to summarize so large and complicated a work. It discusses a great variety of topics with abundant illustration from history and personal observation.

What Social Classes Owe to Each Other, by William Graham Sumner (Harpers). The republication of this oft-quoted classic, "an unflinching statement of the individualistic position" is timely, though it first appeared in 1883. It attacks fallacies of socialist positions, more clamorous today than ever, and while it may seem too extreme in its individualism it emphasizes fundamental principles of liberty and democracy which need reassertion. It is still a book to be quoted.

The New Frontier, by Guy Emerson (Holt). A fine study of the American spirit and temper, especially an effort to apply liberal principles to the problems of today. The section on the Industrial problem is especially valuable, asserting that "in America labor is not at heart revolutionary," but that many of its desires are just. An important point made is that radicalism is providing labor all its literature. Some chapter headings will indicate the drift of the volume: The Leadership That Made America, What Is a Liberal? The Need for Fifty Million Capitalists, The American Federation of Brains, etc. It is a stimulating and worth-while discussion.

Harpers

John Spargo

Substitutes for the Saloon, by Raymond Calkins (Houghton Mifflin). A new and revised edition of a valuable study of the liquor problem, first published in 1901. The new edition is amply justified by a new preface and several additional chapters of great value. In the preface attention is called to certain conclusions, especially concerning the social value of the saloon, which time has shown to be erroneous. The two chapters added by Robert Woods, on A New Synthesis after the Saloon, and Prohibition and Social Hygiene, are of exceeding importance and present the conclusions of a recognized authority on the subject. They are up-to-date and instructive. Closely second in value are chapters on Landmarks in the History of Prohibition, Prohibition and the Church, and The Motion Picture Theater as a Saloon Substitute. The new volume will take its place with the most important discussions of the whole liquor question.

These Things Shall Be, by George Lansburg (Huebsch). A half-dozen short essays delivered originally before Socialist and Labor organizations. The author is a revolutionist but declares that "force and violence, by whomsoever it is used, is wrong." He is "as much opposed to the dictation of a handful of workmen as to the dictatorship of emperors and kings." "Brotherhood and love are the means of our salvation."

Problems of Law, by John Henry Wigmore (Scribners). A study of law's evolution, with the arguments that judges have more freedom of discretion, that we have professional law-makers and that personal international law be developed by our states taking the initiative to secure uniform laws.

For the Best Life

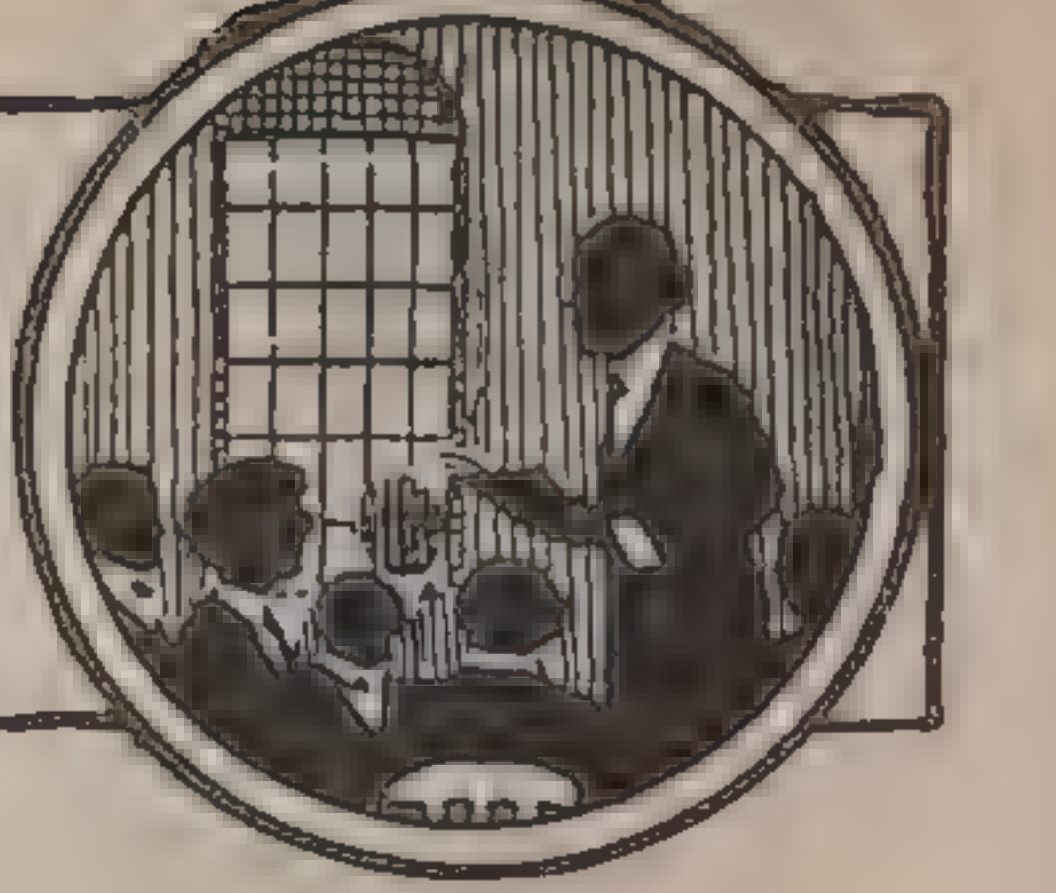
Fundamentals of Prosperity, by Roger W. Babson (Revell). An exceptionally interesting little book of practical advice by the head of a great statistical organization. He speaks from personal experience and declares that we should pay more attention to religion; that integrity, faith, industry, co-operation are the foundations of national prosperity and that there is a close relation between increasing religious interest and increasing prosperity. Mr. Babson's suggestions concerning ministers and the church are addressed to laymen and call for more loyal and generous support.

Education for Democracy, by Henry Frederick Cope (Macmillan)). "Education for democracy," says the author, "is social training under a spiritual interpretation of life and for the whole of social living." Some of the chapter titles will show the trend of the book: Democracy as a Religious Ideal; Problems of World Living; The Spiritual Nature of Education in a Democracy; Beginning at Home; Democratic Training through the Church; Spiritual Values in School Studies; Organizing the Community; A Community Program, etc. It is a very suggestive and instructive volume, thoroughly progressive and pointing the way for the march of events.

Morale, by G. Stanley Hall (Appleton). "A plea for a new criterion of all human worths and values," all things to be revaluated "by what they contribute to individual, industrial and social morale." This search for morale is "one of the best culture results of the war." Dr. Hall discusses instructively such topics as, The Morale of Fear, Death, Hate and Anger; Morale, Sex and Women; Morale and Prohibition; Morale and Profiteering; Morale and Feminism; Morale and Education; Morale and Religion, etc. And always he is stimulating and interesting. The chapter on Morale and "The Reds" is timely, instructive, and on the whole encouraging.

You, by Irving R. Allen (Cosmopolitan). A book full of stimulating advice. It defines the law of success, suggests a series of tests of self and follows with chapters based on the result of those tests. It puts familiar rules of healthful living in a new and persuasive way.

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL



DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Hew Down the Corrupt Tree

International Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 31. Matt. 7:15-27.

This is World's Temperance Sunday. We therefore take up the lesson assigned in sequence with that of Sept. 19. Recall the points made in that lesson concerning the fascination, stimulation, delusion and power of the habit of using alcoholic liquors. We now take up the Results of the Habit, uniting both the texts from Proverbs and Matthew. The former gives us the vivid picture of the drunkard and the latter the suggestive figure of the tree that yields the bad fruit and therefore should be cut down.

The following are results of intemperate living:

1. The Economic Waste. Prov. 23:21 says truly that the intemperate man comes to poverty. That is the inevitable end of the whole wretched business. Think of the astounding loss of grains and necessary food products that result from the distilling and brewing of alcoholic beverages. It would not be so disastrous if alcohol were the product of useless materials; but it comes from the essential grains. Alcohol is the thief of the bread of the world.

Then sum up briefly the terrible losses that come to families where the contents of the pay envelope went so largely into the saloons instead of being spent for the necessities of life for the family. Literally tens of thousands of families were kept in dire poverty by the intemperate habits of the providers of the family resources.

2. Sorrow. Prov. 23:29 contains two exclamations. Literally the verse reads, Who hath oh! Who hath alas! These are the sorrowful exclamations heard most often in the homes of those who are the victims of intemperance. Many a time those who know the homes where intemperance ravages the domestic life have heard the Oh! and Alas! of women and children, and they know that there are sorrows that are worse than those caused by death. Living grief is worst of all. To see a husband, son or brother maudlin drunk and to suffer at the hands of men what women and children have suffered through drink is a large part of the deepest woe of humanity. It is not simply brutality and humiliating coarseness; it is the consciousness that the poison has robbed the soul of its purity and power. This is real sorrow.

3. Evil or Corrupt Fruit. We have the right to come to a fruit tree and expect to find it bearing good, sound products of the sort that the nature of the tree warrants us to expect. We have the right to expect from men and women the fruitfulness of noble, useful living. If trees bear only corrupt fruit we cut them down. That is the deserved and inevitable end.

What are some of the results of intemperate living that are suggested by the figure of the unfruitful tree?

Defective Fruit. This means fruit that is less nearly perfect than we have the right to expect that it will be. Let us never forget that God expects of us high and noble living and that this is the reasonable and normal product of our daily life. To do defective work is to rob God. It is to cheat our fellow men. Every community has the right to demand from every member the most useful and fruitful life possible. Do we think of this often enough? A brave, clean life is the normal life, that which the community is warranted in expecting from all its members. It is an interesting moment when we become fully aware that the fruitful life is the normal life, which God expects of us, which our fellows expect of us and which we ought to expect of ourselves.

Decayed Fruit. It is a short and ugly word, but we generally speak of this kind of fruit as "rotten." This word is sometimes applied to those conditions of broken-down character which are the product of intemperate living. It is a harsh word but it describes the conditions accurately and not too bluntly. Along with drunkenness go all the companion vices that are degrading and brutal. In certain cases excessive use of alcohol is gilded and extolled in song; but it is ugly and vile at the center and in time the rottenness seeps through.

Poison Fruit. This is the final form in which the evil fruit appears. It ought to give health and strength; it furnishes only noxious and poison products. Every life ought to be health-giving. Every member of the community ought to be furnishing the energies to his fellow men which build up all the tissues of the social organism. Alcohol breaks down the structure of society. It instills the subtle poisons that finally bring paralysis and death. There is no greater fallacy than to affirm that the state can afford to derive its revenues from the traffic in a social poison. The alcohol tree is known by its fruits and the only way in which to deal with it is to cut it down.

The Study of the Bible

IV. Interpreting the Bible

Remembering that religion made the Bible, not the Bible religion, that the test of inspiration is the truth and vital value of what is said to be inspired, not the book in which it is found, whether it be the Bible or the Koran, that myth, legend, allegory, story and parable may be instruments for teaching eternal truth, that the Bible grew as the religion it portrays grew and thus has in it that which is outgrown, that much in our Bible belongs to the history of our growing religion and is not vital today, that we want more certainty and authority, of the right kind, not less, and that we should test all by our highest authority, the essential spirit and teaching of Jesus, which embodies universal and ultimate religious truth—remembering these things, we have a fair point of view from which to interpret the Bible and find what is essential, vital, permanent, and also what is non-essential, transient or injurious to the highest Christian life as we should live it today.

Let us now see how this point of view will work out in actual application.

THE SACRIFICIAL SYSTEM

The sacrificial system occupies a large place in the Old Testament and has been a controlling factor in shaping the doctrine of atonement in much of our past and even in some of our present-day theology.

Sacrifices to Jehovah came to be the official method by which the Hebrew came to God. They were supposed to appease the wrath of God and satisfy his justice, thus to atone for sin, win Jehovah's favor and make it possible for him to forgive the sinner.

> "I have had enough of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts."—Isa. 1:11.
> "I spake not to your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices."—Jer. 7:22.
> "I desire goodness and not sacrifice."—Hos. 6:6.
> "Though you offer me your burnt-offerings and meal-offerings, I will not accept them."—Amos 5:22.
> "Burnt-offering and sin-offering hast thou not required."—Ps. 40:6.

The Old Testament says repeatedly that these sacrifices were commanded by Jehovah. But what say the prophets, who are generally considered to be the great religious teachers of the Hebrews?

"I have had enough of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats." Isa. 1:11. Read the following verses, through the twentieth.

Jehovah is said to have sent Moses to tell Pharaoh to let the Israelites go three days' journey into the wilderness to offer sacrifices to Jehovah, their God. Ex. 3:18. But Jer. 7:22 says, "For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices."

"For I desire goodness, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings." Hosea 6:6. "I hate, I despise your feasts, and I will take no delight in your solemn assemblies. Yea, though ye offer me your burnt-offerings and meal-offerings, I will not accept them. . . . But let justice roll down as waters and righteousness as a mighty stream." Amos 5:21, 22, 24. Read the entire chapter and note particularly the 25th verse.

The very question as to how the people shall come before Jehovah and what will make them acceptable to him is answered in Micah 6:6-8. "Wherewith shall I come before Jehovah, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings, with calves a year old? Will Jehovah be pleased with thousands of rams or with ten thousands of rivers

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Justice and Kindness in Judgment of Others

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 24–30

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Lesson. Matt. 7 : 1-5, John 7 : 14-24.

Humility as Assessor of Other Men's Lives. The law is absolute that we must face the facts of our own state before we go on to judge our brother. When pride sits as assessor, or self-satisfaction, our judgment of others in its claim of infallibility is sure to come back, sooner or later, like a boomerang to hit our own souls. Christ warns us of that as a certain experience which must appear in that final judgment which is for every one of us. His warning against judging others has a large place in the program of life which he made for his witnessing disciples on the Mount. Judgment is not our office. We are not called to it or fitted for it. We are usurping our Lord's own function when we climb up into his judgment seat. Why then is it such a constant temptation of our lives? Largely, of course, on account of our own imperfections and conceit. Christ's own figure is of intrusive elements in our eyes which interfere with vision. "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye." But another reason, I am sure, is bound up with our necessity to form some kind of estimate of people whom we meet in order to do our work in life. An estimate is not a judgment. It is not final, it is merely a working hypothesis, subject to revision and confessedly founded on imperfect information. It is when we harden such necessary and momentary estimates into formal and final judgments that we come under the condemnation of Christ.

The Burden of Proof. A Christian is under obligation to give his fellow traveler on life's road the benefit of the doubt. The burden of proof rests upon accusation. In that court, so far as it is a court at all, a man is held to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. And yet how many of us jump at malicious gossip and are slow to welcome its disproof! We go too easily back to that old, barbaric law, the source of so much cruelty, which forces an accused man to prove his innocence to the satisfaction of the court. And all this springs from survivals of evil in our hearts and a perverted will which delights in the discovery of other people's wickedness and weakness. It is a self-revelation of uncharitable tendencies which should send us to our knees.

Thinking Charitably. A judgment is an expressed opinion. It is also a test of our good will. Do we really love our neighbor as ourself? Or do we only pretend? For the claim of duty goes back far beyond the spoken to the unspoken judgment. Have we any right, even in our own thought, to make a settled estimate of our neighbor—as if he were always going to be as we seem to find him now, and as if we were judge and jury in the final assize? Such declaration of finality in our judgment is a presumptuous thing. It contradicts the law of love. It reveals us as unloving and fixes our own status rather than that of the other.

CHRIST'S CURE FOR WORRY

For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. Matt. 6: 32.

Be not tossed up and down by your outward circumstances. If God prospers you, do not ride high, as the vessel does when the tide lifts it up; and if he does not prosper you, do not sink down as the vessel does when the tide ebbs away again. Do not be so affected by external things as to get into a state of worry, and fretfulness, and care, and anxiety, and distress.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Sorrow itself is not so hard to bear as the thought of sorrow coming. Airy ghosts that work no harm do terrify us more than men in steel with bloody purpose.—T. B. Aldrich.

But, Lord, tomorrow,
What of tomorrow, Lord?
Shall there be rest from toil, be truce from sorrow,
Be living green upon the sward,
Now but a barren grave to me,
Be joy for sorrow?—
"Did I not die for thee?
Do I not live for thee?—leave Me tomorrow."
—Christina G. Rossetti.

Do not look forward to what might happen tomorrow; the same everlasting Father who cares for you today, will take care of you tomorrow, and every day. Either he will shield you from suffering, or he will give you unfailing strength to bear it. Be at peace then, and put aside all anxious thoughts and imaginations.—Francis de Sales.

This is God's way; He does not allow us to store up manna for the morrow. For those who trust him he finds both the morrow and the manna.—Joseph Parker.

It has been well said, that no man ever sank under the burden of the day. It is when tomorrow's burden is added to the burden of today, that the weight is more than one can bear.—George MacDonald.

Give us, O Lord, the faith that overleaps today and while it finds and keeps the path of present duty leaves the morrow to thy guardian care. Provide thou things which are needful for us, then as now, that with lightened hearts and shoulders we may go on with gladness. Remember all who in perplexity have forgotten thee and all who in anxiety for others have lost their own peace of heart. Open a way before them, give light in the darkness and confidence in weakness, that the joy of believing may be their portion. O Thou who knowest that we have need of all these things, so lead and satisfy us that we may never lack thy children's promised cheer. In the name of Christ. Amen.

—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

Our Alien Neighbors

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 31–Nov. 6

BY HENRY M. BOWDEN

Topic: The Immigrant in Our Own Community. Romans 12 : 9-18.

A Useful Citizen. About ten years ago a Ruthenian, tired of several years of city life in America, took a situation with a farmer in a New England hill town. He has become a recognized part of the community, is a part of the family, and has his place in the town's social life. On great occasions, when the town shows hospitality to many guests, he falls back on knowledge gained from earlier experience as cook, and ministers to public need with much appreciation.

Seasonal Labor. Returning after many years to his old home, an American found the little village overshadowed by a great camp of five thousand men, and the English language momentarily supplanted. Some of the workers had families, but the one-room village school offered no opportunities for the children. The farmers complained of thieving, and the neighbors of drunkenness and disorder on Saturday nights.

Foreign Colonies. There are immigrants in large colonies, brought together by the demands of business, or by the needs and opportunities of a large city. The group may be homogeneous, or of divergent elements. The members of some of these groups seek citizenship, while others hold aloof, organizing their societies on the basis of home politics. Some of these societies are moved by religious motives; others oppose all religion. In any event, these groups are here, permanent parts of a community which must somehow work out a practical way of living together.

Social Problems. The most important and difficult problems of the immigrant are the social problems. These approach solution when members of a community feel themselves such, recognizing mutual duties and obligations. The single immigrant who went to the country found a place in the life of the community. In the case of the transient camp, a sense of community obligation comes with difficulty to either side. It is hard to be neighborly with transient groups. It is hard for us to see our own responsibility in the matter, and often as hard to get either the immigrant or the old community to feel any common tie. The third set of conditions are those under which the great body of our immigrant population lives. How can we get a basis for common feeling in such numbers as we find in our cities? But this is none other than the problem of the city which must be solved.

Christianity the Solution. St. Ignatius defined Christianity as a way of living together. Real Christianity emphasizes the community spirit, and intensifies the social virtues. It is by practicing this sort of Christianity that we shall arrive at the solution of our problem.

WITH THE CHILDREN

When Aunt Frances Smiled

By Harriet Lummis Smith

Patty sometimes wondered how she had ever dared to say it. She was only six years old at the time. It occurred to her at the supper table one night that she had never seen Aunt Frances smile, and the thought was so astonishing that she fairly choked over her mug of milk.

"Aunt Frances," said Patty after her aunt had slapped her on the back in her usual preoccupied manner, and she had blinked away the tears, "Aunt Frances, if anything should tickle you, would you laugh?"

Aunt Frances looked at her in astonishment. Then her eyebrows went up and she demanded, "What in the world do you mean, child?" Patty was encouraged.

"I'd like to tickle you and see. Because you never do laugh, you know. Why don't you? Don't you think anything is funny?"

Aunt Frances pushed back her chair. The old sadness had come back to her face, and for the moment something more, something which made Patty feel afraid.

"No, child," said Aunt Frances. "Nothing is funny to me any more, and never will be."

Now Patty was nearly twelve, and she had grown almost used to Aunt Frances' sad-eyed gravity—almost but not quite. There were times when she was hungry for a little home gayety. It must be admitted that Patty's nature did not reflect the somber hues of her surroundings. "As well raise a plant in a cellar as a child in such an atmosphere," Mrs. Deacon Bliss had said many a time when Patty was younger, but even she was forced to admit that Patty had thrived without much home sunshine. Probably that was because she had the faculty of making enough to supply her needs. Her laughter woke the echoes of the quiet house. Her bright face flashed from room to room, the only bright thing that the tall mirrors ever reflected.

"Patty," Aunt Frances said one morning, "next week is your twelfth birthday. I am going to put ten dollars in the bank for you as usual. But if there is some little thing you would like besides, you may have it. I am going to let you take your choice, for I want this birthday to be a happy one."

Patty's heart fluttered. Her cheeks reddened. Her eyes sought her aunt's wistfully.

"Well," said Aunt Frances, with weary kindliness. "Is there anything you wish?"

"O, yes'm. There is something I want so much that it hurts me."

"Well, what is it?" Aunt Frances looked at her half wondering, half impatient. It never occurred to her that Patty could be afraid to speak out.

"I'd like," said Patty, stumbling over the words, "to have a party."

"Patty!" Aunt Frances drew back, growing strangely pale. "This house is no place for merry-makings. I couldn't think of it."

But now that Patty's courage had reached the speaking point, it carried her farther. "Oh wait, Aunt Frances," she cried, clutching her hand. "I don't mean the kind of parties the other girls have, where they play games in the sitting-room, and their mothers play with them. But I've thought of another kind of party, and this house is just the loveliest place for it that ever was."

"Well?" said Aunt Frances. Somehow she could not help saying that, Patty's eyes were so eager.

"It's a dress-up party," Patty explained, "and we'll stay up in the garret and won't bother you one bit. If you'd only let us put on those old clothes that are up there, packed away, we'd have the loveliest, loveliest time that ever was in the world."

"Why, Patty, I don't think the girls would care for that."

"Oh, yes, they would, Aunt Frances. They all think that dressing up is the nicest of anything. And I'd ever so much rather have it than money in the bank."

Aunt Frances sighed. It cost her more than Patty knew to say "Yes," but she had not the heart to say "No."

"Very well, Patty, if that is your choice, you may have it. But I shall want you to see that nothing is injured and that everything is put back just as you found it. If not," said Aunt Frances gravely, "of course you will not expect such a permission another time."

As the days passed Patty thought of nothing but her "dressing-up" party, and talked of little else. It was not to be a large company. Even Patty recognized the limitations of the garret. But the six girls who were invited were the envied of all their mates. Patty had told so much about the treasures of her aunt's garret, that every girl in her list of acquaintances was anxious to see it for herself.

Grace for a Child

By Eleanor W. Hale

Lord, we thank thee for this food.
Help us to be kind and good,
And the things for which we pray,
May we practice, every day.

The guests came early on Patty's birthday afternoon. Patty was resplendent in a new plaid frock and a stiffly starched white apron. Aunt Frances, in her black dress, welcomed each new arrival with her usual unsmiling gentleness.

"I think she might look a little gladder when Patty's twelve," Elizabeth Moore whispered to Grace Russell, but Grace was too impressed with the solemnity of the occasion to make any reply.

But when they went trooping up to the garret, all constraint vanished. Peals of laughter floated down the stairs. The sound of seven excited voices talking all at once made a happy tumult over Aunt Frances' head.

"They really seem to be enjoying themselves," Aunt Frances said wonderingly, as she went on with her preparations for supper.

Patty had not asked for the supper or expected it, but Aunt Frances had a pride of her own which forbade that these invited guests should go away from her home without refreshment. So to Patty's amazement the blue china came down from the shelves. Patty could not rid herself of the idea that it was taking a liberty to eat off the blue china.

While Aunt Frances was opening a jar of marmalade, and making similar preparations, the dressing-up party in the garret was turning out to be an immense success. Elizabeth Moore trailed about majestically in a purple delaine, made in the days of crinoline. Grace Russell presented a startling appearance in an old-fashioned riding-habit. Patty herself wore her favorite flowered muslin and a fur-lined cape. The other girls were decked out in cast-off costumes, representing the styles of the last forty years, even to the bonnets. Patty was right in thinking that the girls would enjoy themselves. Within fifteen minutes they declared that they had never had such a good time in their lives.

By and by Elizabeth grew tired of tripping over her train. Down in the bottom of a queer, hair-covered trunk she found an overcoat with a fur collar, and promptly discarded the purple delaine.

"Now you must all be sick," she cried, turning up the tall collar, and completely extinguishing herself. "I'll be the doctor and come to see you."

"You look more like Santa Claus," laughed Sue Reynolds.

"All right, we'll play Christmas, and I'll be Santa Claus." Elizabeth was fumbling queerly in the skirt of her coat. "No," she cried, "I'll be a postman, and bring you a letter. Does Mrs. John Callender live here? Then here's a letter for you, ma'am."

It was not a joke either, for the letter dropped into Patty's lap the very next minute. It was addressed in a bold hand to Mrs. John Callender. Patty had to think twice to remember that this meant Aunt Frances.

The girls crowded around. "My! how yellow it is," said Grace Russell, wonderingly.

"That's because it's old. Aunt Frances has lots put away that are just as yellow as this," explained Patty importantly.

Why, it hasn't ever been opened!" another of the girls exclaimed.

It was a fact. The yellow envelope was still unbroken. Patty wondered why.

"Was it really in your pocket, Elizabeth?" she asked.

"No, it wasn't. When I put my hand into the pocket I made a mistake and put it into the hole in the lining, and then I kept feeling and feeling to see how far I could go, and I came to this letter. Let's see it."

Patty tossed it to Sue, and Sue tossed it in Elizabeth's direction. Elizabeth was sitting in the corner under the eaves. The yellow envelope fluttered past her, and dropped down an opening left by the failure of the floor of the garret to meet the wall. Patty looked aghast.

"Oh, dear!" she said, "it's gone down the Bottomless Hole."

That had always been Patty's name for this opening. In her younger days she had firmly believed that it went for an indefinite distance into the earth. Even now she had no thought but that the object which disappeared over its edge was lost forever. Her dismay showed in her face.

"Oh, well, what difference does it make?" said Elizabeth philosophically. "It's only an old yellow letter. Besides, she didn't take the trouble to open it when it was new."

This was so reassuring that Patty threw her fears to the winds. The fun went on without check or hindrance till Aunt Frances called them down to supper. The table looked very grand with the best china and silver. The girls spoke softly and seemed like different children from those who had made merry in the garret a few moments before, but they quietly cleaned their plates in a way that showed appreciation of Aunt Frances' cooking. And Patty was happier than she had ever expected to be. A dressing-up party and a birthday supper following were almost too much joy for one day.

It was not till after the girls had departed and Patty had gone up into the garret to redeem her promise of putting everything back into its place that a shadow crossed her bright spirits. There was one thing she could not put back—that yellow letter, which had dropped into the mysterious depths of the Bottomless Hole.

"But how is Aunt Frances going to find out?" said one voice in Patty's ear. "That was such an old, old letter. Maybe she has forgotten it was there."

"She is going to find out because you are going to tell her," said another voice. "You're not the girl to hide a thing like that, I should hope."

"I should hope so, too," said Patty, holding her head high. But when she stood before Aunt Frances, her face was so woe-begone that Aunt Frances stopped washing the blue china and looked her over.

"Aunt Frances, there's one thing that isn't in its place. I can't put it in its place because it fell down the Bottomless Hole."

"The bottomless hole? What do you mean by that?"

Patty blushed. She had never confided her little fancy to Aunt Frances. "The hole by the window where the boards don't quite reach," she explained.

"Oh, I remember. Well, what has fallen down?"

"It was a letter. A real old one, Aunt Frances," explained Patty appealingly. "It was as yellow as could be."

Aunt Frances' lips tightened. "So you let the girls meddle with my letters, Patty?"

"Oh, no, ma'am. Elizabeth found it in the pocket of an old overcoat with a fur collar."

"Your grandfather's overcoat. Strange I have never noticed it," said Aunt Frances, knitting her brows.

"Well, it wasn't exactly in the pocket. She was feeling under the lining when she found it. And anyway, I guess you didn't care much about it, for you'd never opened it."

"Do you mean it was addressed to me, Patty, and unopened? You must be mistaken, I think." Aunt Frances took a candle from the shelf, lighted it, and went up into the garret, Patty following close behind.

"That's the hole," she said, with outstretched forefinger. "It hasn't any bottom, has it?"

"Any bottom? What nonsense! It only goes down a few feet."

Aunt Frances gave the candle into Patty's hand and knelt down on the floor, turning back her sleeve.

"Oh, Aunt Frances!" exclaimed Patty, the fears of earlier years returning in full force, "don't put your arm down. There might be something dreadful at the bottom."

"What nonsense!" said Aunt Frances again. She pushed her arm down through the aperture and groped for some time. Presently she withdrew her arm. It was covered with dirt and cobwebs, but in her hand she held an envelope.

"Yes, that's the one," said Patty, much relieved.

But the next moment she dropped the candle. If it had been a lamp she would have dropped it just the same, for Aunt Frances had uttered a terrible cry. The candle flickered and went out.

"Aunt Frances! Oh, dear Aunt Frances, what is the matter?"

Aunt Frances was hurrying to the stairs, and Patty hurried after her. She did not know how she got down in the dark. The next thing she was sure of was she was in the sitting-room with only the tall clock for company. The door of Aunt Frances' room was locked, but Patty could hear muffled sobs for a long, long time. By and by the sobbing ceased.

"She's praying now," thought Patty, awe-struck. "It sounds as if she was glad of something."

It seemed a long time before the door opened. Patty was afraid to look at first. But when she lifted her eyes she gazed bewildered. Something was gone from Aunt Frances face which she had seen there ever since she could remember. Something new and shining had come.

"Patty, my poor little Patty!"

Aunt Frances dropped into a chair and held out her arms. Patty ran into them. She forgot the dignity of her twelve years, it was so pleasant to be cuddled close.

"I'm going to tell you a story, dear," said Aunt Frances at last. "It is a strange story to tell a child, but you are going to be a woman some day. You are twelve today. How time flies!

"Long before you were born, Patty, when your mother, my little sister, was only a baby girl, the war broke out. I had only been married a few months, and when my husband spoke of enlisting, I would not listen to him. I was only a girl, Patty, and I had not learned to rule my tongue. I loved him, but I said such harsh and unkind things, in my efforts to keep him from carrying out his purpose, that he thought I cared nothing for him. We parted in anger, Patty. He did not even say good-bye.

"As soon as he was gone I was sorry. I wrote him begging him to forgive me, and then how I watched for an answer! But all the answer that came was trouble upon trouble. First my dear father, your grandfather, Patty, was brought home unconscious. He had had a shock on the street. He lived many months after that, but never spoke again. And only the week following came the news of a great battle, and the name of John Callender was on the list of the killed.

"If I could have been sure that he had received my letter and knew that I was sorry, I could have borne it better, but a soldier's mail is very uncertain, and no answer had come. Never part with one you love in anger, Patty. It has made my food bitter and poisoned my sleep for more than forty years."

There was a little break and Patty waited awe-struck till Aunt Frances could steady her voice.

"Patty, that unopened letter was from my husband. He had received my letter and not only forgave me, but begged my forgiveness for having understood me so little. Father must have taken the letter from the post-office and started home when he was seized with a paralytic shock. He never spoke again and so never could tell us. The overcoat was hung away. Somehow or other the letter must have slipped in back of the lining and there it has hidden these long, long years."

Patty suddenly took her head from her aunt's shoulder and sat up straight.

"Oh, Aunt Frances," she faltered, "I came so near not telling you. I was afraid you wouldn't let me have any more dressing-up parties if you knew. And just think if I hadn't told you and you had never found out!"

"My brave, little truthful Patty!"

Then a new thought flashing into Patty's mind swept all else before it.

"Oh, Aunt Frances," she cried repturously, "how beautiful you look when you're smiling!"

Home is the chief school of human virtues. Its responsibilities, joys, sorrows, smiles, tears, hopes and cares form the chief interest of human life.—Channing.

Concerning Pilgrim History

We frequently receive letters asking for information concerning books on Pilgrim history, and it is evident that many are planning to devote several services to themes appropriate to the Tercentenary Celebration. In view of this general interest we print again a list already used in previous issues of our paper, adding some titles of most recent publications.

History of the Plymouth Plantation, by William Bradford, is the most important available source-book.

The Story of the Pilgrim Fathers, by Edward Arber, is a valuable collection of "original texts" with comments.

The Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers, edited by John Masefield, containing original documents by Morton, Cushman and Winslow, is a valuable volume in the Everyman's Library.

The Pilgrims and Their History, by Roland G. Usher. Dr. Williston Walker calls this "The best brief sketch of the whole Pilgrim Movement and indispensable."

The Story of the Pilgrims, by Morton Dexter, is called by Professor Channing (History of the U. S. Vol. 1): "The best account of the settlement of Plymouth yet printed" (1905). It is out of print but probably may be found in public libraries.

The England and Holland of the Pilgrims, by Henry M. Dexter and Morton Dexter. "The most elaborate and painstaking account yet published of the Pilgrims to their embarkation" (Walker).

The Pilgrim Republic, by John A. Goodwin. An admirable account of the American history of the colony.

Genesis of the New England Churches, by Leonard Bacon. A good account of the religious influences in Pilgrim history.

John Robinson, Pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers, by Walter H. Burgess. The latest and most complete account of Robinson, his life and times.

John Robinson, the Pilgrim Pastor, by Ozora S. Davis.

Forefathers' Day Sermons, by Charles E. Jefferson. A collection of fifteen addresses dealing with the spirit and ideals of the Pilgrims and Puritans.

Genius of the Pilgrims, by Rev. George A. Gordon. An eloquent and discriminating address.

In the Days of the Pilgrim Fathers, by Mary Caroline Crawford. The work of a specialist on the life and times of the Pilgrims, both in England and New England. Latest and most interesting book on the subject. Well illustrated.

The Women Who Came in the Mayflower, by Annie Russell Marble; the only book on the subject.

The Founding of a Nation, by Frank M. Gregg. Fiction, but based on Bradford's history and worth reading.

The sections devoted to the Pilgrims in such books as "The Beginnings of New England," by John Fiske; "Narrative and Critical History of America," by Justin Winsor; "History of the United States," by Edward Channing, The Pilgrims' Faith, by Ozora S. Davis, etc., should also be read.

For children and youth the best recent books are Young People's History of the Pilgrims, by William Elliot Griffis. The Story of the Pilgrims for Children, by Roland G. Usher. The Story of the Pilgrim Fathers Retold for Children, by H. G. Tunnicliff.

Hero Tales, by Mrs. Grace T. Davis. A large part of this attractive book is devoted to stories from Pilgrim history, told for young people.

How They Do It

Method in Church Work

Commemorating Coming of Pilgrims

Dr. W. E. Barton, pastor of OAK PARK, ILL., announces a series of Sunday morning sermons under the general title of Great Affirmations. The topics of the sermons are: "I Believe in Man;" "I Believe in God;" "I Believe in Jesus Christ;" "I Believe in the Bible;" "I Believe in the Life Everlasting."

Dr. Barton also announces a series of Wednesday evening lectures the topic of which will be Prophets of the Puritan Spirit. It is a sequel to the course delivered by him last spring and is designed to commemorate in worthy fashion the 300th anniversary of the establishment of the Pilgrim faith in America.

The following is a tentative outline of this course:

(1) JONATHAN EDWARDS: profoundest of American philosophers, first of her theologians, pre-eminent as a thinker and the founder of a system of thought. An analysis of his teaching and a study of human interest.

(2) JOHN MURRAY and HOSEA BALLOU: The rise of Universalism especially in its outgrowth and reaction from the Great Awakening.

(3) WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING: The rise of Unitarianism.

(4) LYMAN BEECHER and his son HENRY WARD BEECHER: The infusion of liberalism and humanitarianism into the rigorous old system of the Puritans.

(5) HORACE BUSHNELL: Preacher, theologian, statesman. Eminent advocate of a righteousness which is profitable for this life and of a theology which sets forth a righteous and human God.

(6) RALPH WALDO EMERSON: Philosopher and Poet. Prophet of the value of the individual man and herald of the immanence of God.

(7) FATHER TAYLOR: Declared by Emerson to have been one of America's two great poets, the other being Daniel Webster. Founder of the Seamen's Bethel in Boston. Original, eccentric, eloquent, beginning life as a privateer and ending as one of the most loved and distinguished citizens of his city and state. His oddities, his eloquence, his contribution to philanthropy and the expression of the Puritan spirit.

(8) JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER: The Quaker warrior and poet of freedom.

(9) PHILLIPS BROOKS: Who though an Episcopalian in his ecclesiastical relationship, was educated in a Puritan Theological Seminary, and in many respects expounded in his message the essential testimony of the Puritan tradition.

(10) DWIGHT L. MOODY: The prophet evangelist. Succession of evangelists from Edwards through Finney to Moody. Evangelism in its relation to organized religious work. The permanent influence of Moody.

(11) WASHINGTON GLADDEN: Interpreter of liberal orthodoxy. Servant of God and lover of humanity.

(12) LIVING PROPHETS OF THE PURITAN SPIRIT: Who are the men whose voices now interpret the age in which we live in terms of eternal verity? Through what groups of men is God speaking the message of guidance in theology, in social progress, in hopeful, constructive, co-operative effort? Are we in danger of stoning the prophets while building the sepulchres of those whom our fathers stoned? How shall we know the true from the false prophets?

Pilgrim Sermon Topics

In response to our request of Oct. 7, these lists of topics has come in:

THE TRAIL OF THE PILGRIMS

(Rev. Robert Hopkin, First Church, Denver, Col.)

Foregleams of the Pilgrim Spirit.
The Rise of the Puritan.
The Guiding Principles of Puritanism.
Roundhead and Cavalier.
The Beginnings of Modern Congregationalism.
The Pilgrim and the Schoolmaster.
What the Mayflower Brought to America.
How Best to Celebrate the Pilgrims Achievements.

It was as a Congregational Church that the Pilgrims sailed the sea in the Mayflower. It was as a Congregational Church that they landed at Plymouth. All else associated with the migration of this brave band of men and women was incidental. It is therefore meet that we as Congregationalists should celebrate this most significant event in our history, not by boasting of what the fathers of our Church have done, but by remembering their matchless achievements, and consecrating our lives to the furthering of those great ends for which they lived, and suffered, and died.

Culled from Calendars

Would the Christ who preached the "open door" of human brotherhood have practiced the "closed shop" in the carpenter business at Nazareth?—First, Santa Barbara, Cal.

To Teachers: You, who have been called as teachers in this school of the church, deeply sensible of your opportunity and obligation, trusting in the Great Teacher for wisdom and strength, promise to devote yourselves faithfully to the leadership of these classes. You will "study to show yourselves approved unto God, workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the work of Truth."

To Members of the School: You who are enrolled in this Church school, declaring it to be your earnest desire to grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord, recognizing the unselfish service of these consecrated teachers, pledge to them your best endeavors and faithful attendance in this new year's work.

To Parents: You, fathers and mothers, who are instructed to bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, promise your co-operation in securing regular attendance and home study of the lessons, and in fostering a love of the Bible and the church, and you will endeavor to make your homes places in which the truths of the Gospel find daily expression.—First, Marietta, O.

GREAT MEN AND GREAT EVENTS IN THE STRUGGLE FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

Discussion Class and "Movies"

SAN JOSE, CAL., inaugurated on Oct. 3, a community discussion class on reconstruction by which it is hoped to render a distinct service to the community. The class includes people of the community without regard to their membership in the Congregational or any other church and is a serious attempt to assist them in thinking through the pressing problems of the present day. The class is under the charge of Mr. C. S. Allen, president of the San Jose Board of Education and one of the foremost men in the city in all lines of community betterment.

The church is also using moving pictures in its evening service with great effectiveness and has been trying this method long enough to feel that it has proved its value. The Sunday evening program takes the form of a genuine religious service for the first half hour, followed by a brief sermon, book review, or address on some live topic by the pastor, Rev. E. A. King, and this in turn is followed by a fine educational or scenic film. The congregations are usually large and include many who are not in the habit of church-going and who would not be reached in any other way.

On Wednesday evenings also a large group is gathered at the church for a series of what are called "New Life Studies," conducted by Mr. King on the basis of Dr. J. M. Campbell's book, "New Thought Christianized." This also reaches many people who are entirely outside the ordinary life of the church. D. J. S.

A Renewing of Life at Belfast

The venerable First Church of BELFAST, which next year celebrates the 125th anniversary of its organization, is taking on new life and hope under the leadership of Rev. A. C. Elliot, who began his pastorate the first of the year. Repairs and improvements have been made in and around the church building, and abandoned church activities have been revived. The Sunday evening and the Thursday evening gatherings have been made so attractive that the local paper has editorially noticed and commended them. Mr. Elliot, whose family consists of Mrs. Elliot, who is a veritable helpmeet to him, and two sons, came to this country from England six years ago, seeking improved climatic conditions for one of the boys. Mr. Elliot is a graduate of the Wesleyan schools in England, and for 14 years was pastor of United Methodist churches in leading cities, his last church being in Sheffield. It was a church of 650 members with organization such as is seldom equaled in this country. After successfully serving important Methodist churches in Maine for five years, Mr. Elliot turned to the Congregational body because its polity more nearly corresponds to that to which he had been accustomed in England.

Mr. Elliot was installed pastor of the Belfast church Sept. 22. The written statements he presented revealed the superior mental equipment and spiritual qualities of the man, and with the answers he gave to their questions served to endear him to the members of the council. Pres. D. N. Beach, of Bangor Seminary, served as moderator and preached the sermon. Other parts were taken by Rev. Messrs. John Cummings, Albert Donnell, T. H. Martin and W. H. Palmer. A. D.

Changes in Portland Pulpits

A number of changes have come recently in the church life of Portland. STATE ST., after the long interim since Rev. A. D. Leavitt went to Brookline, Mass., has found his worthy successor in Dr. H. S. Bradley who comes this fall from Piedmont, Worcester, Mass. Rev. W. S. Randall has left NORTH DEERING COMMUNITY, and is engaged in work for the Near East Relief. Rev. R. A. Dunlap has left SECOND PARISH to become a teacher of Biblical Literature and History in Dartmouth College, and assistant chaplain of the college. Rev. W. J. Campbell has left WILLISTON, and is working for the Near East Relief. R. A. D.

MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. Howard Installed Over North, Cambridge

A large and representative council at NORTH, CAMBRIDGE, Oct. 6, heard with satisfaction Rev. L. R. Howard's statement of faith and gladly proceeded to his installation. Neighboring clergymen representing other denominations, including the First Unitarian Church, were invited to sit as honorary members of the council in the public session without vote, and the list of individuals invited included the former pastors, Pres. C. F. Thwing, Prof. Daniel Evans and other well-known leaders. Mr. Howard's paper was in the nature of a frank setting forth of his own Christian experience and the council was so pleased with it that it suggested it be read on the following Sunday to the congregation.

Mr. Alvord Gives Up Attleboro Pastorate

On Sept. 15, Rev. J. C. Alvord closed a pastorate of three years with BETHANY, SOUTH ATTLEBORO. The meeting of the large and flourishing Men's Club on Sept. 14 took the form of a farewell reception to Mr. and Mrs. Alvord. The pastor and his wife were presented with a purse of $260 and $230 had been received by them in gifts at different times during the past year. On Mr. Alvord's announcing his call to a professorship the leading people of the church got together and arranged to offer him the same large salary he is to receive in Virginia if he would remain at Bethany.

Mr. Alvord has gone to accept the head professorship of English at Emory and Henry College, Emory, Va. Emory is situated in the Cumberland Mountains, not far from Asheville, N. C., in a climate which is highly recommended for Mrs. Alvord's health. Mr. and Mrs. Alvord expect to spend their summers at Winthrop, Mass. Mr. Alvord will continue to supply Congregational pulpits occasionally.

Bethany has increased 50 per cent. in membership and has more than doubled in attendance during this pastorate. The Sunday school has been graded and is in excellent working condition, as are all the organizations of the church. Missionary interest has greatly increased.

A Food Expert

Met a great surprise

This is the story of Puffed Wheat

Prof. A. P. Anderson, formerly of Columbia University, planned to make whole wheat wholly digestible.

So he sealed the whole grains in a small model gun, applied a fearful heat for an hour. Then he shot the gun, exploded the kernels, and out came a surprise.

Each grain was puffed to eight times normal size. Each was a bubble, flimsy and flaky, with a taste like toasted nuts. He found his scientific grains the finest wheat food in existence.

Now the daily joy of millions

He made Puffed Rice from whole rice and Puffed Corn from broken corn. Now millions enjoy these three Puffed Grains, served in a dozen ways.

These are the supreme foods. Cereals were never made so delightful, never so fitted to digest.

You who serve but one, or at breakfast only, lose many a delight. Each has its own fascinations, and each is an all-day food.

The night dish is Puffed Wheat in milk. Toasted whole wheat puffed to bubbles, made easy to digest.

The food confection is Corn Puffs. Serve with cream and sugar, mixed with fruit or doused with melted butter.

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice Puffed Corn

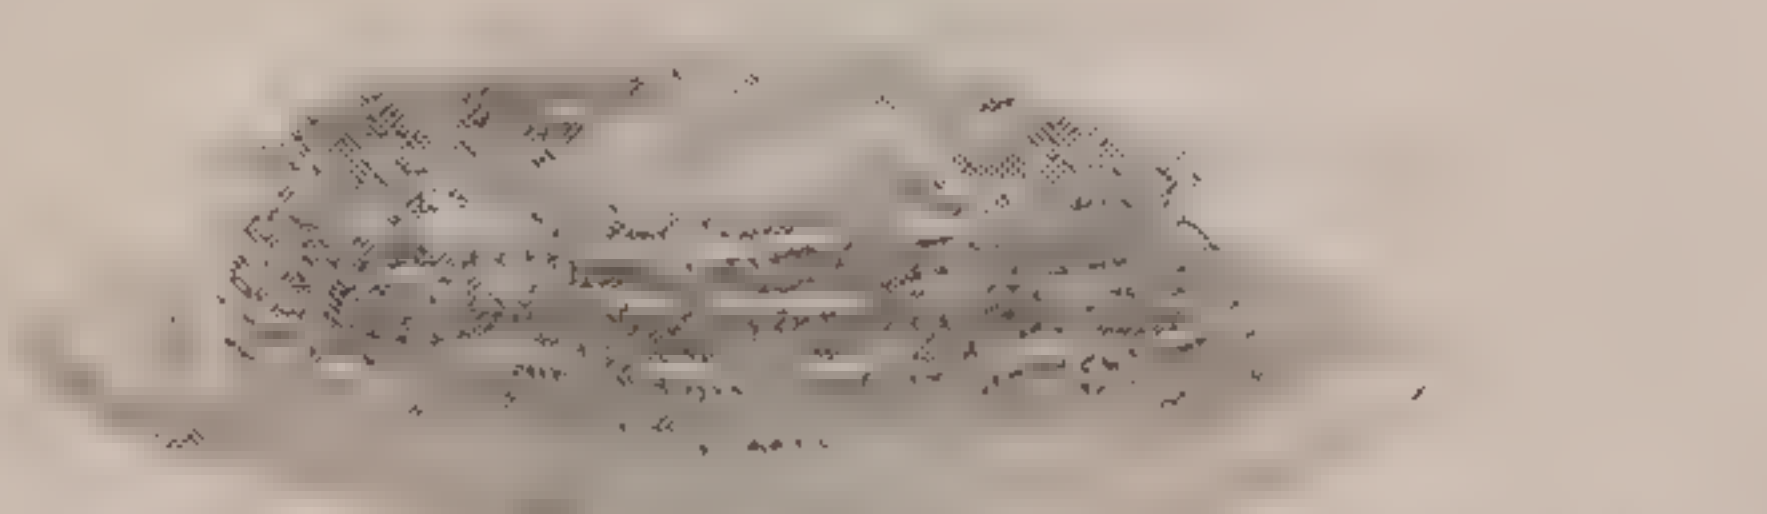
Puffed to 8 times normal size

Also Puffed Rice Pancake Flour

New Pancakes for Tomorrow



Your grocer now has Puffed Rice Pancake Flour. It is ground Puffed Rice mixed in an ideal blend. The Puffed Rice flour makes the pancakes fluffy and gives them a nutty flavor. Serve them tomorrow. They are the finest pancakes you have ever tasted. Simply add milk or water.

What is an Internal Bath?

By R. W. BEAL

MUCH has been said and volumes have been written describing at length the many kinds of baths civilized man has indulged in from time to time. Every possible resource of the human mind has been brought into play to fashion new methods of bathing, but, strange as it may seem, the most important as well as the most beneficial of all baths, the "Internal Bath," has been given little thought. The reason for this is probably due to the fact that few people seem to realize the tremendous part that internal bathing plays in the acquiring and maintaining of health.

If you were to ask a dozen people to define an internal bath you would have as many different definitions, and the probability is that not one of them would be correct. To avoid any misconception as to what constitutes an internal bath, let it be said that a hot water enema is no more an internal bath than a bill of fare is a dinner.

If it were possible and agreeable to take the great mass of thinking people to witness an average post-mortem the sights they would see and the things they would learn would prove of such lasting benefit and impress them so profoundly that further argument in favor of internal bathing would be unnecessary to convince them. Unfortunately, however, it is not possible to do this, profitable as such an experience would doubtless prove to be. There is, then, only one other way to get this information into their hands, and that is, by acquainting them with such knowledge as will enable them to appreciate the value of this long-sought-for health-producing necessity.

Few people realize what a very little thing is necessary sometimes to improve their physical condition. Also they have almost no conception of how a little carelessness, indifference or neglect can be the fundamental cause of the most virulent disease. For instance, that universal disorder from which almost all humanity is suffering, known as "constipation," "auto-intoxication," "auto-infection," and a multitude of other terms, is not only curable but preventable through the consistent practice of internal bathing.

How many people realize that normal functioning of the bowels and a clean intestinal tract make it impossible to become sick? "Man of today is only fifty per cent. efficient." Reduced to simple English, this means that most men are trying to do a man's portion of work on half a man's power. This applies equally to women.

That it is impossible to continue to do this indefinitely must be apparent to all. Nature never intended the delicate human organism to be operated on a hundred per cent. overload. A machine could not stand this and not break down, and the body certainly cannot do more than a machine. There is entirely too much unnecessary and avoidable sickness in the world.

How many people can you name, including yourself, who are physically vigorous, healthy and strong? The number is appallingly small.

It is not a complex matter to keep in condition, but it takes a little time, and in these strenuous days people have time to do everything else necessary for the attainment of happiness, but the most essential thing of all, that of giving their bodies their proper care.

Would you believe that five to ten minutes of time devoted to systematic internal bathing can make you healthy and maintain your physical efficiency indefinitely? Granting that such a simple procedure as this will do what is claimed for it, is it not worth while to learn more about that which will accomplish this end? Internal bathing will do this, and it will do it for people of all ages and in all conditions of health and disease.

People don't seem to realize, strange to say, how important it is to keep the body free from accumulated body-waste poisons. Their doing so would prevent the absorption into the blood of the poisonous excretions of the body, and health would be the inevitable result.

If you would keep your blood pure, your heart normal, your eyes clear, your complexion clean, your mind keen, your blood pressure normal, your nerves relaxed, and be able to enjoy the vigor of youth in your declining years, practice internal bathing and begin today.

Now, that your attention has been called to the importance of internal bathing, it may be that a number of questions will suggest themselves to your mind. You will probably want to know WHAT an internal bath is, WHY people should take them, and the WAY to take them. These and countless other questions are all answered in a booklet entitled "THE WHAT, THE WHY and THE WAY OF INTERNAL BATHING," written by Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, the inventor of the "J. B. L. Cascade," whose lifelong study and research along this line make him the pre-eminent authority on this subject. Not only has internal bathing saved and prolonged Dr. Tyrrell's own life, but the lives of a multitude of hopeless individuals have been equally spared and prolonged. No book has ever been written containing such a vast amount of practical information to the business man, the worker, and the housewife; all that is necessary to secure this book is to write to Tyrrell's Hygienic Institute at No. 134 West Sixty-fifth Street, New York City, and mention having read this article in The Congregationalist, and same will be immediately mailed to you free of all cost or obligation.

Perhaps you realize now, more than ever, the truth of these statements, and if the reading of this article will result in a proper appreciation on your part of the value of internal bathing, it will have served its purpose. What you will want to do now is to avail yourself of the opportunity for learning more about the subject, and your writing for this book will give you that information. Do not put off doing this, but send for the book now, while the matter is fresh in your mind.

"Procrastination is the thief of time." A thief is one who steals something. Don't allow procrastination to cheat you out of your opportunity to get this valuable information, which is free for the asking. If you would be natural, be healthy. It is unnatural to be sick. Why be unnatural, when it is such a simple thing to be well? (Adv.)

Mr. Reid Now Pastor at Peabody

SOUTH, PEABODY, welcomed its new pastor, Rev. John Reid, Sept. 1. Mr. Reid is a man of full experience, who brings to his new work an intelligence, an enthusiasm and a balance that promise a pastorate of large effectiveness.

Born in Glasgow, Scotland, Mr. Reid is a graduate of Amherst College and Andover Seminary. The first six years of his ministry were spent in New Hampshire with our church at Greenville and with South Main St., Manchester. In one case, in a quiet, rural community and in the other, a throbbing industrial city, he alike met the situation with success. His last and longest pastorate was in the academy town of Franklin, Mass., where he served 14 years. A good organizer, an indefatigable worker, an earnest and sympathetic preacher and an especially strong community man—his pastorate made a lasting impression on the town. During 1918 and 1919 he was in charge of the Red Cross work at the hospital for shell-shock and gas victims among the soldiers at East Norfolk, Mass. Mrs. Reid is an invaluable aid to Mr. Reid's work, as might be expected from a daughter of the late Professor Richardson of Amherst.

Speaks about Soviet Russia

Dr. Doremus Scudder, Secretary of the Boston Federation of Churches, addressed the Boston Ministers' Meeting, Oct. 11, on Soviet Russia. Dr. Scudder disclaimed any belief in socialism, and said that as an American he had no desire to see the Soviet experiment tried in America. He held no brief for Bolshevism but only reported what he saw while in Siberia and related the facts as he experienced them. He was Major in the American Red Cross service, having charge of the civilian relief over a large portion of Siberia during the war. In this position he came into personal and individual contact with great numbers of all kinds of Russians from all parts of Russia. As soon as they became convinced of his integrity, they talked with him freely.

He was greatly impressed with the Soviet hostility to alcohol, with their care for the children, and with their friendliness for universal education. One cannot be much afraid of a government that desires every citizen to learn to read and think for himself.

It was inevitable that the centuries of oppression should be followed by socialism. The only wonder is that the revolution was so orderly. The first act of the Soviet government was to abolish the death penalty. This was afterward restored. Many were the victims of mobs or of irresponsible local officials and of these latter many have been brought to trial for their acts. The family has been untouched by Sovietism. The church is stronger in Russia today and better attended than before the revolution. High German officials say that it was the Russian peace that defeated the Teutonic war spirit and that Germany was really defeated from the east and not from the west.

The demand of brotherhood is to let Russia alone to work out her internal problems. This paper of Dr. Scudder's aroused a brisk discussion. There are so many conflicting reports of Russian conditions. Dr. Scudder said that it was practically impossible for correspondents to send out accurate reports and have them published in the papers of the Allied nations.

NEW YORK

Harvest Home Day at Watertown

EMMANUEL, WATERTOWN, observed Harvest Home Day on Sunday, Oct. 10. The church was beautifully decorated with the fruits of the field instead of with flowers. The Sunday school also used this day as its rally day. A successful effort was made to get the church people back home and in their places for the work of fall and winter. Rev. H. L. Pyle is pastor.

Community Church at Calcium

A Community church is in the process of being formed at CALCIUM, a short distance from Watertown. The church is about to call a minister and has already drawn up a constitution that will add another church to our Congregational family. Rev. H. L. Pyle, pastor of Watertown, and Rev. G. A. Brock, assistant superintendent of the State Conference, have been helping this infant church to find the ways of Congregationalism. It is located in a fine farming community where for years no work has been done; but where a Union church building was already erected and years ago was used for religious purposes. The Community Church idea is meeting the needs of many communities. The Grange has subscribed toward the support of this church.

Black River and St. Lawrence Association

The fall meeting of the Churches of Northern New York was held on the fifth and sixth of October with WINTHROP, Rev. J. A. H. Plowright, pastor. The origin of this Association goes back to 1808. That it still has the spirit of youth is indicated by the fact that it adopted the Budget System for its finances. When the members of the Association saw just what the money was needed for it voted unanimously to add five cents per capita tax to its members, making the total tax 14 cents per member. The Association feels that it is the first Association to adopt the Budget System.

Lisbon Church Goes Calling

The White Church of LISBON, out in the country about nine miles from Ogdensburg, accepted the invitation of Ogdensburg, which is without a pastor, to worship with them on Sept. 19. The people of Lisbon, after assembling at their own place of meeting, went in automobiles to the Ogdensburg church. Twenty-six autos were in the procession and 116 people were in the machines. Their pastor, Rev. George Taft, preached the sermon. The procession of the autos helped to advertise the Lisbon church all along the way.

The Brooklyn Brotherhood

The first fall meeting of the Brooklyn Brotherhood on Oct. 4 was largely given over to a memorial of Dr. Herring, the following minute being adopted and forwarded to Mrs. Herring:

> The Brooklyn Congregational Brotherhood cannot permit its sense of great personal and denominational loss in the death of Dr. H. C. Herring to lessen its profound and lasting consciousness of the many and rich blessings which have come to us through his life.
> As a leader in the shaping and giving character to the new Congregationalism, he has done a work which will abide and to the forwarding and completion of which work we may all well dedicate ourselves.
> As a man, great and humble, brave and patient, loyal and genuine, he has builded himself into our love and our memory.
> We record our profound gratitude that such a man was given us as a leader and comrade; we covenant one with another to treasure his memory and to carry forward the work he loved and to which he gave the richly fruitful years of his life; we express our sincerest sympathy to his family, and in this minute make permanent record of the abiding honor we render the memory of a true servant of his fellow men, the Church, and the Divine Master.

Rev. E. M. Halliday was elected president of the Brotherhood for the year 1920—1921, and a special committee, of which Rev. Richard Roberts was chairman, was named to make arrangements for a concerted celebration of the Tercentenary year among the churches of Brooklyn and Queens.

MINNESOTA

Mr. Elderkin Goes to Pilgrim, Duluth

Rev. N. S. Elderkin, who has just accepted the call of PILGRIM, DULUTH, is a graduate of Amherst and Yale. His first pastorate was with First, Ogden, Utah. After serving this church for five fruitful years he was called to Plymouth, Lawrence, Kan. Outstanding features of his seven years in Lawrence were his Plymouth center on Sunday nights and his ministry to the student body at the State University. From Lawrence he went to Pilgrim, Oak Park, Ill., in 1917.

Dr. Elderkin resigned his pastorate at Oak Park because of disagreement between the church and himself regarding the policy to be pursued during the World War. Since then he has been Secretary of the League of Reconciliation, and has given service in various other organizations looking toward International Brotherhood. He made a trip to Europe soon after the Armistice, in the interest of these causes. He has also been supplying Park Ridge, Ill., one of the Chicago suburban organizations.

A Righteous Ruler

The Christ of Prophecy

"Give the King thy judgments, O God,
And thy righteousness unto the King's son.
HE will judge thy people with righteousness,
And thy poor with justice.
The mountains shall bring peace to the people,
And the hills, in righteousness.
HE will judge the poor of the people,
HE will save the children of the needy,
And will break in pieces the oppressor.
HE will come down like rain upon the mown grass,
As showers that water the earth. . . .
And men shall be blessed in him;
All nations shall call him blessed."
—Ps. 72.

THE CHRIST OF CALVARY HOLDS IN HIS PIERCED HAND THE SOLUTION OF EVERY PERPLEXING PROBLEM IN OUR NATIONAL LIFE.
LET US GIVE CHRIST, THE WONDERFUL COUNSELOR, THE CHIEF PLACE IN OUR NATIONAL LIFE AND CLAIM THIS BLESSEDNESS.

Pilgrim, Duluth, offers a most attractive field of labor. Under the leadership of the last pastor, Rev. Charles Thorp, a new building was erected and the organization was brought to a high state of efficiency. Dr. Elderkin, with his remarkable genius, has attached to himself a large number of leading ministers and laymen, all of whom will join in wishing him and the church a great future together.

MISSOURI

State Conference at Kansas City

The Missouri Conference met in session Sept. 27–29 with the Westminster Church, Kansas City. The attendance was the largest in many years with 86 per cent. of the active ministers present and 95 per cent. of the churches represented. The program was founded upon the theme, "Christian Leadership," and each session opened with a fifteen-minute devotional service emphasizing that thought. The addresses also all found their keynote in the same theme.

The opening sermon, on the subject, "The True Test of Christianity," was a fine exposition of John 9:25 and was delivered by Rev. F. E. Maddox of Texarkana, Ark. Both Mr. Maddox and the church were heartily received into conference fellowship. All the officers and committees reported splendid work done during the year. Drury College, Kidder Institute and Iberia Academy were reported as moving forward with steady and quickened gait—Drury rejoicing in her pledged endowment, Kidder in the settlement of a pastor and student helper, and Iberia in the progress of her new Academy building. Exceedingly interesting pictures of a number of missionary fields were presented by as many pastors and showed much healthy activity. The W. H. M. U. and W. B. M. I. hours brought exceedingly bright and instructive features into the meetings. The Every Member Drive, the Congregational World Movement, the Pilgrim Fund, Sunday school work, religious education, temperance and evangelism were all fully and encouragingly reported. Dr. Malcolm Dana's visit was much appreciated, as were his interesting addresses on Congregational Churches as Community Centers and The Community Program of Jesus. Dr. R. W. Gammon brought strong appeals on religious education, the call to Christian leadership, and the need of befriending young people in the critically formative periods of life. An unusual feature of the Conference was the ordination of Prin. G. W. Shaw of Kidder Institute and Prin. G. Byron Smith of Iberia Academy to the Christian ministry. Both men have been long successful as leaders of Missouri educational work, in which they will still continue. The women's missionary banquet on Tuesday evening and the laymen's banquet Wednesday evening were spicy events. Under the leadership of the pastor, Dr. M. H. Turk, Westminster Church entertained the delegates with delightful hospitality. The meeting next year will be held in St. Louis under the moderatorship of Mr. Alfred Schauffler, Kansas City.

CALIFORNIA

Missionary Sunday at First, Oakland

It was a great day. It was Philippine Sunday in First, Oakland. The occasion was the commissioning of Dr. and Mrs. Roy E. St. Clair for service in Mindanao, their formal adoption as missionaries of this church and their reception into membership.

Dr. F. J. Van Horn, the pastor, preached a real missionary sermon, full of inspiration, information and personal appeal. Its conclusion was the introduction of Sec. H. H. Kelsey, who conducted a simple and impressive service in which Dr. and Mrs. St. Clair publicly dedicated themselves to the work of foreign missions under the American Board. Happily, the father of Mrs. St. Clair, Rev. A. B. Case, for more than 20 years a missionary of the Board of Mexico, was present and welcomed these new recruits into the larger missionary family. The emotions of the large congregation, already deeply moved, were kindled to a still higher pitch when they all stood and with these new missionaries read together the church covenant, thus confirming their adoption of Dr. and Mrs. St. Clair as their own missionaries and welcoming them as fellow members of their own church.

In the evening a great congregation listened with interest to an illustrated lecture on the Philippines in which Dr. Kelsey set forth to eye and ear the rare opportunity and compelling responsibility we Congregationalists now face in the Island of Mindanao. This address was followed by brief talks by Dr. and Mrs. St. Clair.

Dr. and Mrs. St. Clair spent a week enjoying the hospitality of the church, including a reception on Wednesday evening. At this gathering were present Rev. C. E. Ewing, returning to missionary service in China after several years at home, and Mr. and Mrs. Albert Hausske, going out under the American Board to be business agent of the Judson-Smith and Esther Barton Memorial Hospitals. All were to be fellow passengers on the Tenyo Maru, together with a hundred delegates to the World Sunday School Convention in Tokyo. A Philippine movie film was given at the reception and five Filipino young men, students in Oakland, gave musical numbers on native instruments.

New Leader for Colegrove

After a few weeks in Southern California, Rev. Maxwell Southby has received a unanimous call to the pastorate of UNION, COLEGROVE, LOS ANGELES, recently left vacant by the resignation of Rev. E. S. Smith.

Mr. Southby is a native of Poland and received his early education there and in England. Entering the Baptist ministry he served under that denomination in England and in Glasgow, Scotland. A few years ago he came to America and was acting pastor of a Baptist Church in Hartford, Ct., later entering "Y" work during the war and recently serving First, Carthage, N. Y. He is thoroughly in sympathy with Congregational ideals and has the reputation of being an unusually forceful speaker. He has traveled as a Chautauqua lecturer, speaking on "The Funny Side of Foreign Travel," and other subjects relating to distant lands.

Mr. Oakes Accepts Challenging Field

MARICOPA has just called to its pastorate Rev. I. L. Oakes. The evangelistic zeal and hearty sociability of the new pastor promise an increased membership in this oil fields church. Mr. Oakes did notable work at Wasco a few years ago, where he built a struggling organization into an effective place in the community. The interest of another denomination in Maricopa and the consequent discouragement of our people have produced a situation needing just such energy as Mr. Oakes possesses. Following his pastorate in Wasco, Mr. Oakes served Bloomington for a period and is well known in Southern California. He has not been in the provided the pastor with a Ford touring car.

Progress at Sierra Madre

SIERRA MADRE reports good news of progress during the pastorate of Rev. W. J. Thompson, who undertook the leadership of that community church last December. Within this brief period, 26 have been received into membership.

The men's club, organized shortly after the first of the year, has a membership of 100 and has secured notable speakers during the past season. A young people's society of Christian Endeavor has made real progress in a church which for many years had had no organized young people's work. In appreciation of Mr. Thompson's effective service the church recently provided the pastor with a Ford touring car.

church work, with special reference to Sunday school superintendents and teachers, lay assistants, church secretaries or missionaries and Association workers. The purpose of the department is to train for Christian leadership, and both theoretical courses and training in methods of church work, organization and administration will be given. The university training will be combined with practical work under the supervision of instructors. These courses, combining theoretical and practical work, are proving successful in training church and Sunday school workers. The co-operation of a large university with church federations and a county Sunday School Association offers a useful suggestion for similar helpful training in other parts of the country.

Generous Gift to Hartford

The death of Mr. Samuel P. Avery of Hartford, the art collector, makes it possible to announce the gift which he made more than a year ago to the Hartford Seminary Foundation. The gift was made on the condition that knowledge of the giver should be confined to those officially concerned. Mr. Avery at that time handed over to the Board of Trustees of the Foundation securities valued at more than $150,000 to be applied to the erection of the new buildings which the three schools of the Foundation greatly need, efforts to secure which have been halted by the conditions of recent years. It was characteristic of Mr. Avery to make his contribution in this fashion. It was his special joy to discover the value of institutions, both educational and philanthropic, investigating them thoroughly as to their purpose and the possibility of the fulfillment of their aims.

The Ford Hall Season

The Ford Hall Meetings in Boston opened their fourteenth season Sunday evening, Oct. 17, with a discussion by representatives of the Democratic, the Republican, the Socialist and the Farmer-Labor parties. Another notable forum season thus begins. Sunday evening, Oct. 24, Dr. Samuel Schulman, Rabbi of the Temple Beth-El, New York City, a great favorite at Ford Hall, will speak on "The Eternal Values of Life." Oct. 31, Prof. Harry F. Ward of Union Theological Seminary will discuss "Civil Liberty in the United States." Nov. 7, Dr. Toyokichi Iyenaga, formerly Secretary of Foreign Affairs in Japan, will speak on "Is There a Yellow Peril?"

Philip Cabot of Boston and Whiting Williams of Cleveland, O., will fill the evening, Nov. 14, Mr. Cabot on "The Spirit of the Employer" and Whiting Williams on "The Mind of the Worker."

Nov. 21, Norman Hapgood will discuss "The Next Administration." Raymond Robins is scheduled for Nov. 28 with a talk on "The Pilgrim Spirit in a Day of Social Unrest;" Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Chairman of the Interchurch Committee to investigate the steel strike, will speak Dec. 5 on "Church and Labor;" Dr. W. E. Burghardt DuBois, editor of the Crisis, will discuss "The Future of the Darker Races" on Dec. 12; John Haynes Holmes on "What Shall We Think about the Bolsheviks?" Dec. 19; and Charles Zueblin on "Has America Any Ideals?" Dec. 26.

In the New Year, speakers already booked will include Prof. Scott Nearing, Herbert Adams Gibbons, the historian; Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor; Edwin Markham, whose topic will be "How to Think of the Spiritual World;" Beatrice Forbes Robertson Hale on "The Women of the Future;" Gutzon Borglum, the famous sculptor; Walter W. Liggett, Deputy Commissioner of Education in the state of North Dakota, who will speak on "The Nonpartisan League in Action;" George O'Dell, leader of the Ethical Culture Society, Grand Rapids, whose topic will be "Marriage and the Home," Prof. David D. Vaughan of Boston University, Prof. Arthur D. Rees of the University of Pennsylvania, whose topic will be "What Is the Matter with Our Monetary System?" Prof. Nathaniel I. Schmidt of Cornell, and Prof. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow Dana. The course will close April 3, with Edward Howard Griggs on "The Future of Democracy."

Mrs. Richard Hamlin Jones, the well-known Boston musician, will be in charge of the concerts preceding the lectures this season.

There is no admission fee, but silver collections at the door will be taken again to help cover expenses. The Boston Baptist Social Union, which for years financed this important educational movement primarily for the unchurched of Boston, no longer has funds for the purpose, but generously contributes the use of its beautiful hall as it has done ever since the meetings began. Mr. George W. Coleman, the forum pioneer leader, continues to act as chairman.

OUR READERS' FORUM

A Grateful Australian

Dear Mr. Editor:

I leave the North American continent by the "Niagara" this evening, and before I voyage southward to a land of sunshine where the wattle blooms, I should like to thank you and American Congregationalists for their courtesy and goodness to me and the Australian delegation. From the time Dr. Kelsey met us at San Francisco on through our greeting from Dr. McCollum at Chicago and Dr. Barton at Oak Park, and from Dr. Herring and Mr. Baker at New York, through the memorable days of the International Council, we Australians have had every reason for gratitude and appreciation.

Hospitality these days is expensive and oftentimes difficult to secure, but in Boston we enjoyed the excursions, dinners and special sessions which enabled personal friendships to ripen as the enduring fruit of a visit to New England, charming with its gorgeous green, winding streams, tiny islands and happy homes along a lovely coast. Since then at Danvers, Fall River, Bridgeport, Montclair, Wallingford, New Haven and Syracuse I have received so many kindnesses from American Congregationalists that I sincerely hope the next International Council will be held in Australia, so that the bread cast on the Atlantic waters may return after many days along the Pacific coasts of the Land of the Southern Cross.

With much admiration for the organization and efficiency of the American Church, many thanks, and all good wishes from an Australian delegate, I am,

Yours sincerely,

BERNARD COCKETT.

Domination by Oligarchy

Dear Mr. Editor:

In your article on "The Church Vote," in the issue of Sept. 23, why not include, along with "domination by an autocracy," that other menace, "domination by an oligarchy"? I note that you now substitute the word "association" for "League of Nations." Thus does Senator Harding's Delphic quality spread! Blessed are the ambiguous.

MARSHALL DAWSON.

As One Minister Sees the Issue

Dear Mr. Editor:

The Congregational and other ministers who have received the selected literature sent out by Mr. Will H. Hayes, the Chairman of the National Republican Committee, will be interested in the reply sent him by the writer.

Abbreviated a bit, here is the substance of the suggestions I have sent him in response to his statement: "I shall be delighted to have your suggestions at all times."

Let the Republican party endeavor to regain its former place of moral leadership. In the early days of the party it was conspicuously the party of moral convictions. Today it is far different. No one can say that the party makes its moral convictions so conspicuous that they can be seen by the man in the street. Neither in the party platform nor in Mr. Harding's speech do we find the quality which made the party a power a generation ago. And most certainly we do not find that quality in the record of the leading senators who now dominate the party.

As a starter why not have the party leaders repudiate the methods by which Senator Newberry of Michigan secured the nomination and election to the Senate? He has been found guilty, yet no word of disavowal has come from party headquarters.

My second suggestion is that Republican leaders set their faces like a flint against character assassination. It is significant that Cleveland, Roosevelt and Wilson, the three men who have menaced Republican supremacy, have all suffered from this form of gas attack. Two of these men are now dead and are praised by the very people who once vilified them, so presumably it will be the same in the third instance.

My third suggestion is that the Republican leaders should really lead. By common consent a small group of senators are the accepted leaders of the Republican party. No man dare propose anything without their consent. Mr. Harding accepts this situation and meekly promises in advance to do nothing, if elected, without the guidance of these men.

Right here we may learn what to expect. Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania and Illinois are the most powerful in the Republican group of states. The senators from these states dominate the party. To be sure there are a few Westerners to be thought of, but they are voices crying in the wilderness. The real leadership of the party is supplied by the states I have named. When we look at the record of these men it is a striking fact that no great law, no amendment to the Constitution, bears the name of a senator from the states indicated. The senators from these great commonwealths are able and resourceful men, but they have used their ability and their power to block and defeat others. They are shrewd, forceful and persistent in political strategy, but constructive they are not. The blankness of the record proves this.

My conclusion is that if Mr. Hayes will stir up the Republican party and make it once more the party of moral convictions and leadership, if he will stir up the senators and inspire them to constructive activity, if he will move the party to call off the dogs of slander and abuse whenever they begin their nefarious work of character assassination, then many of us will be more willing to support the nominees of the party, but until then we shall continue to vote independently and pray for a better day to dawn.

A Woman's Appeal to Women Voters

Dear Mr. Editor:

The recent International Congress against Alcoholism held in Washington, D. C., on the invitation of the State Department of the United States Government deserves more than the brief comment of the secular press. Eminent scientists, educators and government officials from nearly every nation were present to represent their governments, and discuss prohibition. The British Ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes, called the Eighteenth Amendment the most important social experiment the world had known. Though there is still much to be desired in the enforcement, results even under these lax conditions are amazing. The very success of prohibition is its danger. The wet party, through liquor men and brewers, will cancel the Volstead Act if possible. By bringing back light wines and beers, 2.75% alcohol, they will bring back the saloon.

Women who fought for prohibition must now vote to save it. It seems an innocent thing to vote for light wines and beer, but the liquor men who are working desperately to win know that if they can win they can again regain their trade and debauch the nation. Every Christian

From a Loyal Nonogenarian

Dear Mr. Editor:

I have just read your editorial on "The Lambeth Appeal and American Opinion." It cheers my heart to have you say: "The Universal Church of Christ is already in existence; that the sign of membership is the use of men and organizations of men by the Holy Spirit, and that it is not co-extensive with or limited to the church organizations which have ministers episcopally ordained."

You seem to see it in the late Conference at Geneva. The utterances of the men garbed in bishop's uniform, like the Bishop of Bombay, seem to indicate a new day is indeed dawning on earth.

My trip to Boston has given me a new hold on life. Since returning I have made another trip of a thousand miles and am today feeling better for it. I am beginning to preach again.

Training a Church to Have Missionary Spirit

By William Horace Day, D.D.

Our program of advance is called the Congregational World Movement. If we are to achieve our goal, a new generation of Pilgrim Christians must be prepared in intelligence and devotion for adequate world outlook and responsibility.

Pastors and church leaders are greatly indebted to Herbert W. Gates, our Secretary of Missionary Education, who has prepared a brief, practical manual by which they may inaugurate a simple but effective missionary program. This admirable handbook will help us in three essentials.

First, there must be an adequate plan. The Kingdom will not be established by those who merely wait for something to turn up. Ships do not make successful voyages without a careful studying of the chart and an accurate laying out of the course. Hand-to-mouth arrangements are never sufficient. "The long swing" program, covering not one year but several, is essential. In these pages we have the materials for an adequate plan for any church.

Secondly, there must be wise leadership. The people never offer themselves willingly to any generous program unless the real leaders take the lead. With this handbook, capable men and women whose knowledge of missionary material and method is very limited may accept appointment on the missionary committee. The committee may secure systematic missionary education in all departments and create the atmosphere of world citizenship throughout any congregation, and may give to those on the Every Member Canvass committee a clear idea of the reasons for the various items on the church benevolence budget.

Thirdly, there must be co-ordination of all the departments of the church. If the work of missionary education is to be adequately done, it must not only be planned by able leaders but it must secure the co-operation of every group. After the summer vacation, pastors review the work of the preceding year as they block out courses of worship and instruction for Sunday preaching services, mid-week and group addresses. The review of last year will show how many missionary addresses the pastor himself has made, how many courses of study conducted, how many visiting missionaries have been invited. Has the missionary had a frequent place in public prayer? How largely has he studied missionary material in his search for striking illustration of moral and spiritual truths? The same processes of examination and a definite program for the coming year are suggested for the officers of the Sunday school, for the church board of religious education. The fields of the women's societies and of the men's organizations are no less carefully covered. For the young people he has a very promising plan.

No handbook can meet every situation. Dr. Gates invites any who are interested in successful missionary education to write him of their problems and difficulties. His years of study and expert experience are at the service of all.

Such a program of missionary education will develop a missionary enthusiasm that is vital and enduring.

Like Rest on the Mountain Top

By George Lawrence Parker

Have you ever tried to pray at twelve o'clock noon? I know it is an inconvenient hour, but you can pray, if need be, without the closed door of your room. At noon the world is at its busiest; it is that world with its factory whistles and its rushing streets and offices that I want to hold up to God for his smile and his pity. I even wonder, sometimes, if God does not weary of having a sleepy and sleeping world held up to him at night. Surely, he must love our noon-tide world and yearn to have us lift that up to him a little closer. Noon is the day's climax, too, and to pray then is like the rest on the mountain top before we begin to go down again. Who would be so foolish as to rush on over the mountain and never pause for a breath of the high air and the large view all around? To pray at noon means the look backward and forward, but more than that a look all around—and a look upward, best of all. So I like to pray at twelve o'clock noon even if I must pray on the street, or the train, or the trolley car. I like to feel the throbbing world nestling up against the quietude of God.

First Church of Quincy, Ill.

When Asa Turner, Jr., made his noted trip through the Mississippi Valley in 1830, he founded a church at Quincy, Ill., which in 1833 became identified as the First Congregational Church of Quincy. This church is the oldest of the 328 Congregational churches in Illinois. During the Civil War the church was divided on the slavery question, but united again afterward. The present structure was completed in 1874, at a cost of $93,000, and is both beautiful and imposing. A picture of it appears on the cover of this week's issue.

Special mention should be made of three of the successful pastorates—that of Dr. Samuel H. Dana, 1883—1903; of Dr. James Robert Smith, 1903—1915; and of the present pastor, Rev. Edward Archibald Thompson. Mr. Thompson's work with the business men is especially commendable. The Brotherhood meetings, with their attendance of 125 or more, rival every other club in the city, both in cordial spirit of co-operation and of good fellowship.

The Sunday evening services meet with decided approval both on the part of the members and of numerous non-members. There is an average attendance of over 700. The service includes organ prelude, invocation, hymns, anthem, motion pictures, and a brief but pointed sermon. Every Saturday afternoon the motion picture machine is used to entertain the children of the community, free of charge.

During the fifteen months of Mr. Thompson's pastorate the Church school attendance has increased nearly fifty per cent., and all other organizations have also made rapid strides. Easter Sunday, 77 new members were received into the church, and of these over half were men and boys.

The members of the church feel that they are entering upon a field of enlarged Christian service.

In the Church School

of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression (human sacrifice), the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath showed thee, O Man, what is good; and what doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

Even the Psalms in places take this same view: "Sacrifice and offering thou hast no delight in; mine ears hast thou opened; burnt-offering and sin-offering hast thou not required." Ps. 40:6. "For thou delightest not in sacrifice; else would I give it: Thou hast no pleasure in Burnt-offering." Ps. 51:16.

Turning to Jesus, we never find so much as a hint that anything had to be done to appease the wrath of God or to change God's attitude toward the sinner. But there is much about drawing man and reconciling him to God. There is much about finding lost men whom God is yearning to have come home into fellowship with himself. Paul agrees with Jesus in this.

Jesus quoted with approval in Matt. 12:7 the passage from Hosea: "But if ye had known what this meaneth, I desire mercy and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless." The prophets, Jesus and Paul, all believe in self-giving, in sacrifice, even in vicarious sacrifice, but there is no indication that this was to change God's feeling and attitude toward the sinner. It was to change the sinner's attitude toward God and toward fellow man.

In the face of the teaching of the prophets and Jesus, can we continue to teach that the Old Testament sacrificial system was commanded by God? I prefer to go with Jesus and the prophets.

Questions and suggestions are welcomed.

F. M. SHELDON.

Pew Rents Should Be Abolished

We are frank to say that we would like to see pew rents abolished. They are an anachronism. But we would, at the same time, like to see a revival of interest in "the old family pew." The giving up of rented pews does not necessarily mean the scattering of the members of a family over the church. Assigned seats seem quite as effective as rented pews in keeping families together. Sad to say, neither system seems particularly effective in our day. That fine lad prefers to sit in the gallery or in the back pew "with the fellows." If his father could see all that his pastor sees that lad would be in the family pew next Sunday. How beautiful the sight of a whole family in the "old family pew!"—The Watchman Examiner.

RISIBLES

"I know a man that has been married thirty years and he spends all his evenings at home."

"That's what I call love."

"Oh, no, it's paralysis."—Cornell Widow.

Mistress (to cook from the country): "Well, what do you think of our gas fires?"

Cook: "I think them wonderful, ma'am. Why, those in the kitchen haven't gone out since I came here over a week ago."—Karikaturen.

Dr. Lyman P. Powell gives some examples of the lengths to which petty bitterness between sects will sometimes carry men. "A visitor in a certain town which had four churches and adequately supported none, asked a pillar of one poor dying church, 'How's your church getting on?' 'Not very well,' was the reply, 'but, thank the Lord, the others are not doing any better!' "—Christian Register.

Thomas was not a prime favorite with his rich uncle. In vain did he try to impress him, but the old man was not easily impressed.

One evening the young man went to his uncle's home for a call, and in the course of conversation asked:

"Uncle, don't you think it would be rather foolish for me to marry a girl who was intellectually my inferior?"

"Worse than foolish, Thomas," was the reply. "Worse than foolish—impossible!"—Success.

After three days in the whale's interior, Jonah was piously kneeling to give thanks to God for his escape when his eyes and ears were assailed by:

Six campaign orators.

Three jazz orchestras.

A free-verse magazine.

A notice of twenty-five per cent. advance in the rent of his apartment.

Seven newspapers with headlines promising "probes," "grills," "drives," and "wars on high prices."

Advertisements of fourteen accessories guaranteed to double the mileage of his chariot and his chariot tires.

Whereupon he rose from his knees, swore softly and fluently, and—signaled for another whale.—Life.

The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Issue

Our London Correspondent, who reports the British Mayflower celebrations for us, is Mr. Arthur Porritt, a well known English journalist and writer, who has been connected for many years with the Christian World.

Graham Taylor, who concludes this week his review of the Interchurch Steel Strike Report, is head of Chicago Commons Settlement House, Professor of Social Economies in Chicago Seminary and a leader in social and industrial reform.

Charles S. Macfarland, who writes "A Friendly Visitation to the Waldensians," is General Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and therefore in close and frequent touch with religious affairs on the Continent.

Lawrence R. Howard, author of "A Modern City's Jericho Road" has recently come to Boston from Wisconsin. He is pastor of the historic North Church in Cambridge.

We are glad to give a wider audience to this extremely suggestive story which was first read to Mr. Howard's own people at Cambridge. It served as an incentive to their undertaking a very definite and fruitful task of community visitation. Here may be a limit for other churches.

Abbie Farwell Brown, whose poem "The Union" reveals not only her patriotism but her growing power as a poet has lived all her life in her quaint and picturesque home in the West End. From it she sends forth both children verses—such as those frequently printed in The Congregationalist and poems like "The Union" for maturer minds. Her latest volume "Heart of New England" is being warmly praised.

Our Pilgrim Pulpit

We are just starting a new department which is sure to be much appreciated by our readers. It is The Pilgrim Pulpit in which will appear every week inspiring short sermons written by our brilliant and, for the most part, younger ministers. The first was by Dr. Holmes of Lincoln, Neb., in the issue of Oct. 7. This week we have a sermon by Rev. James Gordon Gilkey of Springfield, Mass. From now on The Pilgrim Pulpit will be a regular feature and we shall welcome comment, suggestion and criticism from our readers regarding it.

The New Sunday Law in Massachusetts

We should like to gather some definite facts relating to the workings of the newly passed law in Massachusetts allowing sports on Sunday afternoon within certain restrictions. May we not hear from towns and cities that have experimented in this direction? In case permission has been accorded by local authorities, how has the plan worked out practically? Has it been detrimental to the religious interests of the community? Have any obvious advantages resulted from this concession to the more liberal elements?

What we desire is facts and brief comment upon or interpretation of the facts. We hope to hear from a number of communities soon. Let any citizen feel free to respond to this request.

The Pilgrims as Real People

A pictorial entertainment of ten numbers, ready for use without preliminary preparation, and far more thrilling and instructive than the poetical romances of Pilgrim history, because based upon the first-hand story of the Pilgrims themselves.

A program drawn from authentic original sources and all the available pictorial history, much of which has been selected for this purpose from comparatively obscure sources.

Prepared by Jonathan A. Rawson, Jr., Editor of The America Picturelooks, adopted by the Americanization Bureau of the Y. M. C. A., Author of the illustrated address, "America and the League of Nations."

The proposition is that we furnish you the following on the terms given below:—

1. Fifty hand-colored lantern slides of the most interesting scenes in Pilgrim history, each with a complete description in typewritten manuscript. The slides are in two groups, comprising two numbers of the program.
2. An outline of Pilgrim history to precede the showing of the slides.
3. Three appropriate hymns in lantern slides.
4. Four selected readings from famous writers (two poetry, two prose).
5. A program for the evening's entertainment.
6. Outlines of two advance newspaper notices announcing the entertainment and the sale of tickets.
7. Suggested plans by which to arouse public interest in the entertainment.

The Landing of the Pilgrims, popularly regarded as taking place on one given date, actually extended over a period of months, and the hardships and trials which preceded and followed the landing have a more important place in the great achievement than the mere coming ashore of any one group on any one day. It is indeed most fitting that the "Landing" is to be celebrated not only on December 21, 1920, but also before that and throughout the year 1921.

This entire outfit becomes your property and may be used repeatedly in churches, schools, clubs, community centers, etc.

Paid admissions for one entertainment alone can be made to cover the entire expense, fifty dollars.

TERMS:

Five dollars with the order. Forty-five dollars on delivery

The Man at the Top

A POPULAR New York newspaper writer was dining the other Sunday with one of the presidential candidates in the latter's home. As the journalist studied the man and his surroundings, he said to himself, "I wonder what this man thinks about when he goes to bed. Has he any idea of the burdens that will rest upon him in case he is elected?"

Who, indeed, would want to be President of the United States at such a time as this? When "the tumult and the shouting dies," when the satisfactions of victory have once been tested and enjoyed and the people's choice settles down to administering the government of such a nation as this in such a crisis in the history of the world, what a tremendous drain it will be upon body, mind and spirit!

Undoubtedly Garfield and Harrison, Cleveland and McKinley, when in turn they took their places in the succession, felt the solemnity of the occasion and the greatness of their opportunities. But being President back in the seventies or eighties or even in the nineties seems now a much less serious undertaking than being President from 1921 to 1925. The passage of time has intensified problems then existing and has created new ones. The status of the Negro produces even more irritation now than then. Railroads are in a difficult plight, as the condition of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Road attests. Class antipathies are stronger. Radicals and "reds" have increased in number and their subterranean plottings may any day break forth in violent demonstrations. In the great middle class, pinched by profiteers on the one hand and the demands of organized labor on the other, there is more unrest than ever before. All these grave situations and more we see within our own borders, while beyond them loom the sinister specters of distress and revolt in other lands and of reaction toward militarism and selfish nationalism.

There will be little in the way of conspicuously successful leadership in other parts of the world to cheer and guide our new President. Of the four men who at Paris in the spring of 1919 seemed to be holding the world together and shaping its future, one only is left in an influential position, and even Lloyd George has his back to the wall. The world war developed a very small number of new leaders of commanding proportions. One was Herbert Hoover, for whom neither of our great parties has seemed to be able to find a governmental task commensurate with his abilities. Another was Nicholas Lenin, who has secured for himself a great following, but through such methods and policies as have made him feared and distrusted by sober-minded people in all parts of the world. Venezelos, the excellent representative of democratic aspirations in Greece, has shown his capacity to carry a just national cause to triumph, and Smuts of South Africa has grown in general esteem, but neither has become a world-figure.

This dearth of men at the top who year after year in these troublous times can prove themselves "pillars of a nation's hope," makes it clear that civilization has developed outwardly more rapidly than it has developed inwardly. The organization of the world or of a single nation has become so complex, its material expansion so extended, its racial complications so intricate, that the world is not producing with sufficient rapidity men molded on large enough lines to meet the situation.

Take the strain on physical endurance. The sick man in the White House is a pathetic witness to the tremendous and inexorable demands upon the health of men at the top today. How does Lloyd George, far from a giant in stature, stand the wear and tear of almost constant travel? Today he is speaking in Wales, tomorrow he is conferring with other premiers on the continent, the next day he is back at Downing Street. How mentally agile, too, such a leader has to be to try and untie in succession such hard knots as the Irish question, the problem of stabilizing the finances of Europe and the strikes, or menace of strikes, one after another, each more portentous than its predecessor.

Think, too, of the strain upon character. The man at the top is constantly beleaguered by those who want this or that for themselves. What wisdom it takes to discern the right course and when once it is seen, the courage to pursue it. So to carry oneself in office as to escape hatred and abuse, to avoid inconsistencies, to be strong without exercising any form of tyranny, to be fair without catering to all shades of opinion, to be absolutely just and at the same time kind and compassionate—such a combination of instincts and qualities in the man at the top seems to call not for a human being but a demi-god.

Two lessons emerge from this brief analysis. One is that if the democratic nations of the earth have not at the moment available to their command "supermen," they must advance in the art of self-government. They must learn to keep themselves steady, self-controlled, clear-headed, right-minded, so that as many members as possible of the body politic, through their personal lives and activities, shall be contributing to the stability and prosperity of the nation and of all peoples. In the last two decades it has been the fashion to put propositions "up to Roosevelt" or to Wilson, or to some governor or premier, when those who submit these problems should be having an active and perhaps determining part in their solution.

No man at the top can alter unchanging laws. No government can assume for its citizens the duty of the individual to labor, to save, to give, to serve, to make the citizen's full contribution to his nation and to the world.

The other lesson is that if democracy has no plethora of great men, it must utilize those who through the traditional and orderly processes employed by free peoples rise to the top and are entrusted with power such as kings and emperors once wielded. As a son reveals the influence of the home in which he was reared, as a minister is largely what his parish makes him, so the President, the congressman, the governor, gains or suffers in proportion to the amount of active and genuine co-operation and confidence or the lack of them exhibited by those who put him in his office.

Our duty to our country and to the world will not be fully discharged when we cast our votes next Tuesday, or even when we vote as we pray and pray as we vote. We must follow that vote and that prayer with the Christian's confidence that the greatness of his office and the greatness of his task will so purify and greaten the man at the top that, spared from unjust and cruel censure and supported by the conscience, the brain and the brawn of his fellow citizens, he may help to lead this nation forward in the path of peace, prosperity and world brotherhood.

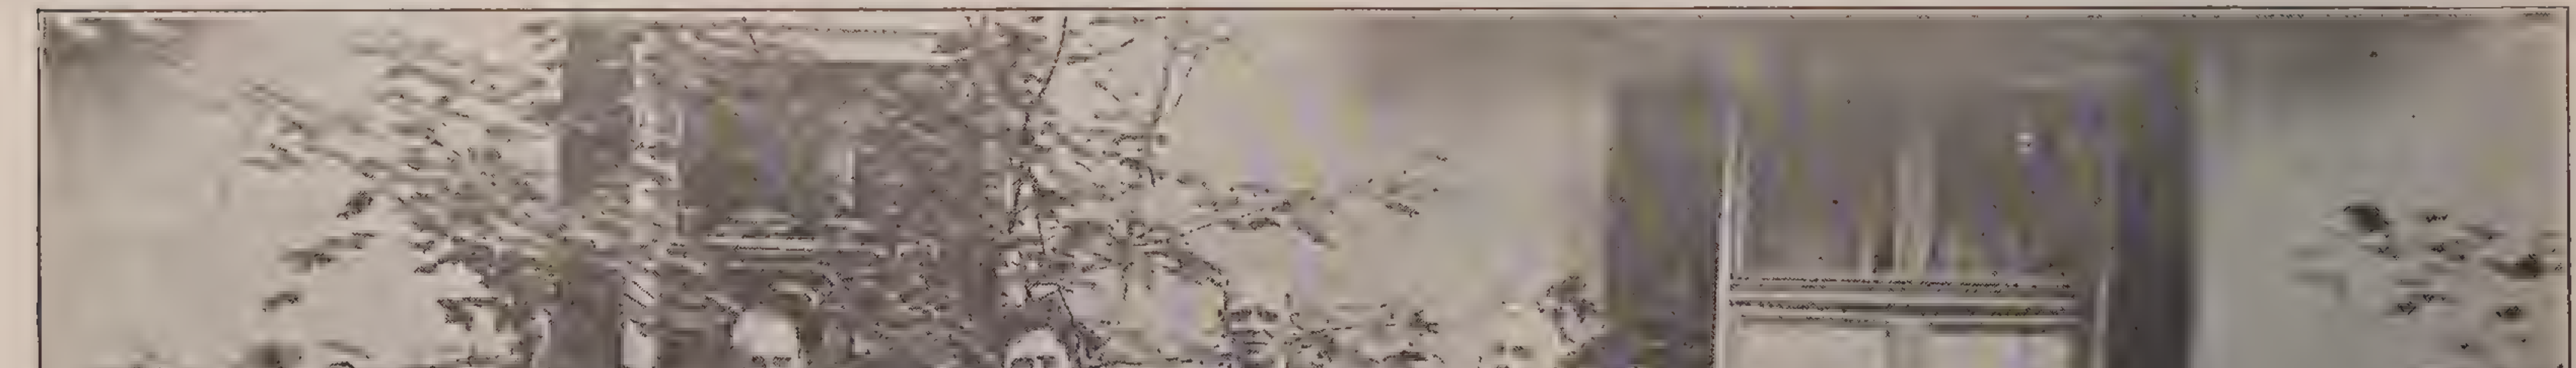
WHAT THE CHRISTIAN WORLD IS DOING

Philadelphia to Celebrate the Tercentenary

PHILADELPHIA is among the American cities which have planned to celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of the Pilgrims with an elaborate program. The secretary for the committee which has the celebration in charge is Rev. William V. Berg, pastor of Central Congregational Church and president of the Philadelphia Federation of Churches. The six Congregational churches in the city and some of the near-by New Jersey churches will join in the celebration. At Central the celebration will include the completion of a $5,000 addition to the Endowment Fund and the subscription of $1,500 to the Pilgrim Memorial Fund. The program covers a week of festivities. On Monday, Nov. 22, Rev. William P. Merrill, D. D., of the Brick Presbyterian Church in New York City, will address a special service at Central Church. This will be followed on Tuesday and Wednesday by a pageant and a "town meeting," with addresses by officially appointed representatives from France and Great Britain. On Friday the Pilgrim Monument, which has been moved from City Hall to a new position on the Parkway, is to be rededicated under the auspices of the New England Society of Pennsylvania. Pres. Henry Churchill King will address invited guests at the Central Church on that evening. The Philadelphia Orchestra will give a concert including some "Pilgrim Festival Music" on Saturday evening. All these activities lead up to Sunday, Nov. 28, which will be celebrated in all the churches as "Mayflower Sunday," with special programs and addresses.

Ministers as Public Officials

A YEAR or two ago The Congregationalist had an article from the pen of Rev. H. J. Rice, of Emporia, Kansas, in which he detailed some of his experiences as Police Judge in his city. Emporia has now gone further in experimentation with ministers as municipal officers. Rev. John C. Brogan, pastor of Grace Methodist Church, an exponent of the cause of labor, has been elected mayor, and it is reported that he was inaugurated clad in overalls. The Poor Commissioner of the City is Rev. John Wilkie, Pastor of the Bethany Congregational Church. He is also manager of the Employment Bureau, Director of the City Market, Secretary of the Red Cross, executor of a fund for the relief of poor children, and general factotum so far as the needy folks are concerned. Dr. Rice, who is pastor of the First Congregational Church, still continues his service as Police Judge. Emporia is William Allen White's town and it is reported that he cordially approves the régime of the preachers. Other cities have found ministers valuable in efficient service. Dr. John Faville was for a time Mayor of Appleton, Wisconsin, and Dr. Archibald Hadden, for twenty-eight years pastor of the First Congregational Church of Muskegon, Michigan, is at the present time a city commissioner. There is an opinion abroad among the laymen that ministers as a class are not fitted to administer governmental offices. It is safe to say that as great a proportion of ministers are fitted by natural talent, training, and experience, to make this contribution to the welfare of a city as are men from any other profession or calling.



AMERICANS FORGE INTERNATIONAL FRIENDSHIPS

These twenty-seven men and women traveled across the Atlantic this past summer to join their hands and hearts with Christians of other lands and of other connections in the hope of promoting unity in faith, order and activity within the bounds of a reasonable personal liberty. This picture was taken at St. Beatenberg, Switzerland, Aug. 28, 1920, when the Alliance for the Promotion of International Friendship was in session. The report of that and two other similar gatherings in Switzerland was given by our special correspondent in THE CONGREGATIONALIST of Sept. 30. Some of the faces that will be immediately recognized by many of our readers are (in the front row) Dr. Henry A. Atkinson of the Church Peace Union and Mrs. Atkinson, Dr. William P. Merrill, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, who was chosen executive chairman of the Alliance, and seated at the extreme left, Mr. Robert H. Gardner of Boston. In the middle row the faces of Dr. Samuel A. Eliot of Boston, Dr. C. S. MacFarland of the Federal Council, and Dr. Frederick A. Lynch, will be quickly recognized. Rev. Edward C. Boynton of Worcester is at the extreme left in the third row.

EDITORIAL

A Word for Our Times

A nation that desires to be just, generous and chivalrous in all its international relations is not tending toward a limp, sentimental internationalism—loving, as it were, all men's wives alike. It is merely achieving greatness by the road along which every individual achieves greatness. It is not either internationalism or nationalism, either an international flag or "Old Glory;" it is both nationalism and internationalism. Both the cross of Christ and the Stars and Stripes.—The Churchman.

The Steel Strike Inquiry

An important service has been rendered by Professor Graham Taylor in his articles on the Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike, the third and last of which appears in this issue of The Congregationalist. This illuminating study of a grave and far-reaching problem seems to have been written with perfect fairness and presents both sides with remarkable discrimination. In the light of the arguments and conclusions presented by Professor Taylor, we believe that certain facts are established. Among them are the following:

The Steel Strike of 1919 was due to unjust, unsocial and un-American conditions in the steel industry under the United States Steel Corporation.

The twelve-hour day and seven-day week prevailed among a large number of the less skilled workers.

The extremely autocratic policy of the Corporation manifested against trades unions, collective bargaining and conference with the workers is the cause of deep dissatisfaction among the workers.

The wages of the unskilled workers were inadequate.

Charges made against the strikers of alleged bolshevism as the purpose of the strike are unwarranted, although there were radicals among the strike leaders.

Working and living conditions have been improved in important and extensive ways by the steel corporations for which the Report does not give quite enough credit.

The attempts to discredit the Interchurch Commission that made the investigation and report without refuting the facts alleged in the report put the Steel Corporation in an unfavorable light and fail of their purpose.

This inquiry came in the natural course of the increasing sense of responsibility for social conditions that has been developing in the churches during recent years. It was right and proper that such a great industrial conflict should be investigated by church representatives and that the conditions and industrial policies harmful to public welfare should be made known, and reform sought as was done by this commission.

Industrial justice and peace will be found only as the Gary policy is supplanted by a more democratic, humane and righteous one. We believe that the Interchurch report adds helpful influence toward this needed reform. It may be that another and greater struggle than the 1919 steel strike will come before reactionary management will yield to right and reason. We trust such a struggle may not be necessary and that the hopeful signs emphasized by Professor Taylor may rapidly multiply.

To Honor Dr. Herring

On page 536 of this issue appears a statement by representative official leaders of the denomination concerning the contemplated raising of a "Herring Memorial Fund." The plan has in view a reasonable provision for Mrs. Herring, who was so deeply interested and so closely identified with every phase of her husband's denominational service, but beyond that immediate and very legitimate use of the interest arising from any fund that may be raised, is its ultimate addition to the Annuity Fund. Thus the giver will have a double satisfaction in connection with his offering, however large or small.

The idea of this fund originated in the minds of several men convinced that throughout the country were many who would be glad to express in this tangible way the admiration they felt for Dr. Herring and their appreciation of his great contribution to the strengthening of our denominational life. We shall be glad to receive and acknowledge in our columns contributions to this fund, or gifts may be sent to the Herring Memorial Fund, the address of which is 375 Lexington Avenue, New York City. Checks srould be made payable to the Herring Memorial Fund. We trust the response to the opportunity will be speedy and general. Dr. Herring gave himself unsparingly to his great task with no thought of what it might bring back to him personally. All the more reason why the one who was closest to him should be generously remembered, and the Annuity Fund with whose raising he had so much to do should be ultimately increased.

Women at the Polls

Guesses are many and varied with regard to the effects of the nation-wide enfranchisement of women. But that a mighty new force charged with great potentialities of good or evil has been released, no one questions. It is equally clear that the women, generally speaking, are going to avail themselves of this chance. It may be necessary here and there for Catholic priests and Protestant ministers to urge the women of their respective parishes to register and go to the polls, but an inward impulse will be sufficient in many cases to take them there, whatever their creed or color.

Just how independent the women will show themselves when once they enter the election booth remains to be seen. "I don't know what I am going to do," said a woman the other day, "in view of the fact that my husband and I totally disagree on what I consider the main issue of the campaign." No one really likes to differ with wife or husband, even on matters superficial, and the opinion of the man of the house should certainly count for what it is worth. At the same time it would add nothing to the solution of our many problems if, election after election, a greatly preponderating number of women should vote just as father or husband or brother votes. We doubt if this will be the case. Women during the last twenty-five years have been educated by means of their clubs, missionary societies and other associations to the point where they are informed concerning public questions and can make their decisions as to candidates and platforms as intelligently as the average man. This being so their vote should represent themselves and not the behest of some man or organization.

Apart from the immediate results which the presence of American women in the election booths by the million next Tuesday will help to effect, several things have already come to pass because of woman's enfranchisement that seem to us full of hope.

The sphere of woman's participation in politics has been enlarged. She is on national, state and local committees. Her counsel and aid are sought as never before by the professional politicians. They will find it more and more difficult to manipulate elections and to carry out their own selfish designs now that woman has a decided say in what shall come to pass.

There is a decided change also in the atmosphere of the places where voters register and cast their ballots. The incessant smoker finds himself moved to throw aside his cigar for a few moments, or is gently admonished so to do. The torchlight parades that include a considerable contingent of women in picturesque attire are more dignified and impressive. So whether as a torch-bearer or a worker in the team or a propagandist, woman's influence extends far beyond the mere depositing of her ballot.

Because of the fact that women vote there ought to be and there is coming to be, we think, a broadening of the field of conversation at many a family table. This has an educational value for husband, wife and children. A certain measure of talk about Article X or the meaning of a mandate or the tariff or the Volstead Act is much to be preferred to a steady stream of trivialities and gossip.

As for the unattached women, of whom there are multitudes—particularly in New England—who live alone, or who board, and do not have the advantage or the disadvantage of close relationship with men, it strikes us that the possession of suffrage ought to mean more to them than to any other class of women. They have to win their way in the world without much help from the other sex. All the more reason why they should have the chance to help determine measures bearing on their own welfare and the welfare of others, and having the chance, should exercise it deliberately and gladly.

The Congregationalist declared for woman suffrage in advance of many of its religious contemporaries. Now that it has come, it congratulates the more than twenty million women voters who next week will stand shoulder to shoulder with the men at the place of power. The Congregationalist is confident that the women, not only in this election but in all subsequent ones, will not disappoint those who have learned to rely on their moral intuitions, their unselfish patriotism, their devotion to the welfare of humanity. American politics ought to be cleaner, American life purer, America's influence in the world greater, because of what the women will do at the polls.

The American Board at Marietta

The American Board has held many larger meetings, but never one richer in interest and impressiveness than the meeting in Marietta on October 12 to 15. Returning delegates and speakers are using emphatic terms in praise of all that happened. Every circumstance was favorable for a rare gathering of the foreign missionary forces. Mr. W. W. Mills, of the Marietta Church, a long time corporate member of the Board and a friend of all Congregational interests, was not mistaken when he urged the Board to come to his part of the state and gave assurance that the welcome would be wide and deep. The fact that the Board never had held a meeting nearer than Columbus made the occasion one of novelty and interest to the Congregationalists of Southern Ohio and adjoining territory. Two hundred delegates came from outside the city and these with the local friends gave the appearance of a well filled church at most of the sessions. At the evening meetings the church was crowded, in some instances scores of people being obliged to stand at the rear. We are hearing much of the thoughtful and generous hospitality, not only of the church and the college, but of all the people of the entertaining city. The Baptist, Methodist, and even Catholic homes were opened wide to the delegates. It was well nigh impossible for any one to do any walking as automobiles by the score were placed at the disposal of the visitors.

Details of the meeting will be given in our next issue, but we have learned already that never have the missionaries given a better account of themselves and their work than at Marietta. At the Thursday night session, with a crowded church, some one asked that all the missionaries might go upon the platform and be looked upon as a body. When forty-three responded to this request, the audience rose in token of honored and affectionate greeting and President Moore led in a very tender prayer. Another great moment was when a band of student volunteers set forth their aims and purposes in going to the foreign field. The program as usual was well ordered from the standpoint of those who wished to see a balanced and full presentation of the Board's work in its twenty different fields. One pastor made this comment, "as the various fields passed before us the effect was simply tremendous." There were several new features in the program. Perhaps the most noteworthy was Dr. Barton's foreign survey given at an evening session with the aid of the stereopticon. Let us hope that the use of pictorial and graphic material in connection with the survey may become a permanent feature of the Board's program.

More was made of the Exhibit than ever before, particularly on the Sunday preceding the meeting, when the exhibit and the accompanying lectures were attended by nearly 1,000 people. The Board has hit upon a rarely effective device in having missionaries and secretaries conduct story-telling hours for childen in connection with the exhibit. On some of these occasions sixty or seventy children were in attendance.

All things considered, the American Board, in the years when the National Council does not assemble, presents a meeting unique among religious and missionary conventions. The Corporate member, the pastor, and the friend of missions, who does not attend these great gatherings when they come within reach of his time and purse, is missing a great privilege.

The Council at Los Angeles

Preparations are already being made for the next meeting of the Congregational National Council to be held at Los Angeles, Cal., the last week in June, 1921. That charming and rapidly growing city whose desire to entertain the National Council has once or twice been disappointed will soon have a chance to carry into effect its hospitable impulses. Our leaders on the ground are already anticipating and planning for their agreeable but by no means inconsequential task. They have suggested that after the pattern of the International Council in Boston, an invitation be extended to every church to send at least one honorary delegate.

From the point of view of the office of the National Council, arrangements are going forward expeditiously. The program committee, consisting of Moderator Henry Churchill King, Chairman Charles F. Carter and Secretary Edward D. Eaton, is busily at work and expects to provide a series of meetings and of discussions worthy of the occasion. The Council has met once before on the Pacific Coast at Portland, Oregon, but this is the first time it has gone to Southern California and its presence there ought to strengthen already strong local Congregational interests.

Meanwhile state and local bodies should not fail to elect at their autumn gatherings their due quota of delegates. Each district association can be represented by at least one delegate and every association having more than ten churches can elect one additional delegate for each ten churches or major fraction thereof. Each state conference can appoint one delegate and in cases where the aggregate membership is more than ten thousand, can elect one additional delegate for each additional ten thousand members or major fraction thereof.

The Los Angeles meetings, combining as they do the biennial session of the Council and the annual meetings of the missionary societies, will be of the first importance to the life and growth of the denomination. Many pressing and far-reaching questions will be brought before it. It should register another forward step in the common service of our great fellowship.

Of the three requisites of efficient Christian work, at it, all at it and at it all the time, we are sometimes inclined to lay most emphasis on the third. A character and enthusiasm which go only with a hop, skip and a jump, leave spaces of no-witness between. One of the convincing elements of our Lord's character is its even texture. He never forgot to be his real self.

Prayer and Football Playing

This is the height of the college football season. In Centre College, Kentucky, they are duly and sincerely religious and have an old fashioned grip on the reality of the power of prayer. For three years a prayer has been offered as the team left the dressing room for a game. Last year in the most important game of the season the eleven, in the interval between halves, with a score of 6 to 0 against them got down on their knees and asked for strength to win a victory—and won it by getting 14 points. This year they played Harvard last week and returned to their constant tactics of calling in the Almighty as an assistant. And the men believe that this has given them their fame as successful players of the game. Nor do we doubt this, in the sense that prayer has quieted anxiety by substituting faith and called out all the latent strength and all the ready skill of the players.

But this is not to assert for a moment that God determines infallibly the result of any particular game by the prayers for victory of one team or the other. Nor do we understand that the Centre College authorities claim this. For in case both teams in a particular game prayed for victory, that would cancel out the material efficiency of prayer and leave God in the dilemma of choosing and refusing. Prayer in its effect on the character and confidence of the players is one thing. Prayer as a human wielding of the thunderbolt (or the forward pass and scrimmage) let us say is quite another. We hope the Centre College eleven will keep on asking God for strength through faith. If they do so they will have a source of strength, though no insurance of victory. We are writing before the game with Harvard, but supposing that Harvard wins in what, on account of the numbers of students from whom to choose, must have been rather an unequal contest, it will be nothing against the power or value of prayer which has been one of the elements of character and confidence which has brought this small Kentucky college so far to the front in the athletic world.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Viol that was Almost in Tune

Whether a man that is Regenerate hath all parts of him equally Regenerate, hath been discussed by grave men in councils of old time. And I have sometimes inquired of my soul whether there lingered in me any element of the unregenerate that had gotten as far down as my Toes. And this question I ask myself when I listen to Musick other than that of the Sanctuary, even to the Viol, which the profane call the Fiddle, when it is Played Skillfully. For when it playeth of an Ancient man named Daniel whose surname was Tucker, or discourseth upon the wonders of creation in Pop goeth the Weasel, or relateth the adventures of the Pilgrim in Arkansaw, then do I notice that my Sandals rise a little space from the Floor and come down again.

Now I was in the home of a friend whose Daughter had taken lessons upon the Viol, and she essayed to play for me. And she sawed long upon her Instrument to get it worse out of tune than it was already, and she said, I have not a very Good ear for the Tuning, but I can play the melody well.

And she played me a Polonaise in A Flat. And the Polonaise I comprehended not, but the A Flat I was fully conscious of. And I noticed that she had the Technique Down Fine. For she first folded a Silk Handkerchief and placed it against her Neck where the Viol Rested, and the Handkerchief was well chosen for the Harmony of its Color with her Dress, and needed it at that place. Likewise did she Vibrate her finger upon the String as her teacher had Instructed her. And she drew her Bow with the precision of a Director of Calisthenics. But her A string was Flat, and her E string was Sharp, and her other strings were both of them Just a Little Bit Off.

And her father listened with Pride, for he had paid Three Hundred Dollars for the Instrument, and more than that for the Teacher, and his daughter had learned to Render Great Compositions, even Polonaises in A Flat and such like Musick, and she had acquired Technique, and the proper method of folding her Silk Handkerchief. But she had not the Kingdom of God within her so that she should know when all four of her Strings were a Little Bit Off.

Now I would rather that my daughter and my sons should play for me Musick which is Less Ambitious, and play it upon Well Tuned Instruments, even the Money Musk, and the Irish Washerwoman and the Turkey in the Straw, than to render for my Edification Polonaises in A Flat wherein I get more of the Flatness than of the Polonaise.

For a Simple thing that is rendered Artistically is effective when an Ambitious thing poorly done is the more conspicuously a Failure. And there be many things well played as to technique whereof the strings are a Little Bit Off.

In Brief

Are you beginning to summon and arrange your grounds of thanksgiving? It will be a convenience to have them ready for enumeration when Thanksgiving Day arrives.

Whatever the result of the Presidential election let us guard ourselves against the opinion either that American civilization has come down with a crash, or that we are released from the responsibility of being good citizens and of keeping watch upon our representatives in office.

Dr. Walter Laidlaw is quoted by the English newspaper, The Christian as saying that the Jews in New York City now make a third of the whole population, or some 1,800,000, as shown by the last census. He added that this amounts to three times as many as ever lived in Jerusalem. Of these he says, nine out of ten have ceased to attend synagogue except on the great yearly festivals. And there are other thousands of Jews either on the way or looking from their difficult life in the cities of Eastern Europe to America and New York as a refuge and a place of opportunity.

The Republicans of a certain New Jersey district missed a good chance to send an able and militant religious journalist to Congress when at the primaries they turned down Editor Nolan R. Best of The Continent. But he had forty per cent. of the voters with him. It's a good start for 1922 and Mr. Best is still young!

The Tokyo Sunday School Convention before its adjournment took an honorable position with reference to racial equality and human brotherhood. Such utterances by an assemblage which included so many high-minded and influential Americans ought to prove a valuable antidote to jingo sentiment both in Japan and America.

The fact that the current International Sunday School Lessons relate to the life of Christ should lead to a fresh reading of some of the standard lives of Jesus as well as of other books that set forth the historic and scenic background of the country where his life was lived. A Sunday school teacher writes, "We are just beginning to study the life of our Lord and I am reading again with much interest Ben Hur."

Important conferences are going on this week between representatives of numerous church agencies more or less directly related to the Interchurch Movement. We shall report the results as soon as they are given to the public. It is clear that the drift is toward a continuation of co-operation among the Protestant churches of the country, emphasizing educational rather than financial phases of endeavor and leaving with the respective denominations the actual raising of the money. It is a difficult task to face the defects in application of the Interchurch idea and yet to preserve all that is best in the idea itself. But our readers must grapple courageously with the situation as it exists and move forward rather than stand still or go backward. Isolation is as lamentable in the attitude of great communions as it would be in the attitude of nations toward one another.

Scotland votes by localities on the question of licensing, limiting or prohibiting the sale of liquor on Nov. 15. "Local Veto" is the term in use. A petition from ten per cent. of the electorate is necessary, under the law passed seven years ago now coming into effect, to bring the question to an issue, and there has been no difficulty in securing such a number of signatures in 600 out of 700 voting areas, including the whole of Glasgow and most of the mining and industrial areas. An alliance of the churches, the working men and, especially, the women, gives vitality to the movement. The Church of Scotland, the United Free, the Methodist, Baptists and Congregational Churches are all engaged in the movement. And the labor organizations are demanding, not a limitation of the number of licenses, but, total prohibition of the trade.

The authorities of the Roman Church faced with the question of casuistry raised by the attempted suicide of Irish convicts in English prisons by refusing food, are evidently divided into two parties, one maintaining that such suicide is murder and a mortal sin, the other that when intended as a protest against conviction and a weapon in political controversies it is allowable or even commendable. The point was not raised when the English advocates of woman's suffrage secured their release by similar refrainings from food, partly because the English Government released the convicts before the danger stage was reached and partly because they were English and not Irish and did not interest the Roman Church. The pope has listened to the opinions of divergently minded cardinals and referred the point as a question of morals to the Congregation of the Holy Office. On their decision, if accepted and set forth officially by the pope, will depend the question whether Fitzgerald who has died and such other of the hunger strikers as may die in the meantime are justified in conscience, and also whether this is in the opinion of the infallible head of the Roman Church a legitimate weapon of men convicted in the courts against the execution of the sentences imposed upon them.

The Interchurch Steel Strike Report

III. Is It Within the Province of the Church?

By Prof. Graham Taylor

Graham Taylor

It is the more necessary to remember why and how the Interchurch inquiry and report upon this strike were undertaken, because not only the right of a church agency thus to inquire, but also the very motive of this inquiry, are so challenged by hostile critics as to impugn the trustworthiness and discredit the value of the report. At the outset it should be understood that the appointment of this Commission of Inquiry by the Interchurch World Movement was the culmination of convictions that have been growing within the churches of widely different type for the past ten or more years. In 1908 the representatives of thirty or more denominations, including more than 18,000,000 members, organized the Federal Council of these Protestant churches and issued a declaration of principles applying to industry, for which the Council took its stand. This declaration was the outgrowth of movements within the constituent church bodies that had previously resulted in pronouncements of their own and in the organization of commissions of social service.

The Interchurch Movement therefore naturally included an industrial relations department. This was organized long before there was any sign of any strike to be investigated. Inquiries were planned to ascertain the living and working conditions in several of the great industries, including of course the steel industry. This latter inquiry would and should have been undertaken had there been no strike. The struggle within the steel industry created a concrete situation calling for investigation. The Industrial Relations Department therefore appointed the Commission of Inquiry, authorizing it to function independently and to submit its report to the Interchurch Movement. The Report on the Steel Strike of 1919 was unanimously adopted by the Commission of Inquiry and by the executive committee of the Interchurch Movement, which authorized its publication.

Thus it will be seen that the determination of the churches to apply their principles to living and working conditions and to seek to understand these conditions in order to fulfill that purpose was not sudden nor sporadic, not prompted by the war fever nor class sympathies engendered by disturbed conditions following the war, but was gradually developed from their experience in trying to meet the demands of an industrial age upon religion.

The Right of the Churches to Challenge Conditions

The warrant which the churches may justly plead for taking this attitude and line of action was forcibly yet tactfully expressed by Dr. Edward T. Devine in the statement he made Dec. 18, 1919, to the presidents of the constituent companies of the United States Steel Corporation on behalf of the Federal Council of Christian churches. Referring to the Federal Council's Commission on the Church and Social Service, he informed the officials of the Steel Corporation that the Commission's particular function is "to keep the churches informed, through the religious press and otherwise, about social and industrial questions; and to help to formulate recommendations in regard to particular situations which involve ethical, moral or religious factors, and on which the churches should take a position; to enable the preachers in their pulpits and the editors of the religious press to deal sanely, candidly and helpfully with these situations." Quoting from the report of a committee of the United States Steel Corporation's stockholders presented by Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, April 15, 1912, "that a twelve-hour day of labor, followed continuously by any group of men for any considerable number of years, means a decreasing of the efficiency and lessening of the vigor and virility of such men," Dr. Devine courteously and impressively brought this fact to bear in these words: "The question which we raise and press with all the earnestness at our command is whether any corporation has the right, for any considerable number of years, to 'decrease the efficiency' and 'lessen the vigor and virility' of their men; whether any employing corporation, even if, for the bribe of over-time pay, the workers themselves acquiesce, has a right to deprive American families of the presence of the head of the family for thirteen hours of the day; or the right to deprive the community of the vigor and virility of its citizens."

Asserting and defending the right of the churches thus to challenge such conditions he said: "The churches are interested in the character of individuals, in the homes of the nation and in the kind of neighborhoods or communities of which the nation is made up, and it is their testimony, gentlemen, that the twelve-hour day which, as your own committee pointed out, means an absence of at least thirteen hours from the family, deprives the children of the parental oversight to which they are entitled, deprives the mothers of the full partnership to which they are entitled from their husbands, deprives the men of the chance to get acquainted with their children and the free time which their physical and social well-being demands. It is the view of the churches expressed in many platforms and resolutions that a twelve-hour day for industrial wage-earners means overwork." This frank protest and this direct appeal to the consciences, hearts and patriotism of those responsible for the management of the United States Steel Corporation plants were received without any token of resentment and are said to have made a favorable impression. Although taken under consideration, no response has as yet been made.

Attacks upon the Churches

The National Civic Federation Review launched the first attack upon the churches for their social reconstruction programs which had been prompted by the war. In its issue of March 25, 1919, Ralph M. Easley charged nearly every denomination of Christians, Protestant and Roman Catholic alike, in this country and abroad, with having based their respective programs on "views of near-Bolsheviki," under the title, "Radicals Mislead Churches about Labor." Again on Sept. 30, 1919, he renewed the attack under the title, "Socialism or Social Reform in the Church—Which?"

As soon as the investigation of conditions in the steel industry was announced, charges began to be lodged against the Interchurch Commission of Inquiry and its investigators. These charges became personal and calumnious even before the summary of the report was released for publication. The files of the Commission's office had been rifled. Those responsible for publishing some entirely unfounded charges were forced to retract by the Commission's threat of court action. Before the full text of the report was published, the editor of one of the most influential Eastern financial journals personally expressed his contempt for the Interchurch Commission in these pre-judging terms: "The Steel Company is under far less necessity of clearing itself than the willingly deluded fools who made the Interchurch report."

A semi-monthly magazine, bearing the title Industry, published at Washington, D. C., by and for manufacturers, early in June opened a long series of articles criticizing several denominations and federations of churches with an attack upon the personnel both of the Federal Council and of the Interchurch Commission of Inquiry and its staff. It charged the investigators with being extreme radicals, citing as reasons the fact that they had written articles for certain well known and widely read journals, such as the New Republic, and the fact that one of them proved to be "a noted professional social service worker." The affiliation of the Commission of Inquiry with the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America was deemed so suspicious that Industry labored through three columns to prove it. Most suspicious of all was the alleged influence of Prof. Harry F. Ward of Union Theological Seminary, whose participation in formulating the "Social Creed," first adopted by the Methodists and then in 1908 by the Federal Council, is cited as evidence of his pernicious activities.

Summing up "the amazing and almost incredible radicalism of Prof. Harry F. Ward" that had "developed a condition in the Industrial Relations Department of the Interchurch Movement which is appalling when considered from any angle," Industry concludes its arraignment of Prof. Ward's alleged radicalism in these amazingly naïve terms: "In other words he intimated that the teachings of Jesus Christ should be brought into the industrial field and that the cardinal principles set forth in the Sermon on the Mount should be injected by the churches into industrial relations."

Applying Religion to Life

While the Commission of Inquiry and its staff are open to criticism, as they expected to be, and while their report is open to challenge, as it should be, yet obviously prejudiced criticisms and attacks, especially such as were ventured before the evidence could have been seen, should neither influence public opinion nor disturb the peace of the churches.

The right and freedom not only, but the obligation of the churches in loyalty to their mission, to apply religion to living and working conditions cannot be questioned at least within their fellowship. Not to do so would be disloyal to the divine commission of the Church and would leave it without any real gospel applicable to an industrial age. If religion reveals the "way of life," the Church must strive to have the way of making a living consistent with and not subversive of the ideals and standards of the religious life.

In the exercise of spiritual freedom and duty, the Commission of Inquiry felt constrained to go beyond the statement of the facts as to conditions and relations alleged to exist in the steel industry, which was the first concern of the report, and include "expressions of moral judgment," which constitute its concluding section under the title, "Christian Findings." It is a fair point of criticism to raise, however, whether the report might not have been more reliant upon the statement of the facts found and less opinionated in passing judgment upon them, however consistent the judgment might be with the facts as stated. Perhaps the public might have been more quickly and fully prepared to judge if the facts had been left to carry their own conviction, free from any suspicion of being so stated or so followed up by conclusions as to give the impression of making out a case for or against either party at issue.

Where Public Opinion Will Support the Report

Any candid survey of the conditions and relations in the steel industry as portrayed in this report not only, but to be found in plain sight by any observer, justifies public support of these outstanding recommendations concluding the report:

That the Federal government make an exhaustive nation-wide inquiry into the basic conditions in the steel industry, and inaugurate consultation between the Steel Corporation and its employes in order to devise an adequate plan for permanent, free conferences to regulate the conduct of the industry in the future, with the purpose of eliminating the twelve-hour day and the seven-day week and of readjusting the wage rates.

That the federal government make full inquiry into the past and present state of civil liberties in Western Pennsylvania and institute a special investigation of labor detective agencies and of government co-operation with them.

Despite whatever resentment may be expressed against alleged "meddling" in industrial affairs and despite financial losses already suffered or threatened, the Church is sure in the long run to gain far more confidence and support than it may now lose by fearlessly taking an outspoken stand against industrial policies clearly inimical to public welfare and against the tactics of industrial belligerents which violate the law either by violence or by over-riding constitutional rights and civil liberties.

Public sentiment has already given evidence of its appreciation for the courage and confidence shown by the Interchurch Movement in undertaking this great adventure of faith in the right of the churches to know and make known living and working conditions and to co-operate with all other loyal, patriotic agencies in making industrial conditions and relations consistent with Christian standards of human life and public welfare.

A Friendly Visitation to the Waldensians of Italy

Their Present Service and Influence

By Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, D.D.

General Secretary Federal Council of Churches

Thousands upon thousands of American tourists, members of our evangelical churches, have year after year visited sunny Italy. They have acquainted themselves with the Vatican, have peered into the garden where the Pope takes his daily walks, have occasionally been received by him, have visited the Roman Catholic churches of Rome both inside the walls and outside the walls, have climbed the Campanile in Florence and counted the statues upon the cathedral at Milan. They have participated in a way in religious services at St. Peter's in Rome and St. Mark's in Venice. They have acquired some information regarding the Roman Church, past and present.

Evangelical Churches Forgotten

Seldom, however, has it occurred to them to take any account of the evangelical churches or to visit the thriving Waldensian communities, situated in one of the most charming sections of the Alps, or to go to church with them on Sunday, although the church may have been only a block away.

Occasionally their guide has pointed out to them a little "Waldensian" church, but very likely neither he nor they knew just what it was. They have been in Turin, on their way through one of the tunnels or over the passes into Switzerland or France, without knowing that within a train ride of an hour and a half the beautiful scenery of the Cottian Alps, together with the historic significance of the Waldensian communities at Pinerola or Terre Pellice were worthy of an extra day or two, or that one of their historic churches might be visited, just around the corner from the station in Turin, while they waited for a train.

It may be worth while, therefore, to make the occasion of a little friendly visitation to these communities, the opportunity to remind our people of the historic significance and the present service and influence of these churches in their nation and their importance to the Christian world at large.

Waldensian History

The Waldensians are the spiritual brothers of the Huguenots of France and the Pilgrims of New England. Their story is much the same as that of the Huguenots. They have a certain advantage, however, for the Waldensian Church is by far the oldest evangelical church in Christendom. They were reformers long before the Reformation.

Rev. Ernesto Giampiccoli

Their origin is traced back as far as the ninth century when they began their stern resistance against the practices of Rome, until, in 1192, Peter Waldo of Lyons escaped across the Alps and started a revival among them in which two by two they went through Italy and even as far afield as Bohemia. When the Reformation began in Germany and France they sent their messengers to these countries and on their return called a synod which voted to co-operate in the Reformation.

In the Waldensian Museum at Torre Pellice is exhibited a copy of the first Bible ever printed in French which was published by the Waldenses of Italy.

These churches and people have passed through thirty-five bloody persecutions, more than once the edict has gone forth that they should be stamped out from Italy, followed by the triumphant statement that they had been extinguished. They have been sent into exile in Switzerland but have more than once climbed back over the mountains again into their old homes. Their struggle for religious liberty is a thrilling story covering many centuries, for they did not succeed in gaining freedom of worship until the year of our Lord 1848.

In the summer of 1686 these valleys were turned into deserts, the homes and the temples were in ruins, the land was devastated, while thousands upon thousands of the Vaudois filled the prisons or sought safety in Switzerland, France or farther away or were chained to the galleys. One writer triumphantly declared, "It is done, henceforth no more Waldenses. All is over, well over."

But in 1689 we find thousands of them, led by Henri Arnaud, at one and the same time their pastor and their general, returning by that heroic march which received such expressions of admiration from Napoleon the Great himself. It was under these circumstances that the Albigenses, the Poor Men of Lombardy and the Poor Men of Lyons, as they were variously called, finally came together in the one body since known as the Waldenses.

Not only is their story one of persecution but of every other kind of suffering. In 1630 a terrible plague visited their valleys, destroying over 10,000 of their members in one year. It was their story that led the poet Milton to write his famous sonnet:

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints whose bones Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold."

Characteristics of the Waldensians

The Waldensians share with varying emphases the same characteristics as the other reformers, placing a supreme value on the word of God as the rule of faith and life. Their mode of church government is Presbyterian. Like the other groups of men and women who brought about the Reformation, their emphasis on high personal moral ideals was their outstanding characteristic, special stress being laid on truthfulness and the avoidance of oaths. Even their bitter enemies bore witness to their uprightness, chastity and soberness of speech and demeanor. Like the Pilgrims of New England they planted their schools beside their churches.

Present Strength of Waldensian Churches

Over against the millions in Italy who are claimed by the Roman Church they would seem insignificant if simply counted by numbers. In making the comparison, however, we must take into account the respective ethical standards of the two groups. The Waldensian peoples and communities must be weighed rather than counted.

There are about 30,000 people in their valley communities and perhaps something near the same number in the rest of Italy. They have been colonizers and have at the present time 3,000 adherents in Marseilles, 7,000 in Uruguay, 3,000 in the Argentine Republic, 2,000 at Valdese, N. C., 1,000 at Monett, Mo., and 1,000 in New York.

Torre Pellice is the headquarters of the mother church. There they have a high school of the highest grade, with 175 students studying for their diploma of admittance to the university. They have a normal school of sixty young women. In these valleys are about 300 secondary schools and a number of others in various sections of Italy, including Palermo and Salerno.

Their churches are well established in all the big cities of Italy—Turin, Genoa, Milan, Verona, Venice, Leghorn, Pisa, Florence, Naples and Rome. They have a well-equipped school of theology in Florence and have developed hospitals and institutions for the care of children and aged people, which are of a high order.

Interviews which I held with men associated with the Italian Government brought out warm recognition of the appreciation of Waldensian character and personalities. They stand out distinctly in the public eye as good citizens. Two members of the present Senate and one member of the Lower House are Waldensian and from time to time the Cabinet contains one of their representatives, as at present.

A recent American investigator for our government Department of Education bore special witness to their school at Torre Pellice as being of the highest order of any in Italy.

They form at the present moment an important link between France and Italy. In their valleys they speak either French or Italian with apparently equal readiness, and while they are loyal subjects of Italy, they have many French characteristics.

A Visit to Torre Pellice

Surely it would be worth while for any visitor to take a day for Torre Pellice. There is, first of all, the scenery of these beautiful valleys. Monte Viso is only a few feet lower than Mont Blanc. The museum at Torre Pellice ought certainly to be as interesting for the evangelical church member as the Vatican museum at Rome. The climb up the little hill at Bobbio Pellice to the martyrs' monument is as repaying as the climbing of the steps to St. Peter's dome or the ascent of Salvatore.

Their Spirit Today

At a recent international gathering of Christians where it was proposed that fellowship should be withheld from German churches, pending their repentance, it was the moderator of the Waldensian Synod who counseled consideration and patience, and he himself had lost a son in the war.

Despite their history of persecution which comes down nearly to our own day, they are strangely irenic in their attitude toward the Roman Church, too much so in the judgment of some Italian Methodists. These words of one of their pastors express their sentiment: "Let us not cherish evil feelings toward Roman Catholics, let us simply teach them those truths of the gospel which the Waldenses sacrificed so much to maintain."

Future of the Waldensians

Is it for nothing that God has enabled these men and women to withstand the persecutions and the legionaries and the oppressive laws of fifty popes, one hundred princes, one hundred and fifty writers, two hundred prelates and priests, two hundred and fifty statesmen and army generals and armies without count?

They are strategically situated. The 2,800 of them in Turin are an influence in wise and progressive democracy in that turbulent city. Their valleys send out men and women into other sections of Italy who touch at vital points the civic and political life of the nation. One of their leaders in Rome said to me proudly: "Let me remind you that two nations still refuse to send their ambassadors to recognize the temporal power of the Vatican; the United States and Italy."

Their moral influence during the war was noted throughout the nation, in the quality of the officers (including chaplains) and the men they sent to the army. There is an ineffaceable distinctness about them. In the recent Geneva Conference on Life and Work, their Moderator, Rev. Ernesto Giampiccoli was a marked personality that could not be hidden despite his modesty and reserve. Their distinctive personal influence is something one can both see and feel in Italy.

Some Practical Considerations

Are our American churches going to adopt the slogan, "America First," which generally means also America last as well?

Up to this time with slight exception they have confined their tributes of what they owe these spiritual fathers and brothers, to occasional sentimental encomiums.

I should like to make a few practical suggestions.

First of all, that our tourists and especially our preachers, when they go to Italy get a copy of the "Guide to the Waldensian Valleys" and go to Torre Pellice even if a day has to be taken from the round of churches in Rome.

That our churches and mission boards consider the question of doing some of their mission work through appropriations to this distinctively missionary church, to help them fulfill their motto, Lux lucet in tenebris.

I have made many pilgrimages among the churches of the old world that are the spiritual brothers of our own Pilgrims and this summer as I looked up to those rough terraces, to which old but sturdy Pastor Tron and young and hearty Chaplain Bertalot climb their rugged way through the Alpine snows of nine long months a year, and witnessed the unquenchable faith of these men and women, and thought of their lira by contrast with our dollar and looked into their hopeful faces as they stretched out their hands for moral help from across the sea and hung upon every word of encouragement from the speaker's lips in the crowded church at Torre Pellice, I hoped that the churches of America would not join too heartily in the now popular cry, "America First."

And, question it as you may, I am going to propose "still another" department of the Federal Council to call for consecrated dollars.

Great Days at Old Plymouth

By Newton M. Hall

I want to tell the readers of The Congregationalist of the wonderful reception which the delegates and visitors from the United States have had at Plymouth. When we came to Plymouth we expected to witness a celebration largely civic and formal in its nature. Instead we have been almost overwhelmed by a hospitality so personal and intimate and cordial that we can never adequately express our gratitude and our appreciation. One of the great meetings of the series was at the Barbican on Sunday morning at the spot from which the Pilgrims took their departure. Dr. Cadman gave a very eloquent address before a thousand people, gathered on the quay at the early hour of nine o'clock. We were delighted to hear sung in splendid fashion by the great audience the noble hymn written by Dr. Allen Eastman Cross, "More light shall break from out thy word."

We have been given luncheons, garden parties, a ride over the Dartmoor moors; all sorts of gracious and beautiful hospitality. Plymouth's one regret is that so few Americans have been present to enjoy this hospitality. Only about 200 have been in attendance, while the great heart of Plymouth hoped for ten thousand! Among those who have taken part in the celebration have been Dr. Cadman, Dr. Boynton, Dr. Gulick, Bishop Brewster of Connecticut, Bishop Lines of Newark, President Hough of Northwestern University, Dr. Griffis and myself.

The keynote of the whole celebration has been friendship for America; very nobly expressed time and again by a very noble figure, the Mayor of Plymouth, and not by him only but by the Lord Chief Justice of England and many other distinguished persons. Lady Astor, who is the idol of Plymouth, has been the life of the celebration. I wish that many Americans and especially our own Congregationalists might write to the Mayor of Plymouth thanking him for his courtesy to the Americans, and expressing regret that so few could be present. I hope very much that he may be invited to attend our own Plymouth celebrations as the guest of the State of Massachusetts and Massachusetts Congregationalists. Other celebrations are to follow and the whole series is being made the occasion of a very significant demonstration in favor of America.

THE UNION

By ABBIE FARWELL BROWN

Lovely is this, the Land of our abiding,
From shore to shore across the leagues of freedom,
From North to South in merciful abundance;
Land of our heart, America!

The little school, the farmstead and the chapel,
Type of the treasure that our fathers cherished,
Followed the feet that tramped beyond the mountains,
Making thy ways, America.

Out of the East came men in mighty millions,
Into the savage corners of the country,
Scattering wide the seed of old tradition,
Germ of thy power, America.

From deep to deep, from gulf to frozen forest,
The mountain and the plain have known their courage,
The harbor and the town have seen their wisdom,
Quickening thee, America.

They chained the Titan, steam, to be their servant;
They made the thunderbolt to do their bidding,
And gave thee light to be thy living halo,
Glorious one, America.

The old world turned to thee in time of trouble,
The people held their empty hands for succor;
Thy bread and wine of love went forth to feed them,
Strength of thy strength, America.

Thy liberty became the hope of nations;
To victory thy banner crossed the ocean,
Borne by the gallant sons of Pilgrim honor,
Shouting thy name—"America!"

Yet are we humble, mindful of the fathers.
Not unto us but unto God the glory,
Who gave them grace and made us to inherit
Their sacred trust; America!

A Modern City's Jericho Road

Who Is My Neighbor?

By Lawrence R. Howard

It was late in his holidays by the seashore that a Boston business man, a Mr. Blank, sat by the fire one rainy morning and presently fell into conversation with a stranger who had come the night before to the same almost deserted hotel.

In the course of the conversation the subject of religion was introduced and the business man said, "I don't suppose our minister would say I was very strong on religion, but I certainly believe that the Sermon on the Mount and the Golden Rule and all that are what the world needs today more than anything else."

"I wish you would be a little more explicit as to what you mean by 'and all that,'" the stranger remarked. The Boston business man, being in a serious mood and having been brought up in a Christian home, exclaimed, "Well, I don't know that I could put it any better than Jesus put it when he quoted the ancient law about loving God with all your heart and your neighbor as yourself."

"That's all very well," the other answered, "but I'd like to know who you think my neighbor is and how I can possibly feel the same way toward him and his interests as I do toward myself and my own concerns."

A quizzical look came over the business man's face, for he was not without a sense of humor and a considerable knowledge of human nature. At last, he said, "My friend, I never saw you before nor you me, but here we are at the very heart of one of the biggest problems that ever puzzled the minds of men. It doesn't look as if the rain was going to stop soon, nor as if anyone would be likely to come in and interrupt us, so I'm going to try to tell you a little about my own life and what I really think about this question you have put to me—'Who is my neighbor?'

"In the first place, I live now in an apartment house when I am 'at home,' if you can call it home. I have lived there three years. I have met one or two of the men who go and come through the same outside door every morning and my wife says the lady in the apartment below us is very nice, but I couldn't say that we really know any of our fellow cliff dwellers.

"To be sure, when the rents went up recently one man in our building bestirred himself and tried to call a meeting of the tenants. A few of them actually got together and drew up a protest which they then sent around through the building for signatures. They succeeded in reaching about two-thirds of the whole number, handed it to the landlord and secured a small reduction, but with that little flurry of common interest the neighborliness in my immediate neighborhood ceased."

When Mr. Blank began to speak of apartment-house life he was interested to note the face of the stranger. Though the most casual acquaintance, he already felt that he had come to know him, in these few moments before the open fire, better than he knew all the men living under the same roof with him "at home." The newcomer had heard many experiences of flat-dwellers before. He had heard some of them rejoice over the fact that they had no responsibilities now that they lived in an apartment house. They could come and go when they wanted to and stay as long as they pleased anywhere. No fires to attend to, no garden, no grass to cut—nothing, hardly, but a place to sleep, this was the human dwelling place provided for them. He thought he understood a little why Mr. Blank had started in to speak of the difficulties in the way of helpful neighborliness for people who live in an apartment-house neighborhood in an apartment-house age.

Mr. Blank went on, however, with the remark, "I see you know something of what I mean. Hundreds, or I suppose really thousands of the people around me are more like transients in a city hotel than like civilized Christian people. They have no neighborhood ties. They have largely gotten out of the way of churchgoing, moving as they are so likely to do from place to place. They have had no time, they say, to learn about the various community interests very much, except such as serve their own personal comfort. They hardly care to be visited, many of them, because for one thing they don't care to stay at home.

"But I must leave the rest of that situation to your imagination and turn to the business side of my life. There, I confess, I do have some chance to know people better. There are one or two in my office and one or two with whom I meet for lunch and talk over business affairs and a few men who go to the same club, all of whom I think of as my friends. What they know about me apart from my business is not very much, I am sure, and I always think of their main interests as being somewhere else. But after all, where is the main interest of the average modern business man, especially if his "home" is in an apartment house? In very many cases the main interests of men like myself are in their business and nowhere else.

"Even so, it might be all right if one could be altogether human and neighborly in his business relations, but it's sometimes mighty hard to realize that ideal. Lots of men do not have even the chance I have for congenial business acquaintance, but are obliged to go through a tiresome routine every day with almost no escape. There is often a feeling, too, as you know, that a man must be on his guard somewhat among business acquaintances.

"Then there is another side to my own affairs," said Mr. Blank, "that I've been thinking of a good deal lately. As it happens, I am concerned with the financial end of certain cotton manufacturing interests. We have mighty fine offices in Boston, which I'd be glad to have you come in and see some day by the way, but of course the biggest part of the business, if you are considering the human beings concerned, is in the factories down Fall River way. They have been having some trouble in the factories lately with the help—'a lot of foreigners,' is the way I've usually thought of them—but the other day I happened to go through one of our plants with the superintendent and do you know the thought that came into my head? I was on one of the exemption boards during the war and though I had a great variety of experiences I got the impression that the average run of our young American fellows was remarkably good material, no matter how un-American the names they carried might sound to my ears.

"Well, when I went through that factory the thought I had was that these girls were the sisters and wives of the Americans who went out to fight for democracy. Here I have been working along this same line of business for twenty-odd years and I suppose I never before stopped to think that our factory hands are my neighbors in the good old United States of America. They are the stuff that fought against Prussianism and they are the same stuff from which must be built the co-operative commonwealth of the future.

"But you'll be getting tired of all this, I'm afraid. You asked me who is my neighbor and I've just begun to suggest to you a little of the difficulty of being really neighborly in these days. Of course I could go on to tell you about serving in the Red Cross drives during the war and about help for the Belgian Relief and Near East Relief and French Orphan Relief which I have tried to give according to my ability. These suggest no end of directions in which one can look today and see men who have fallen among thieves and to whom he owes all neighborly service he can give.

"Yet, do you know, I think sometimes that the way to be neighborly in a Christian sense today begins right where you are. The whole world is a sort of Jericho Road and no man goes down to his business in the morning without having his chance to pass by on the other side some human being in need, need of body, mind or soul. At any rate, no man or woman goes on living week in and week out in any neighborhood of human beings where there is not constant need of sympathy and thoughtfulness, of deliberate Christian courtesy and kindness.

"When you ask then, who is my neighbor? I feel as if I must answer, he is the starving child in Austria or Armenia, of course, or the homeless orphan in Italy made destitute by earthquake and fire. My neighbor is the needy sufferer in far-off lands without a doubt, but much more insistently I contend that the claims of neighborliness come upon me from those whose employment brings me daily bread and those also whose human dwellings are round about my own, and it is no easy thing always to be a true neighbor toward them.

"Who is my neighbor? And how can I care for him as I do for myself, you say? If one takes the ancient priest and Levite for his pattern there is not much to answer, but if a man really admires the good Samaritan he hardly needs the reminder that his neighbor is probably right there across the road. He may be down the street a way or around the corner, but he is not far away. The only thing is that a man must keep his eyes wide open to see the neighbors near and to realize where what he has may be the thing they need.

"In a word, this is the conclusion I am coming to. Any man to be a true neighbor must be ready to put himself out. He must gladly go out of his way to discover and to serve the need of others."

Mr. Blank had plainly become much absorbed in his subject and had been speaking earnestly for several minutes. Now he stopped abruptly, flushed slightly, and exclaimed, "I beg your pardon, I had no intention of preaching a sermon."

"That's all right," replied his companion, "you could not possibly have spoken in a way that would interest me more or give me more encouragement. As it happens, I myself have been studying this very problem; especially since the war the tragic need of overcoming all the separating and divisive influences among us has been borne in on my mind. We've got to find ways of rousing folks more generally to a sense of their common heritage which they never can enjoy adequately as long as they continue aliens one to the other."

"Well," answered Mr. Blank, "I'd like to turn the tables on you a little and ask you what you are going to do about it? How can we help make a better atmosphere? How can we get more community feeling? How can we get ordinary business men like myself to think more sympathetically of the great public of shop and factory, and vice versa?"

It was now the turn of the listener up to this point to hold up his hands in dismay at the idea of answering so big a question satisfactorily. He said, "I can't take time to answer the whole question, but I'd like to tell you an experiment that is being made in the church that I belong to, as one little contribution to the problem. Out of about four hundred families in our neighborhood one hundred people have been selected to visit the rest. They have gone out, two friends together in each case, to call on eight or ten other families on Sunday afternoon. They aim to express the spirit of friendly interest and to keep up through the year a certain contact with their families and with newcomers in the same vicinity.

"Although this may seem like propaganda for a special church, the idea back of it is the promoting of a friendly acquaintance on a distinctly Christian basis. I believe that if all churches would do the same sort of thing it would be a big boost toward the neighborliness you say we need."

"I agree with you," said Mr. Blank, "and if men through all the churches got to making such efforts to know their home neighborhood there is every reason to think it will help them to a more neighborly feeling in their business contacts also."

By this time the two conversationalists by the hotel fire had reached a point where personal introductions seemed necessary. It was interesting to discover that they were both men of official position in the churches where they lived and that although their residences were not three miles apart, neither of them had seen or heard of the other before.

How Wonderful!

By Charles B. McDuffee

How wonderful! that for each eye to see,
God made the world; and for the ear's delight,
Such wild and rich and varied melody.
To lack the eye 's to lose the world of sight—
The restless sea, the hills, the wooded dells.
Who lacks the ear, in endless silence dwells
With music all around. World infinite
Is his alone, whose soul knows God and right.

OUR PILGRIM PULPIT

Anchors for the Storm

By Rev. James Gordon Gilkey

South Church, Springfield, Mass.

Acts 27:29: "Fearing lest we should be cast on rocky ground, the sailors threw out four anchors from the stern and prayed for the dawn."

This incident in Paul's voyage suggests an experience through which many of us have to pass. The storms of life sweep down upon us and an hour comes when we have to cling to a few trusted anchors and try as best we can to ride out the gale. This is the situation confronting many of our young people in their religious lives. They entered college with a definite set of religious beliefs—the beliefs they had inherited from an older generation. But college has hardly begun before they find themselves caught in a storm of growth and change and uncertainty. They find it impossible to keep their earlier faith in the Bible when their college text-books give them such a new story of the universe. A dozen new questions about Christ press in upon their growing minds. The glimpse of the inequalities of life on every side raises the insistent question whether there be a God of love and justice in control of things.

In such hours of uncertainty and darkness are there any anchors to which these baffled students can cling? Here, surely, is one conviction that will keep them off the rocks. We know that there is a difference between right and wrong; that all of us recognize that difference; and that we can do right if we want to. Let a young man cling to that anchor, and he will not make shipwreck of his life. We know too that the durable satisfactions of life come to those who think of others first, and make the rule of self-forgetful service the dominating principle of their days. There is a conviction that is unshaken by all the speculative problems of theology. Let a young man cling to that anchor, and his life will not be wrecked. We know, too, that Jesus Christ is the world's finest ideal for a human life. There is an anchor that will hold us safe through the storm.

Older people, too, know what it is to find the storms of life sweeping down upon them and driving them into dark, unknown waters. Tragic deaths rob us of faith in the immortal life; the baffling contradictions of life sweep us away from the old conviction that God does have a plan for each one of us; the failure of love leaves us adrift in a strange sea of darkness and uncertainty. In such hours of crisis, how men and women cling to the experience of Jesus Christ! He too tasted death—but out of death came the glory of Easter. Jesus' experience gives us faith that our lives too will last on.

Jesus knew what it meant to see God's guidance apparently break down on Calvary—but the cross proved ultimately to be the symbol of victory rather than defeat. Jesus' experience gives us courage to believe that God can be trusted to guide us through life and out into death. Jesus had to watch the failure of love—but in the end the generations began to gather about the cross on Calvary. Jesus' experience gives us faith that we too can trust love and forgiveness and generosity to win their ultimate victory. It is the fact that the world clings in this way to the experience of Jesus that gives us faith in the permanence of the church. Our modern theology will soon be superseded and a day may well come when secular philanthropies will take over the social service activities of the church. But the church will live on, for storm-tossed hearts are ever turning to the experience of Jesus as their anchor in the storm. As long as the church holds the figure of Christ before the world, the church will endure.

The British Mayflower Celebrations

Many Interesting Observances

By Our London Correspondent

The British—perhaps I ought to say the European—celebrations of the Tercentenary of the sailing of the Pilgrim Fathers have been proceeding over the past fortnight, culminating in a great demonstration in the Albert Hall in London on Thursday night. I wish I could report that the commemoration had really stirred the deep waters of our national life, but the truth would not be in such a statement. The wave of acute industrial unrest, threatening us with a stupendous coal strike, which is sweeping over England is distinctly inimical to the celebration of an historic event, however momentous, of three hundred years ago. We have had our fill of history, English people seem to be thinking; just now it is the future we are most concerned with. In some measure, too, the Tercentenary celebrations have suffered from want of co-ordination between the various bodies promoting them.

If the government could have directly intervened and given the proceedings some official éclat the impression made might have been much greater than has been achieved. The English-Speaking Union, the Anglo-American Society, the National Free Church Council and the Congregational Union have all had a finger in the pie and the truth of the old saying that too many cooks spoil the broth has had one more exemplification. Then, necessarily, the celebrations have been scattered over Leyden, Southampton, Plymouth and London, while other minor commemorations have taken place at spots intimately associated with individual members of the original Pilgrim group.

Southampton led the way with its celebrations. They were on a modest scale and the selection, as chief speaker, of Lord Birkenhead, our Lord Chancellor, whom (though he was once a Nonconformist), we do not instinctively associate with Pilgrim or Puritan ideals, was rather ludicrous. Lord Reading's appearance as an outstanding speaker at Plymouth met with similar criticisms, as our Lord Chief Justice is a Jew and only a few months ago he confessed that he thought George Washington went to America with the Pilgrim Fathers in the Mayflower. He was better briefed in Pilgrim history from his Plymouth speech, but his most notable point was a deft compliment to Lady Astor, M. P., as another Mayflower, who after 300 years had been returned to Plymouth to grace the House of Commons as its first woman member. Lady Astor took a prominent part in the celebrations at Plymouth, and (as she always does) charmed all present by her tact, humor and evident joy in the whole proceeding.

Both at Leyden and at Plymouth a thoroughly international flavor was given to the celebrations by the presence of a large company of Americans. From the historical researches, encouraged by the Tercentenary, John Robinson's character and influence emerges with new radiance, and I do not think it is invidious to say that the best book among all the new literature on the Pilgrims is the scholarly monograph on Robinson written by Rev. W. H. Burgess, the erudite Unitarian minister at Plymouth. A Dutch historical scholar, Dr. Plooij, has just unearthed some overlooked Pilgrim documents which also add luster to Robinson, whose inspirational influence on the Pilgrims, and consequently upon the early history of New England, is now seen to have been phenomenal.

The Plymouth Celebration

The presence of the Burgomaster of Leyden and Dr. Plooij, along with many Americans, gave the Plymouth celebrations a "Triple Alliance" quality. Plymouth rose to the occasion and all the citizens entered con amore into the commemoration. Possibly the original Pilgrims, could they have seen how the 300th anniversary of their departure from Plymouth would have been celebrated, would have slept uneasily in their graves. For the secular aspect did dominate the religious commemorations: and the theaters and music halls "made hay while the sun shone" by "gala" performances in honor of the Pilgrims.

A children's cantata, "The Ship of Adventure," and an elaborate pageant, made effective appeals to ear and eye. In Rev. J. Gay, a London Baptist minister, a perfectly ideal William Brewster was discovered. This pageant is now touring England and is shortly to be staged in London. But the outstanding features at Plymouth were a great religious commemoration service on the Barbican and a joint religious meeting in the Guildhall. The latter was, indeed, a very striking demonstration of church unity, for among the speakers were the Bishop of Exeter (Dr. Gascoyne Cecil—son of the late Lord Salisbury), Dr. Scott Lidgett (an eminent Wesleyan Methodist), Rev. A. A. Green (representing the English Chief Rabbi), and Dr. Lynn Harold Hoyt (ex-President of Northwestern University at Chicago), with the Mayor of Plymouth presiding.

The Barbican Quay service drew 5,000 people to the spot from which the Pilgrims made their last embarkation. This commemoration, which was in the hands of the Congregational Union, was conducted by Rev. E. C. Powell, M. A. (Moderator of the Western Province). Two addresses worthy of the great occasion were delivered, the first by Rev. Arthur Pringle of Purley, one of our most robust preachers, held the gathering in close attention by its application of Pilgrim principles to modern life. Dr. Parkes Cadman, the second speaker, swayed his hearers by his sonorous eloquence, his comprehensive sweep and his fervent expression of Anglo-American sentiment. To an English Bishop who had churlishly wished that Plymouth Rock had landed on the Pilgrims, Dr. Cadman thundered the crushing retort that that was just what every American saloon-keeper and every profiteer from people's misery had wished.

Most of the credit for the success attending the Mayflower celebrations in both Holland and England is due to Dr. Rendel Harris, an English Quaker whose general knowledge of Pilgrim history is perhaps unrivaled. Dr. Harris is a scholar with infectious enthusiasms and in connection with the Tercentenary he has worked with unceasing energy and quenchless zeal. Among other achievements he has discovered—or thinks he has discovered—the actual timbers of the Mayflower in the roof of an old barn at Jordan's in Buckinghamshire. This, many think, rests on a sequence of clues that might have been borrowed from a Sherlock Holmes detective story, has fascinated many acute minds and has gained sufficient credence perhaps to add Jordan's to the spots that Americans visiting England will want to include in their schedule. Other historical investigators have been at work on the Mayflower's history and one of them has advanced the sinister theory that before she carried the Pilgrims from Plymouth to New England the Mayflower did some piracy on the high seas. But what matters that? Her 1620 voyage would redeem the most unworthy past!

The London Mayflower celebrations began with a surprise—a Sunday afternoon service in Westminster Abbey "where the stately tradition of English Churchmanship continues." The Pilgrim Fathers typified a stern and sturdy opposition to the Established Church—as Canon Barnes, who preached, pointed out; and this fact lent added significance to the Abbey commemoration. Canon Barnes himself interpreted the service as emphasizing a conviction that 17th century religious intolerance was wrong. The Mayflower Day gatherings on Thursday, Sept. 16, were rather damped by inclement weather. Three meetings were held. The religious aspect of the Pilgrim movement was commemorated at a prayer meeting at the Memorial Hall when Rev. Sidney Berry of Birmingham and Dr. J. H. Shakespeare spoke. Later Dr. Jowett addressed a Mansion House meeting designed to emphasize the civic aspects of the Pilgrim tradition.

The culminating gathering was a demonstration filling the Albert House (which seats 10,000 people). It was expected that Mr. Lloyd George would take the chair at this meeting, but the Premier sent one of his junior ministers, Mr. McCurdy, as a substitute. Dr. Parkes Cadman and Dr. J. D. Jones were the speakers. The absence of the Prime Minister necessarily robbed the demonstration of some of its authority: but the size and enthusiasm of the assembly and its quick responsiveness to the excellent speeches made the occasion memorable. An Evening with Richard Roberts

It is very refreshing for a fellow minister to drop in on another and see him do his turn, especially when that brother brings in such fine grapes of Eshcol. This was my experience recently when I dropped in at the Thursday eve- of midweek lectures on Jesus of Yesterday and ning service at the Church of the Pilgrims. where Rev. Richard Roberts is giving a series Today. Extreme simplicity marks the services of the hour, and an atmosphere of natural reverence. The speaker takes up for the evening the principle enunciated by Jesus in his attitude toward the institution of the Sabbath, and asserts that Jesus was pleading for life as over against institutionalism. Transferring the thought to the situation of today, he held that our age is economic, and that the plea of Jesus is for life as against the economic system of the day. Here the speaker showed great breadth and sanity, avoiding Scylla and Charybdis. While contending that there was a point beyond which the laborer could not shorten his hour even for his own benefit, he felt that behind the restlessness of the laborer there was a vague cry for an opportunity for larger life. Unconsciously the speaker would break out into epigrams such as these: "Money is minted life," "The body is the symbol of the soul," and "The sacrament of nature of which the communion is a symbol." He intimated that best vision of God we shall behold is in the eyes of our fellow men. It is gratifying to know that these talks will be printed; but those who will read these crystalline utterances will miss the warmth and charm of the speaker's personality. It would be hard to find a place to spend a better Thursday evening when in the Metropolis than in the presence of this young Englishman, who, though in different sort and manner, wears worthily the mantle of the great Storrs. The great cathedral-like structure is just two minutes from Burrough Hall, the heart of Brooklyn.

A Memorial for Dr. Herring

A Generous Fund to Be Raised

The Executive Committee of the National Council, the Trustees of the Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers and the Directors of the Board of Ministerial Relief, unite in proposing to the Congregational Churches and Ministers the Constitution of a Memorial Fund in honor of Dr. Hubert C. Herring, Secretary of the National Council, to bear testimony through all time to the place he held in the affection of our churches and to his leadership in elevating the standard of the ministry and in promoting its effectiveness. Gifts may be made for this purpose with the understanding:

1. THAT this Memorial Fund shall be known as "The Herring Memorial Fund."

2. THAT it shall be held in trust by the Corporation for the National Council to be invested and reinvested by said Corporation.

3. THAT the net income thereof, as determined by said corporation, shall be paid semi-annually to the Trustees of the Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers.

4. THAT during the life of Mrs. Hubert C. Herring this income shall be paid over to Mrs. Herring, or her representative, for her personal use.

5. THAT after her death the Trustees of The Annuity Fund, in perpetuation of Dr. Herring's devotion to his brethren of the ministry, shall distribute the income, as their judgment shall deem best, to ministers who, in order to secure the benefits of The Annuity Fund, need special assistance in meeting their requisite annual payments. In case any part of the income in any one year is not needed for such purpose it may be used to supplement the income of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund.

The following persons constitute a committee to bring the proposed Memorial Fund to the attention of the churches and ministers:

Rev. Charles S. Mills, General Secretary Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers, Chairman.

Rev. Charles F. Carter, Chairman Executive Committee National Council.

Mr. Lucius R. Eastman, Chairman Executive Committee Pilgrim Memorial Fund Commission.

Rev. Charles E. Burton, General Secretary Congregational Home Missionary Society.

Rev. H. F. Swartz, General Secretary Congregational World Movement.

Lucien C. Warner and Mr. Frederick B. Lovejoy, Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers.

Rev. Oscar E. Maurer and Mr. Wm. Grant Smith, Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief.

Origin and Plan

By Charles S. Mills, D.D.

It occurred to the Executive Committee of the National Council that some such memorial should be undertaken and they appointed a committee to confer with me as representing the Annuity Fund. Before I received a letter from this committee, I had introduced at a meeting of the Trustees of the Annuity Fund, Sept. 21, a proposition for such a memorial with a definite resolution and a call for the appointing of a committee including the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Council, the General Secretary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society and the General Secretary of the Congregational World Movement with five others representing the Annuity and Ministerial Relief Boards. It was thus a practically simultaneous action on the part of the Executive Committee of the National Council and our Boards. Wherever the proposition has been mentioned it has met instant and hearty response.

We already have more than $3,000 in subscriptions, ranging from $5 to $1,000. It is hoped that the Fund will attract a goodly number of large gifts, but also that it will have special favor with all our ministers and that not less than a thousand of them will contribute in honor of their friend, Dr. Herring, in sums from $1 to $100.

Subscriptions are all payable on or before April 1. As much as possible is desired in cash but option is given payments—Jan. 1, 1921 and April 1, 1921.

Subscriptions may be sent to me as the Chairman of the Committee at 375 Lexington Avenue, New York City, or to The Congregationalist, checks to be made payable to the Herring Memorial Fund. Great care should be taken that each subscriber sending in payment should make the object of his subscription perfectly definite.

A Minute on Dr. Herring

The Board of Directors of the Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief herewith put on record their profound sense of their unspeakable loss in the death of Dr. Hubert C. Herring, Secretary of the National Council and a member of this Board of Directors for seven years.

All who had occasion to know with intimacy the processes of his thinking recognize that among his deepest convictions was that of the dignity and opportunity of the Christian ministry, the service to which he had so totally dedicated his own splendid powers. His sense of fellowship with his brethren of the ministry was the very atmosphere of his life. He shared with them in all their aspirations and he was bowed with them under their heavy burdens. He constantly sought for them that larger freedom from financial distress which limits their service and makes their age so often tragic in its need.

We bear testimony to the tenderness of his solicitude, to the largeness of his hope and purpose for them, and to the great contribution which his comprehensive mind and his sympathetic soul made in working out, through this Board of Ministerial Relief, the plan for the Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers and its development into larger proportions through the Pilgrim Memorial Fund.

His life is wrought into the very fabric of these plans and generations of ministers will owe to him an incalculable debt. We who were his associates in these labors bear testimony to our admiration of the sweep of his vision, the glory of his ideals, the completeness of his consecration, the brotherliness of his soul. He won and kept our highest regard and our warmest personal affection.

Plans Notable Meeting

With unusual anticipations the officers and workers of the Woman's Board of Missions are planning for the fifty-third annual meeting, which is to be held this year at Montclair, N. J., in First Church. The meeting opens at 10 o'clock on the morning of Nov. 10 and closes at noon Nov. 12. It is an anniversary year for the entertaining Branch which was formed just fifty years ago in Philadelphia.

The program is a varied one, for it includes addresses from well-known men, from sympathetic travelers in mission lands, from experts in religious education, as well as from officers of the Board. Missionaries, with their first-hand stories of conditions in the world of to-day, are always eagerly heard and they will be present in goodly numbers. Among those scheduled to speak are Mrs. Murray S. Frame, Miss Carolyn T. Sewall and Miss Stella Cook of China; Mrs. Theodore S. Lee, Miss Pauline Jeffery and Miss Mary T. Noyes of India; Miss Ellen M. Blakely of Marash, Turkey; Miss Minnie K. Hastings, Uduvil, Ceylon; Dr. Frank C. Laubach, Philippine Islands, and Rev. J. C. Holmes, Japan. No less than four of the speakers have returned within a few months from extensive trips in the Orient. Three of these are women: Miss Helen B. Calder, Home Secretary of the Board, Mrs. Robert A. Woods, whose name is associated with the well-known social settlement in Boston, known as the South End House, of which her husband is head, and Mrs. R. M. Woods, President of Hampshire County Branch, who has spent a year with members of her family in India. Dr. C. H. Patton, who has also recently returned from Asia, is to be the representative of the American Board.

A distinguished visitor in the person of a college president, just arrived in the United States, is Miss Eleanor McDougall, President of the Madras Christian College, India, one of the big union enterprises financed by Woman's Boards of England and America. Those who met her when she was in this country on her way to India to take up this important work will be eager to hear her while she is on her first furlough.

Other features of the meeting worth calling attention to are the evening reception which affords an opportunity to meet missionaries and other guests in a social way, an evening mass meeting which it is hoped that men as well as women will attend, a girls' supper and rally and a Commission Service for a young missionary soon to go out.

Charles M. Alexander

An Appreciation

By W. R. Moody

It was in 1893, during the World's Fair, that it was my privilege first to know Charles M. Alexander. At that time he was in Chicago preparing himself for Christian service. I saw comparatively little of him and yet the charm of his personality even then made its impress upon me.

It must have been ten years later that I again met Mr. Alexander on his return from Australia with Dr. Torrey, whom he accompanied in an evangelistic tour around the world. From that time our friendship has continued, and I came to have an increasing appreciation, not only of his rare gift as a leader of music, but admiration for his tact and unflagging zeal in the cause of personal evangelism.

I have known him both when engaged in evangelistic work, and when he has been conducting the music in Christian conferences. I have also known him in the hours of recreation and he is among the few men who was never "off duty." He was always looking for opportunities to speak with men and women and especially with young people, about the claims of Christ and the joy of his service.

There was a peculiar winsomeness in his personality, and generosity which was almost prodigal, impelling him to give, in every direction, to those whom he felt were in need.

He had a keen sense of humor which contributed not a little to his buoyancy of spirit, and a rare gift in narrating stories. This made his companionship a rare privilege.

I know of few men who have to such a degree exemplified the admonition of St. Paul in his letters to the Philippians to "rejoice in the Lord alway." The charm of his personality was felt in his public service and won for him the sympathy of an audience which accounted in a large way for his success in leadership in music. With a persuasive and genial appeal he broke every barrier of prejudice and even hostility and impelled an audience to sing with him.

Mr. Alexander was easily the foremost leader of evangelistic music that I have known, but with peculiar gifts in this direction he combined many other qualities of leadership, and there was a charm about the man's character that compelled men of widely divergent temperaments and traditions, as well as religious convictions, to be won by him even when not in accord with his convictions. I have often marveled at the way he broke through all barriers of prejudice and tradition, and established points of contact with so widely divergent people, seemingly always with mutual esteem and confidence.

Were I to sum up in a word that which distinguished Charles M. Alexander it would be in his capacity for loving men. Doubtless this was to an extent natural. But this could not account wholly for his loving all mankind—the unlovely as well as those with whom he had common interests. His great capacity for loving men came from his love for Christ. Because he loved his master he loved his fellow men and the passion of his life was to make him known to every one whose path he crossed in life's journey.

As I write these lines there lies before me a little pocket Bible upon the fly leaf of which is inscribed my name and beneath it the name of Charles M. Alexander and the familiar reference, II Timothy 2:15 ("Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth"), and these words, "A remembrance of happy days together, Northfield, 1916." It was a token of friendship given at the close of the General Conference of Christian Workers and the twofold sentiment reveals the spirit of my friend. In every effort to serve as a faithful workman he found the truest happiness and sweetest fellowship. Surely to such a soul there will be no strangeness in heaven.

With the Schools and Colleges

A New Year at Yale

Whatever the facts in regard to the number of young men who today are entering the ministry, there is no dearth of candidates at Yale. Between seventy-five and eighty new students have already enrolled themselves. The graduate class now has thirteen members, the senior thirty-seven, the middle and junior classes each thirty-one. These, with the special students, bring the total up to one hundred and thirty, and this number may be increased by late arrivals; so that the year opens with one of the largest student bodies in the long history of the school.

As usual they come from all parts of our country, from Washington to Maine and from Texas to Minnesota. There are also representatives of Japan, China, Australia, New Zealand, Ceylon, British West Indies, Armenia, England and Wales. Thirteen denominations claim their adherents, notably the Methodist, Disciple, Presbyterian, Congregational and Baptist Churches.

The roll of the faculty has been enlarged also. Professor Walker's appointment to become Provost of the University made it imperative that he should have assistance, and two former Fellows of the school, Mr. Dumas Malone and Mr. Roland H. Bainton, are giving courses in the History Department. Rev. Charles A. Dinsmore, D. D., formerly the pastor of the First Congregational Church of Waterbury, Ct., whose studies in Dante and other writings are so well known, has been added to the staff of lecturers, and is giving two courses, one on the Bible as Literature and one on the Christian Content of Literature. In the Department of Religious Education, Mr. Robert L. Calhoun, who has just returned from Oxford, has begun his work as an instructor. Professor Bacon and Professor Clay are at home after their labors overseas. Professor Bacon gave the Hibbert Lectures last spring in Oxford, receiving the degree of Litt.D. from the university.

The formal opening of the school was held on Monday evening, Oct. 4, in Marquand Chapel. Dean Brown's address on "The Ministry of Repair," was followed by the communion service. The annual outing at the shore came on the following Wednesday. Lectures were omitted and the entire school adjourned to Double Beach, where after some athletic games and a delicious supper under the trees both students and faculty sat around a huge bonfire and listened to a series of informal talks. Such a day does much to introduce the new students, to deepen friendships, to bring the members of the faculty into closer touch with the men in their classes, and often strikes a spiritual note which can be traced throughout the work of the year.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

Socrates said, "A life unexamined, uncriticized, is not worthy of man." If you are willing to attend the church service, you need not lead such a life.

The school has as its guest Sir William M. Ramsay, D. D., LL.D., of Scotland, who is to deliver five public illustrated lectures on "Exploration and Excavation in Asia Minor, with special reference to the Early Spread of Christianity." Other lecturers of eminence will be heard during the year.

This is the tenth year of Dean Brown's service to the school. The period has been a critical one, fraught with unusual dangers and difficulties for the University and for similar institutions of learning. Never were wisdom, strong leadership, and power of personality more sorely needed; never have they been more abundantly supplied. This is not the place to recount Dean Brown's contribution, not only to the Divinity School but to the entire university. Yale owes to him a debt which can never be repaid. Class after class has voted him the most popular and most helpful of the preachers in Battell Chapel. The classes in Edwards Hall are filled to overflowing, and the call has now come to give a course in the English Bible to the undergraduates of the college.

A touching tribute to the scope of his influence recently reached him. From a prison camp in Eastern Siberia came a copy of his "Yale Talks." Inscribed on a fly leaf is the following:

Nikolsk, Ussurisky, East Siberia,
Aug. 12, 1920.

Greetings of the Prisoners of War, Camp Nikolsk:

The following undersigned thank you, Mr. Charles Reynolds Brown, for the fellowship and joy, which we have experienced by the reading and studying of this book. Mr. W. Teeuwissen, our Y. M. C. A. representative, has read it to us at various class hours. And if this copy should come into your possession, may this expression of us stimulate you in your further work. Some of us had been as long as six years in prison, and the thought of Jesus Christ with us and his Spirit working through us has been a fortress for our souls in these awful years of suffering.

The Yale Divinity School has always been blessed in the character and efficiency of the men who have been its leaders and teachers; but under none of them has it been more happy or more prosperous than during the years when its destinies have been entrusted to the splendid leadership of Dean Brown.

Opening of Bible Teachers' Training School

In the opening of the 21st year of the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York, Oct. 1–4, three full days were spent in general exercises with all of the students and faculty in attendance. One object was to get all of the new students acquainted with each of the eighteen members of the faculty. Even more important, however, was to have a fresh study by the whole school of how to get the most out of the year's work. Pres. Wilbert W. White presided at all of the sessions and conducted several periods himself upon the best method of original personal Bible study. The plan has succeeded even beyond the hopes of the faculty.

The proceedings were enriched by three very striking addresses by Rev. Paul Kanamori of Japan, on "Paradise Found," "Paradise Lost," and "Paradise Regained." Mr. Kanamori is one of the earliest converts in Japan and gives a comprehensive view of the entire missionary situation both there and throughout the world. He is to be speaking in many cities of America during the next six or seven months. He is the evangelist of "The Three-hour Sermon," which he always preaches in Japan, outlining the whole system of Christian faith, under the headings—God, Sin and Salvation.

Thirty-four foreign missionaries on furlough are in this year's student body at the Bible school, representing the Philippines, Mexico, Brazil, India, China, Japan and Korea. This makes a total of 586 foreign missionaries on furlough who have come to the school for advanced Bible study in addition to 127 new missionaries who have been trained at the school and entered the work under many different Boards.

Additional Gift to Hartford

In addition to the other benefactions of Mr. Samuel P. Avery which were mentioned in last week's Congregationalist, his will makes a gift to the Hartford Seminary Foundation of $50,000 and a share in the residue of the estate.

Dr. Robert Johnston of Montreal has begun his work in Homiletics at Hartford Seminary and during the first semester will deal with the history and theory of preaching. He has for seventeen years shown power both as preacher and pastor in the large "American Church" in Montreal. He is a graduate of McGill University and of the Presbyterian College, Montreal; for two years he held the chair of Homiletics and Pastoral Care in Knox College, Toronto, has lectured at Northfield and is widely known in this country and Great Britain. He is a man of fine scholarship and attractive personality. In the second semester, Dr. Rockwell Harmon Potter, the able and popular pastor of Center Church, Hartford, will give a course of two hours a week on Homiletic Criticism. Dr. Harris E. Kirk, of Baltimore, will again give his course on special phases of homiletics and Dr. Herman F. Swartz, a graduate of Hartford, comes back to give instruction in Pastoral Care.

A Kansan for the League

Dear Mr. Editor:

I want to indorse the stand of The Congregationalist in favor of the League of Nations and hope that the voters on the staff will vote the same convictions. If for the sake of partisanship we are to lose the opportunity we Christian people have been praying and working for, the situation is indeed pitiable. I have never bolted the national Republican ticket, even in 1912, but this is the time I vote for a Democrat.

That reminds me that my father, J. F. Willard, was a member of the Connecticut Kansas colony, in 1856, and as far as we can learn was the last survivor of the adults. I was therefore much interested in the account of "New England in Kansas," which was the most accurate story I have seen in any magazine. I am one of the seven sons of the Wabaunsee church to enter Christian service and there is a daughter overseas. So you see my interest was very real.

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Principles of Christian Living

International Sunday School Lesson for Nov. 7. Matt. 6:19-34.

We gather the chief lessons of the text today under the following heads:

1. The Treasury. This touches life at a point where we are all sensitive, namely, the physical and material. The desire to accumulate or to lay up things is one that all appreciate. First there is the danger of decay of all human possessions. Remember how soon everything deteriorates in an unused house! There is the constant fretting of the moths and the corrosion of the rust. But the treasures of the kingdom of heaven never suffer in this way. Love and kindness are never destroyed like old woolens and rusting steel. It is the part of wisdom to put the right things in the treasury. Then comes the danger of thieves. Centuries have developed the fine technique of theft until it is deft and silent and dreadful. But no one ever can steal the wealth that love lays up in the treasure house of memory. The recollection of a kindness is imperishable. The heart is where the treasure is.

2. The Single Purpose. The second principle gathers around the purposes from which we act. They are of supreme importance. We studied them on Oct. 4. Here Jesus stresses the fact that they ought not to be too many or conflicting. They must be single and clear. There are two illustrations. The first is the dimmed eye. It is well called the "lamp" of the body. To have a "single" eye means to possess a clear and undimmed organ of vision that can be fixed upon one thing and will hold steadily with accurate vision and sense of value to that one object. Think carefully of the attractions and the disturbances which prevent one from seeing steadily and clearly as he looks at physical objects. Then seek for similar distractions in our religious life. How may we avoid them?

The next illustration of the single purpose is the effort which we sometimes make to serve two masters. There are obvious reasons for the failure of this effort. The first is the discord between the commands of the two. If we could be sure to receive the same orders from both we might go ahead with less confusion. But two masters means two purposes often in conflict; this involves contradictory commands; this means final and complete confusion. And this leads to the inevitable end of love or hate, which is a conflict whose end is disaster. We cannot love contradictories; we can do good work for and with only those persons and principles to which we can give our love and loyalty. Therefore a single leader is necessary to a useful and happy life. How can we make Christ the true Master of our daily living?

3. The Unfretted Life. Out of this single purpose grows that most desirable and beautiful fact, a life that is free from fret and worry, that is full of deep joy and abundant peace. Worry has been called the "disease of the age." Anxiety robs us of our own peace and power and makes it impossible for us to do the work which God gave us to carry out in this world. We have only about so much energy to expend; if we waste it in worry we have thrown it away and never can use it in the accomplishment of our chief task. God knows and cares and we must learn to rest on and in this truth. Suggest practical ways in which we can curb our worries and gain the control of ourselves that we desire. How can we think the matter out more clearly and so gain self-control? Will it help if we fix our affections more deeply on Christ? Are there any practical ways to absorb ourselves so deeply in that which we do that we shall be safe from fretfulness?

4. First, the Kingdom. The central item in the teaching of Jesus is the Kingdom of God. It sounds strange to our ears because we do not like kings. Recently a large group of young men who belonged to churches was carefully questioned to see what they thought of the Kingdom of God. The result was amazing. Hardly anyone had any clear notion of it and the majority seemed never to have thought of it at all. It is the lost doctrine of the Master. Run through the gospels in the most superficial way and see what this fact is that Jesus tells us plainly we are to make the first object of our desire. Surely if it holds such a commanding place as this we ought to be clear about it. What is the very first object of your desire at this moment? Be honest in your thinking and clear in the framing of your reply. Is it the highest and best object that you could be seeking? What is the Kingdom of God as an actual object that a modern man may make the goal of his life? How can we place this object in the center of our ambition and habitual action and make it the controlling factor in our whole life? In what way will all other desirable things be "added" to this?

The Study of the Bible

V. Some Famous Old Testament Stories

Keeping in mind the suggestions at the beginning of our last article, let us proceed to apply them to the interpretation of the Bible.

CREATION

Biblical chronology indicates that the universe is about six thousand years of age and Genesis has an account of creation which gives both the order and the time taken. How shall we interpret and teach this account?

Remembering that the Bible is primarily a book of religion and not of geology, we shall be interested not in the time it took or the order in which it came, but in the religious interpretation of it all.

The account was a common Semitic tradition. There is a very similar Babylonian account. The permanent thing in the account, and the only thing of moral and spiritual consequence, is the priority and primacy of God. "In the beginning God created," and the likeness of man to God, "Let us make man in our own image." God is first; it is his world and man is like the creator. These are all there is of consequence in the story. Whether the order is accurate or the time correct, as it surely is not, has no bearing upon our redemption, and even has no moral significance whatever. It does have bearing upon certain views of biblical authority, to which subject we will give one or two articles later.

THE FALL

The account of the fall in the third chapter of Genesis, though pictorially teaching truth as to the way sin came in the race and the individual, is probably not fact at all.

Snakes do not crawl upon their bellies because an actual snake tempted a woman. But the serpent, with its subtlety, with its ability to charm and thus strike its victim, is an excellent symbol of the way temptation assails us. The curiosity to know for ourselves, symbolized in the tree of knowledge, is true to life. If we analyze our own temptations, we will find that curiosity, the desire to "try it once," even though we know it is dangerous, is often a major factor.

Weeds do not grow because man sinned; and labor is a blessing, not a curse, but it is true that sin has laid untold burdens on the human race.

In this old story we find a promise so significant that it has been called "the Magna Charta of the human race." The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent. "He shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel." Finally sin shall be overcome.

NOAH

Here we have the religious interpretation of the old tradition, that a flood had at one time overwhelmed the earth or the part of it which this people knew. To the Jews, God was the direct cause of all calamity, be it flood, earthquake or drought. They explained this flood as God's determination to blot out, because of its wickedness, all the human race except Noah and his family. Jesus denied this connection between calamity and sin, and said his Father loved even enemies and made his rain to fall upon the evil and the good. Whatever the flood was, it was doubtless the result of natural causes.

Note how two or more accounts are woven together. In Gen. 6:19, 20, two of every living thing of all flesh are to be taken into the Ark. In Gen. 7:2, seven of the clean beasts, and in verse 3, seven of all birds. Gen. 7:12, "the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights"; verse 17, "And the flood was forty days upon the earth; verse 24, "And the waters prevailed upon the earth a hundred and fifty days." Gen. 8:3, "after the end of a hundred and fifty days the waters decreased." Verse 6, "And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark, etc."

The rainbow, which is doubtless as old as sun and rain, is explained as a special covenant between Jehovah and Noah and his descendants. Gen. 9:8-17.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

What Sort of Sorrow Should a Christian Feel?

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Oct. 31—Nov. 6.

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Lesson. John 11:1-28; 1 Thess. 4:13-14.

The Hope in It. Sorrow is a token of our human worth. Those who do not sorrow are of the lower orders of the earth. We Christians call our Lord the "Man of Sorrows," a title which belongs to him as the most typical man of men. For sorrow is the shadow, the other side of love. Paul in the early days of discipleship, when he expected the immediate, visible return of Christ, comforted the Thessalonians with the charge that they should not sorrow as others who have no hope. The ages have gone on and we are not yet in this sense reunited with those whom we have loved and lost. But our sorrow is not without hope, the reunion we desire is but postponed. The new life beyond death to which we look forward is neither lonely nor without social relations. We have a right and duty, because hopeless sorrow is a hindering force for work, to emphasize this element of hope in the sorrow to which we all are heirs.

The Continuing Love. We are not satisfied with promise that our lives shall go on. We ask assurance that life hereafter shall have a real continuity with the life that now is. And this our Lord takes for granted. Peter will be Peter, just as Christ will be Christ. For on the continuance of our conscious individuality depends the survival of our love. It will be the one we loved, and not another, whom we are to regain. And the assurance of this rests upon the word of Christ. Unless we are content to pick the pearl of a vision of continuing individuality out of the mire of those revelations which assert themselves as communications with those who have gone before (and I call them mire because the testimony to malice and trickery and falsehood on the other side is given by all convinced investigators), we have elsewhere no confident and unfaltering declarations on this subject of continuing individuality which is the necessary condition precedent of continuing affection—except from the lips of Christ.

The Fellowship of Work. There is nothing in the records of the New Testament to justify the thought of heaven as a place of idleness. The earth is a place for the shaping of those who are to be more than ever the companions of God in the work in which he is engaged. Rest is not quitting, it is continuing the busy career. But our occupations and companionships in work will not then be hindered by the weakness and the weariness of our present experience.

Sorrow as a Fount of Sympathy. All this side of our sorrow, as equipping us for sympathy, is said of Christ himself in the second chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews: "Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, . . . For in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted." Our sorrows are a part of our equipment for understanding and bringing help to those who are in sorrow.

THE GREAT ADVENTURE

And he saith unto them, Follow me. Matt. 4: 19.

There is but one chance of life, in admitting so far the possibility of the Christian verity as to try it on its own terms. There is not the slightest possibility of finding whether it be true or not at first. "Show me a sign first, and I will come," you say. "No," answers God, "come first, and then you will see a sign."—John Ruskin.

It is true that Abram knew not "whither he went" and by so much this is what is called "a leap in the dark"; but Abram knew two things: he knew at whose bidding he was going and he knew what results were promised to his faith.—Joseph Parker.

We know not what the path may be
As yet by us untrod,
But we can trust our all to thee,
Our Father and our God.

But if some darker lot be good,
O teach us to endure
The sorrow, pain or solitude
That makes the spirit pure.

Christ by no flowery pathway came;
And we, his followers here,
Must do thy will and praise thy name,
In hope and love and fear.
—William J. Irons.

No one can have a true idea of right until he does it; any genuine reverence for it till he does it often and with cost; any peace ineffable in it till he does it always and with alacrity.—James Martineau.

You must love in order to understand love. One act of charity will teach us more of the love of God than a thousand sermons. One act of unselfishness, of real self-denial, will tell us more of the meaning of the Epiphany than whole volumes on theology. —F. W. Robertson.

Faith, in the first instance, is the resolution to stand or fall by the noblest hypothesis; that is (may we not say) to follow Christ wherever he may lead us. Faith begins with an experiment and ends with an experience.—J. H. Jowett.

To Thee, O God, we have committed our souls and we would not draw back, but await thy clearer teaching as we go upon our way. Enable us to profit by the lessons of our experience through the instruction of thy Holy Spirit, taking of the things of Christ and showing them to us. Let our faith be quickened in our faithfulness and our hope be purified in the exercise of love toward thee and all men whom thou givest us for neighbors. Pardon our interruptions of thy teaching in lapses and neglects and help us to offend no more. Let the joy of Christlike living reveal Christ in our souls and be a witness for him in our overcoming and our cheerful days. In his name. Amen.
—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

The Makers of Peace

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Nov. 7-13

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Peacemakers. Matt. 5:9; Gen. 13:1-9.

Light from the Bible Passages

Peace is one of God's attributes. He loves it. One whose heart is set on peace is therefore Godlike. Christ says he is in further honor: he is called a son of God. He is his son. Such sons not alone seek peace for themselves. They seek to promote it in a world and in a day when and where there are many things that do not make for it. They do not secure peace by keeping out of places where things are disturbed and disturbing. They seek to change them.

Everything was set for trouble between Abram and Lot. One misstep would have been enough. Abram was of the cool and collected sort. He controlled his own and Lot's passions by his appeal to reason. He was willing to yield one point or many rather than have a disturbance of their relations. Such principles and practices make for peace.

Leads for Leaders

Jesus' coming was heralded as the beginning of a new era of peace among men in whom God is well pleased (Revised version of Matt. 2:14). To do all possible to bring that peace is the task of every Christian. A consecration that leads the Endeavorer to commit himself anew to this great task will be well worth while.

Peaceful relations between nations is a much-discussed subject now. What can America do to hasten its coming over all the earth?

Peace between classes of people in our country is another great task. Will the Golden Rule in action bring this?

Peace between individuals. Are the essentials to promoting it any different from those necessary to bring it to nations and to classes?

Thoughts for Members

What would happen to international jealousy, rivalry and suspicion, and to war itself if more men were pre-eminently characterized as peacemakers? Does Jesus' phrase tie men to any specific program of world peace, or does it commend primarily the spirit that leads men to labor for peace? Is it possible by waging war to be a peacemaker?—K. S. Latourette.

In the conflict between capital and labor, the church's sympathies are with the under dog. Yet there is something more important in her mind than helping the under dog up, and that is to take the dog nature out of both dogs.—John Andrew Holmes.

A Moment of Prayer

O Master, whose great concern was that men should dwell upon the earth in peace and quiet, we pray thee that we may catch anew the feelings that thou didst have when thou didst praise the makers of peace. May our yearnings become principles not alone for the nations but also for those who are the least of their inhabitants. Amen.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Recent Biographies

The Autobiography of Andrew Carnegie (Houghton Mifflin). This is doubtless one of the notable biographies of the year, not only as the life story of one of the greatest of American masters of industry but for its inner revelation of a fine and remarkable personality. Many accounts have been written in recent years of men and women who have come to the United States in humble circumstances and by taking advantage of the opportunities offered in this free land have risen to positions of wealth and power. But, as Dr. van Dyke says in his Editor's Note, "Nothing stranger ever came out of the Arabian Nights than the story of this poor Scotch boy" and his remarkable career. It was a career which would not have been possible without a fine, strong, true, rugged character to back it. Mr. Carnegie tells the story perfectly, without a trace of egotism, but simply and naturally as a record of personal reminiscences. He became the friend of other great men of his time, Garret, John Hay, Lord Bryce, John Morley, Matthew Arnold, Gladstone, and many others, who appear in these pages. The material of chief interest, however, is the story of the building up of the great steel industry.

Bishop Moorehouse, by Edith C. Rickards (Dutton). A fascinating memoir of one of England's greatest preachers, Bishop of Melbourne from 1876 to 1886, and Bishop of Manchester from 1886 to 1903. He belonged to the modern school in theology and Biblical interpretation. The memoirs are well written, rich in quotation from the Bishop's sermons, letters and addresses and full of interest.

The Life and Explorations of Frederick Stanley Arnot, by Ernest Baker (Dutton). Arnot was a Scotchman, a missionary to Africa and a great traveler in the Dark Continent. He made nine journeys to the center of Africa. This biography is first of all a missionary record, but it is also a wonderful account of exploration and adventure, equal in devotion, perseverance, interest and results to that of Livingston. The reader will agree with the biographer that Arnot was one of "the greatest saints and missionaries of modern times." The volume is largely made up of selections from diaries and letters.

In Other Lands

A Book of the Severn, by A. G. Bradley (Dodd, Mead). The longest river in England rises in Western Wales, not far from Cardigan Bay and flows in a semi-circular course, northeasterly, east, southeast, southerly and southwest, emptying into the Bristol Channel. It runs through a picturesque country, part Welsh, part English, rich in fascinating historic traditions. The author traces the whole course in a leisurely way from the source in Plynlimmon to the estuary below Gloucester. The country has been described by many writers from Borrow onward and the author comments humorously on his predecessors and gathers the best of such previous lore as he moves onward and adds quite as entertainingly his own observations and experiences. It is a charming and altogether satisfactory travel volume, rich in interesting anecdote and historical information.

South Sea Foam, by A. Safroni-Middleton (Doran). Reminiscences of a poet and violinist who wandered among the South Sea Islands making friends with the natives, and experiencing many extraordinary adventures. He studied the folk-lore and songs of the islanders and translates their mythology. He met R. L. Stevenson on one of his Samoan visits. It is an unusual and exceptionally picturesque narrative.

The Dawn of a New Era in Syria, by Margaret McGilvary (Revell). An interesting inside human account of what has taken place in Syria in the last five years. The author graduated from an American College in 1914 and since then has been on the field—chiefly at Beirut. Some of her statements are surprising. For instance she says the Swedish embassy was more pro-German than the Germans. It has significance not only from the missionary and historical standpoints but also from the political and psychological sides. It helps also to understand the complexity of the Syrian situation as it stands today.

Revell

The Dawn of a New Era in Syria

China, the Mysterious and Marvelous, by Victor Murdock (Revell). A breezy, unconventional book describing many phases of life today in the great oriental republic. The flashing humor, the clever frankness, the vivid word pictures and the massing of significant facts, combine to make it at once interesting and instructive to an unusual degree. One of Mr. Murdock's most important conclusions is that he believes "the Chinese Republic will make a go of it." He winds up his optimistic study with these words: "The two foremost elements of the World are the doctrines of Jesus Christ and democracy. To me they are one and the same, making the leaven which must eventually leaven the whole lump, East as well as West."

Present Day Paris, by Somerville Story (Appleton). A handbook of the visitor to Paris, describing the city, and excursions to the battlefields where American soldiers fought. Mr. Story is an adept in this line and gives just the desired information.

South of Suez, by William Ashley Anderson (McBride). An account of recent travel along East Africa starting at Aden and Somaliland. He was in the latter place in 1916 when the ruler of Abyssinia gave up his Coptic faith and declared himself a Moslem, precipitating a rebellion which ended in placing the present Queen on the throne. One chapter is devoted to Zanzibar, and another The Wilderness Patrol, tells of his experiences as an English officer leading a troop of blacks against the Germans.

Miscellaneous

Problems of Today, by Moorfield Storey (Houghton Mifflin). A vigorous discussion of some of the most serious problems of the day, going straight to the causes of lawlessness, race prejudices, labor troubles and foreign complications. It is stimulating and instructive to study problems in the clear light that Mr. Storey throws upon them.

Everyman's Child, by Sophie Irene Loeb (Century). Every child should have a chance, even the neglected and dependent children, the waif, the orphan of the slums. This is a duty of the nation, not only a duty, it is the way of wisdom. How best to give him his chance is the theme of this stirring book. Homes Instead of Institutions, How Children Keep Out of Children's Court, No Hungry Child in a Public School, How the Other Half Dies—these are some of the chapter titles. And the Child Labor question and the Milk question are other matters considered. Miss Loeb writes from long official experience.

Never Grow Old, by Dr. L. H. Goizet (Putnam). This French physician declares that he has discovered a method of insuring perfect health by means of extreme simplicity which any one may employ "without expense beyond a few moments of his time daily." He is himself 85 years old, in fine physical condition and declares that he has shown the way to hundreds of patients. The subtitle to his book is "How to live for more than a hundred years."

More About the Mayflower

The Last of the Mayflower, by Rendel Harris (Longmans). Interesting research into the subsequent history of the famous Pilgrim vessel. It concludes, "We traced her to Boston and to the year 1654; one is tempted to conjecture that she died (in a nautical sense) not long after. Professor Harris shows reasons for believing that the Pilgrim ship of 1620 "is also the Puritan ship of 1629 and 1630, and is also Mr. Horth's ship of the Greenland whale-fishery and is also the ship whose owner, in her last days, was Mr. Thomas Webber of Boston." Under this latter owner the Mayflower was employed in carrying goods to Boston for John Eliot, the Apostle of the Red Indians, and his disciples. It is a very interesting study and gives in detail the author's investigation and reasons for his conclusions.

WITH THE CHILDREN

A Hallowe'en of Long Ago

By Janet Louise Savage

The Carpenters were a large family and it was generally believed that they knew just how to have good times together. Certain it is that there was always something doing at the dark red house on Murray Hill that sheltered this great, happy group of young people. No birthday passed without its festive cake, with its heavy frosting and lighted candles, and it seemed to neighboring children that surprises for the Carpenters were always in the air. The older boys would build the most wonderful doll houses for their younger sisters out of a discarded dry goods box, and hadn't they once kept all the children in the neighborhood in the greatest state of excitement for a whole week by pinning up on their barn door the sign, "Pippy Poppy Show. Admission twenty pins"? Mothers missed all their pins, for the show was so wonderful that the children must go in again and again—and what was it but all kinds of animals and queer things they had cut out of paper and pinned on the wooden walls of the barn that the Carpenters used as their playhouse. Then the girls would have mud-pie parties and serve mud pies, decorated with cinnamon candies to all who attended. Of course, no one was supposed to eat their refreshments, but it was all make-believe eating, and what child doesn't love the Land of Make-Believe?

But this was Hallowe'en and they were going to have their frolics just with each other tonight. Of course, Mother and Father would join them and that would be as jolly as they could wish.

In this jolly, big family there were David and John, Eunice, Margaret and Helene. Eunice planned many good times for her younger sisters and brothers, but she was her mother's great "stand-by," and one always to be depended upon. So it was Eunice who was making plans for the gaiety of the evening. She had hung big Jack lanterns in the living room and placed candles in them, to be lighted later. In the fireplace she had logs ready to be started into red flame at the touch of a match, for on top she had placed a bundle of fat pine. In the windows were grinning pumpkins, whose linings had been taken for the pies that would grace the dinner table.

Eunice hurried about giving orders, which the children gleefully carried out, entering into the spirit of play that seemed to be all about. That morning she had lifted small Helene up to the walnut tree out in the backyard while she fastened a piece of suet on a string for the birds' Hallowe'en, and under the tree she had dropped some walnuts for the gray squirrels, who quickly scampered about and gathered them up, then hastened back to their squirrel cottage. After all plans had been laid and carried out the family packed themselves into the waiting car in the driveway and spinning down the roadway went to see what was going on in the town before they had their own celebration.

Everything was noise and confusion. People threw confetti at each other, men and women were dressed in all kinds of fancy costumes and the streets looked like a picture out of a fairy tale book, they were so different from their everyday appearance. A clown in a red costume came up close to the Carpenters' car and made grotesque grimaces at the children, then picking up a long trumpet which some one had dropped blew a long trumpet call and then dashed through the crowd for more nonsense, turning back to throw a ball of pretty colored paper into Helene's lap before he disappeared.

Mr. Carpenter had great difficulty in getting out of the crowded streets, but finally did escape and the family were once again back on Murray Hill. Old black Sally had lighted the pumpkins and they smiled a greeting at the children as they came up on the veranda. Inside the house again, Eunice turned out all the lights and with an air of great mystery proceeded to light the different lanterns, and at last the logs in the fireplace, so the room was soon filled with darting lights that were as magical as the night could hope to show. The younger children even expected to see black witches on brooms drop right down from the chimney and shoot out of the flames.

The bell on the town hall rang and rang, as some boys had tied a rope to it and when one got tired pulling it another would take his place that the spirit of play might not die out. Indeed, too, Carpenters' door-bell had already rung several times and the last time it had rung so steadily Mr. Carpenter had gone out expecting to see the one who had caused the ringing, but found no one there, though on further search he found a toothpick pressed down into the electric button.

They were all grouped about the fireplace, John, Margaret and Helene on the floor at their mother's feet, when suddenly a heavy tapping was heard.

"Witches," said David, with a bold air, while Helene wrapped herself in her mother's skirts.

"Pooh," said Margaret, though she was somewhat afraid. Again came the heavy tapping. Even Mother was beginning by this time to wonder what the sound could be. Mr. Carpenter listened to learn where the sound came from and then caught sight of a pair of laughing brown eyes over the yellow pumpkin's light in the front window. He hurried to the door and loud greetings soon brought the family to their feet and they surrounded the tall man whom their father had let in and it was a full minute before they recognized their favorite uncle in a red clown's suit, the same clown who had thrown the ball of confetti in Helene's lap. He had been having dinner at his club that evening and a group of the men had quickly decided to don carnival clothes and go out in the frolicking crowd, and the first one he had a chance to frolic with was his own little niece.

They soon made a place for him around the fire and listened while he told of the mad antics in town. Soon John tired of this conversation and slipping around to his uncle's chair said, "Uncle John, please tell us about what you did when you were a little boy like me. What did you do on Hallowe'en?"

Eunice in the meantime was passing long, slender twigs, while Margaret passed a dish of marshmallows.

"We are going to toast the marshmallows on these sticks and every one who wants any must tell a story. You start, Uncle John," said Eunice.

"Well," began Uncle John, "the first one I remember was when I was about six years old and your father here was four. We didn't have all the good things that you children have been

THE TOYLAND HALLOWE'EN

In Toyland, on a Hallowe'en, you'd ought to see what's done
When all the jolly little toys turn out to have their fun:
The toy black cats go romping 'round and through the midnight air
The funny Toyland witches on their little brooms ride there!
The girl dolls and the boy dolls have jack-o'-lanterns too
And there's no end to all the games that they all revel through.
So, if you pass a toy-shop on a Hallowe'en, you see,
You'd better take a peep within about midnight, maybe!
